D. On receipt of a written request for a license or licenses under the provisions of paragraph A of this Article VII, Phillips or American, as the case may be, shall advise the applicant in writing of the royalty or other charge which it deems reasonable for the patent or patents to which the request pertains. If the parties are unable to agree on a reasonable royalty or charge within sixty days from the date such request is received, the applicant therefor may forthwith apply to this Court for determination of a reasonable royalty or charge, and Phillips or American, as the case may be, shall, on receipt of notice of the filing of such application, promptly give notice thereof to the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division. Any license granted as a result of an application to the Court, as above provided, shall be retroactive to the date of such application or, at the applicant's option, provided that the applicant is a defendant herein, retroactive for any prior unlicensed period. The reasonable royalty rates or charges, if any, as once finally determined by the Court with respect to any Defined Patents shall apply to all licenses of the same patents thereafter granted, and any licensee who, at the date of such determination by the Court holds a license under the same patents, shall have the right, at its option, to have such royalty rates or charges applied retroactively, with respect to its operations, to the date of the application to the Court which resulted in such determination.

E. In any such proceeding under paragraph D of this Article VII, the burden of proof shall be on Phillips or American, as the case may be, to establish the reasonableness of the royalty or other charge requested by it. Nothing in this judgment shall be construed as importing any validity or value to any of the Defined Patents.

F. Nothing in this Article VII shall be deemed to prevent Phillips and American from executing or carrying out an agreement by which either will be permitted to license the patents of both Phillips and American to any applicant who desires to acquire rights under patents belonging to both parties.

G. Phillips and American are each hereby enjoined and restrained from making any disposition of any of the Defined Patents or rights with respect thereto which deprives it of the power or authority to grant licenses as hereinabove in this Article VII provided, unless it requires, as a condition of such disposition, that the purchaser, transferee, assignee or licensee, as the case may be, shall observe the requirements of Articles VII and VIII hereof and such purchaser, transferee, assignee or licensee shall file with this Court, prior to the consummation of the transaction, an undertaking to be bound by said provisions of this judgment.

H. Phillips and American are hereby severally ordered and directed to send to each applicant for a license under Article VII hereof a copy of this judgment promptly after the application is made.

VIII.

[Purposes of Compliance]

A. For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, and for no other purpose, and subject to any legally recognized privilege, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, on the written request of the Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, and on reasonable notice to any defendant, be permitted

(1) access, during the office hours of any such defendant, to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda, and other records and documents there located relating to any of the matters contained in this judgment; and

(2) subject to the reasonable convenience of such defendant and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers or employees of such defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters.

Upon written request of the Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, each defendant shall submit such reports in writing with respect to the matters contained in this judgment as may from time to time be necessary to the enforcement of this judgment.

B. Each of the defendants is hereby severally ordered and directed to file with this Court and with the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, within ninety days after the date of the entry of this judgment, a report of all action taken by it to comply with or conform to the terms of this judgment.

C. The information obtained by the means permitted by this Article VIII shall not be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Department of Justice, except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States of America is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, or as otherwise required by law.

IX.

Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling the parties to this judgment to appeal to the Court at any time for such further orders or directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment, for the modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, for the enforcement of compliance therewith, and for the punishment of violations thereof.

[¶ 62,395] Transamerica Corporation v. Thomas Bayard McCabe, Marriner S. Eccles, M. S. Szymczak, Ernest G. Draper, Rudolph M. Evans, James Kimble Vardaman, Jr., and Lawrence Clayton.

In the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Civil Action No. 4175-48. November 3, 1948.

Clayton Act

Failure to Show Irreparable Damage—No Relief Until Administrative Remedy Exhausted.—The Court denied relief to a plaintiff seeking a declaratory judgment and injunctive relief against members of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System with respect to a proceeding instituted by the Board under the provision of Section 11 of the Clayton Act, in which the plaintiff is charged with violation of Section 7 of that Act. The plaintiff claimed that the complaint in the administrative proceedings failed to charge a violation of law with sufficient particularity to enable a defense and that a more particular statement had been denied. He argued that the statutory judicial review provided was not adequate and that he would suffer irreparable injury if resort to judicial remedy was delayed until after the administrative proceeding. The Court found that his complaint did not show such irreparable injury as would justify an exception to the well recognized rule that relief by judicial action may not be had until an administrative remedy has been exhausted, and where there is full and adequate statutory review of administrative action, recourse to the District Court for equitable relief to prevent such administrative action can not be had.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2031.

Memorandum

MORRIS, J.: This is an action in which the plaintiff seeks a declaratory judgment and injunctive relief against the defendant members of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System with respect to a proceeding instituted by the Board under the provision of Section 11 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C., Section 21,[1] in which the plaintiff is charged with violation of Sec-

[1] Sec. 11, Clayton Act, U. S. C., Sec. 21, Title 15.

Authority to enforce compliance with sections * * * 18 * * * of this title by the persons respectively subject thereto is hereby vested: * * * in the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, where applicable to banks, banking associations, and trust companies; * * *

Whenever the commission or board vested with jurisdiction thereof shall have reason to believe that any person is violating or has violated any of the provisions of said sections, it shall issue and serve upon such person a complaint stating its charges in that respect, and containing a notice of a hearing upon a day and at a place therein fixed at least thirty days after the service of said complaint. The person so complained of shall have the right to appear at the place and time so fixed and show cause why an order should not be entered by the commission or board requiring such person to cease and desist from the violation of the law so charged in said complaint. Any person may make application, and upon good cause shown may be allowed by the commission or board, to intervene and appear in said proceeding by counsel or in person. The testimony in any such proceeding shall be reduced to writing and filed in the office of the commission or board. If upon such hearing the commission or board, as the case may be, shall be of the opinion that any of the provisions of said sections have been or are being violated, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts, and shall issue and cause to be served on such person an order requiring such person to cease and desist from such violations and divest itself of the stock held or rid itself of the directors chosen contrary to the provisions of sections 18 * * * of this title, if any there be, in the manner and within the time fixed by said order. Until a transcript of the record in such hearing shall have been filed in a circuit court of appeals of the United States, as hereinafter provided, the commission or board may at any time, upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any report or any order made or issued by it under this section.

tion 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C., Section 18.[2] The complaint in the instant action asserts that the complaint in the administrative proceedings fails to charge a violation of law with sufficient particularity to enable the plaintiff, respondent therein, to make proper answer and defense thereto; that the plaintiff has sought a more particular statement with respect to the alleged violation, which has been denied by the Board; and that the complaint in the administrative proceedings does not set forth "the legal authority and jurisdiction under which the hearing is to be held." The plaintiff insists that in this situation the declaratory judgment and injunctive relief sought should be granted to prevent irreparable injury, and that such relief should be granted on the further ground that the complaint in the administrative proceedings is insufficient to meet the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act, approved June 11, 1946, 5 U. S. C., Section 1001, et seq.

Upon motion a rule was issued to the defendants to show cause why a temporary restraining order and preliminary injunction should not be granted. Before the return of this rule, the defendants filed a motion to dismiss the complaint upon the ground that this Court is without jurisdiction to interfere at an interlocutory stage in the administrative hearing authorized by the Clayton Act. A hearing was had upon the rule to show cause and the motion to dismiss on October 20, 1948. By leave of Court brief and supplementary brief were filed by the plaintiff.

At the threshold it must be pointed out that the statute which authorizes the administrative proceeding here in question specifically provides for complete judicial review of any order directing the plaintiff to cease and desist from any violation of the Act, or to divest itself of any stock held in violation thereof.[3] It is well established that ordinarily relief by judicial action may not be had until an administrative remedy has been exhausted, and certainly where there is full and adequate statutory review of administrative action, recourse to the District Court for equitable relief to prevent such administrative action cannot be had. Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corp., 303

No corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community, or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of two or more corporations engaged in commerce where the effect of such acquisition, or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, may be to substantially lessen competition between such corporations, or any of them, whose stock or other share capital is so acquired, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community, or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition. Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying-on of their immediate lawful business, or the natural and legitimate branches or extensions thereof, or from owning and holding all or a part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations, when the effect of such formation is not to substantially lessen competition.

If such person fails or neglects to obey such order of the Commission or board while the same is in effect, the Commission or board may apply to the circuit court of appeals of the United States, within any circuit where the violation complained of was or is being committed or where such person resides or carries on business for the enforcement of its order, and shall certify and file with its application a transcript of the entire record in the proceeding, including all the testimony taken and the report and order of the commission or board. Upon such filing of the application and transcript the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person and thereupon shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the question determined therein, and shall have power to make and enter upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings set forth in such transcript a decree, affirming, modifying, or setting aside the order of the commission or board. The findings of the commission or board as to the facts, if supported by testimony, shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material, and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceeding before the commission or board, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the commission or board and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The commission or board may modify its findings as to the facts,

U. S. 41, Macauley v. Waterman Steamship Corp., 327 U. S. 540, and Federal Power Commission v. Arkansas Power & Light Co., 330 U. S. 802. It is here insisted by the plaintiff that the statutory judicial review is not adequate, and that the plaintiff would suffer irreparable injury if resort to a judicial remedy is delayed until after the administrative proceedings. The complaint does not show such irreparable injury as would justify an exception to the well recognized rules just stated. Several cases are cited which sanction the exercise of equitable intervention in situations which are not here shown to exist. The Supreme Court stated in the case of Myers v. Bethlehem Corporation, supra, at page 51:

> "Obviously, the rule requiring exhaustion of the administrative remedy cannot be circumvented by asserting that the charge on which the complaint rests is groundless and that the mere holding of the prescribed administrative hearing would result in irreparable damage. Lawsuits also often prove to have been groundless; but no way has been discovered of relieving a defendant from the necessity of a trial to establish the fact."

Moreover, the Supreme Court has said, with particular respect to administrative proceedings where statutory judicial review is provided,

> "Whatever may be the scope allowed generally for equity to intervene upon the ground of inadequacy of legal remedies, where no explicit congressional command exists for following a prescribed procedure, the problem when such a mandate is present is entirely different from one tendered in its absence. The very fact that Congress has made the direction must be cast into the scales as against the factors which, without that fact, would or might be of sufficient weight to turn the balance in favor of allowing utilization of equity's resources. Aircraft & Diesel Corp. v. Hirsch, et al., 331 U. S. 752, at page 774."

It is urged that the lack of subpoena power in the Federal Reserve Board would work to the prejudice of the plaintiff in securing and offering evidence needed to meet the allegations of the complaint. Should the plaintiff, during the course of the administrative proceedings, be deprived of a fair and adequate hearing because of the lack of such subpoena power, I have not the slightest doubt that the Court of Appeals, either in proceedings to enforce the Board's order, or to review the same, would be competent to require the evidence which was lacking, or give relief to the plaintiff because of the failure to supply the same.[3]

The plaintiff insists that the Administrative Procedure Act qualifies the rules stated in the authorities here cited, as to which said Act was not operative. In so far as it affects the application of the rules to the situation here involved, I am in no doubt that the Administrative Procedure Act left judicial review, when statutory judicial review is provided, where it found it. Unquestionably this Act imposed certain procedures upon administrative action, and equally without question the Act requires a reversal of administrative action where its procedures have not been in accordance with the Act, and prejudice to the aggrieved party has resulted. There can be no doubt that, if the complaint in the administrative proceedings here is as inadequate as the plaintiff insists and, by reason thereof, the rights of the plaintiff are prejudiced by the Board's action, relief can be had when the judicial power comes into play upon the enforcement or review of such action. The requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act are no less important and effec-or make new findings, by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which if supported by testimony, shall be conclusive, and its recommendation, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original order, with the return of such additional evidence. The judgment and decree of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court upon certiorari as provided in sections 346 and 347 of Title 28.

Any party required by such order of the commission or board to cease and desist from a violation charged may obtain a review of such order in said circuit court of appeals by filing in the court a written petition praying that the order of the commission or board be set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the commission or board, and thereupon the commission or board forthwith shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the record as hereinbefore provided. Upon the filing of the transcript the court shall have the same jurisdiction to affirm, set aside, or modify the order of the commission or board as in the case of an application by the commission or board for the enforcement of its order, and the findings of the commission or board as to the facts, if supported by testimony, shall in like manner be conclusive.

The jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States to enforce, set aside, or modify orders of the Commission or board shall be exclusive.

tive because they are to be enforced by the reviewing court, where statutory review is provided, rather than by a court of equity before final action in the administrative proceedings. The latter would require consideration almost in vacuo.

For the reasons stated, I must conclude that this Court does not have the power to grant the relief sought by the plaintiff, and the complaint must, therefore, be dismissed.

[¶ 62,396] Liquor Stores, Inc., and Webb's City, Inc., v. Continental Distilling Corporation.

In the Supreme Court of Florida. January Term, A. D. 1949. En Banc. April 5, 1949.

Florida Fair Trade Law

State Price-Fixing Statute Unconstitutional—Public v. Private Interest—Invasion of Constitutional Rights of Consumer and Retailer.—In an action for injunctive relief brought by a distilling company to enjoin a liquor retailer from selling brand name whiskey below prices established by fair trade contracts with other retailers, it was held that the act which authorized such agreements was a price-fixing statute and an unconstitutional exercise of the state's police power. The act was declared arbitrary and unreasonable and in violation of the right to own and enjoy property, while the contract sued upon was pronounced void and contrary to public policy.

A further ground for denying relief was found in the undenied allegation that the parent corporation, of which the plaintiff is a subsidiary, utilizes numerous brands and is taking advantage of this act to create monopolies in alcoholic liquors and coerce this intervenor to pay arbitrary, excessive and unreasonable prices thereby fixing prices and wholly stifling competition. The contract is therefore contrary to public policy and void and relief should be denied even if the act were not unconstitutional. An additional basis for dismissal was the plaintiff's failure to make a case under the act which requires proof of competition between manufacturers or producers of the same general commodity and that competition is free and open.

A concurring justice points out that the purpose of price fixing is to prevent ruinous competition which exists in times of overproduction. It was not contemplated by the Legislature of 1939 that this Act would operate in periods of scarcity. Under present conditions, contracts fixing a minimum sales price of commodities would be considered as a restraint upon free and open competition unless the contrary was shown.

This concurring justice also states that a state may not punish those who enter into agreements in restraint of trade or which tend to restrict competition and then grant immunity to a class who enter into agreements having the same obnoxious impact upon the public interest. The special privileges and immunities granted to the plaintiff by the Act, under present economic conditions serve a private interest and contravene constitutional guarantees.

Another concurring justice states that price-fixing legislation is only valid when emergencies which threaten the general welfare, like war or threat of economic chaos, require its enactment. The basis for such law actually should be present not only at the time of its passage but the law should exist only so long as the situation which gave rise to it continues. Without appropriate predicate, legislation of this kind is unconstitutional from its inception, and absent a limitation on its life span it could become so by virtue of changed or improved conditions.

[Statute Not In Interest of General Welfare]

ADAMS, C. J.: If the decision of this case is to rest upon precedents from other jurisdictions then the conclusion is not difficult. We confess they lead to an approval of the act. Our first duty, however, is to our own constitution as well as the superior federal law. This court has, perhaps more so than many others, been alert to any trespass upon the citizens' constitutional rights. See State v. City of Stuart, 97 Fla. 69, 120 So. 335, 64 A. L. R. 1307. This legislation is a species of the relatively recent national recovery legislation. It was conceived at a time when there were surpluses and general need for such a law in certain basic commodities. The courts approving similar acts scarcely had an opportunity to observe its effects other than as its proponents visualized its operation in future. We are in a more favored position as we have the benefit of the actual consequences flowing from its application.

There is yet another reason why we are constrained to reexamine the precedents to the contrary. That is, few of the cases treat the proposition of whether the legislation is within the scope of the police power. The courts generally have accepted the premise of the proponents of the act; that it is in the interest of the general welfare to protect the property right in the trade mark and brand. We may concede, though it is not beyond question and not necessary to discuss here, that the owner of a trade mark and brand has a property right deserving the protection of law. Undoubtedly he has up to a point. Although without this act he has the protection afforded by law in common to all other properties. Is he entitled to more? If he may claim additional advantage, then he must look to the law emanating from the police power. If the vantage sought is personal as distinguished from the general public then the police power may not be invoked. The police power has been wisely restricted to those things which of necessity affect the public morals, public health or public safety. When a statute is brought into question resting upon the police power the courts have the power and duty to inquire whether it is within constitutional limits. To be valid it must apply to the general public as distinguished from a particular group or class. The idea of general welfare should banish the thought that the state may subordinate the right of one group of citizens to advance the welfare of another. The legislature is the judge of the wisdom of the regulation but the court may say whether the act is within constitutional limits. It is particularly a judicial question whether the legislative act is for a private or public purpose. The right to own, hold and enjoy property is nearly absolute. The statute cannot be the means of leveling unequal fortunes, neither can it favor one segment of the people at the expense of another. These principles are fundamental. See 11 Am. Jur., Constitutional Law, Sec. 245 et seq. If the stronger and more influential may impose their wills upon minorities where the general welfare does not require such legislation then the weaker and less fortunate will soon be vanquished. Constitutional law never sanctions the granting of sovereign power to one group of citizens to be exercised against another unless the general welfare is served. The effect of this act is to grant by indirection sovereign power to one person (not necessarily a citizen) to be exercised against another.

[Power Vested in Interested Party]

This statute is, in fact, a price fixing statute. The power to fix the price is vested in an interested person who is not an official. There is no review of his act. He is required to consult with no one and in no sense is required to take into consideration the cost of the article or the reasonableness thereof. We need look no further than our own jurisdiction for precedents to turn the decision. We have many times been confronted with price fixing statutes in one form or another. Throughout all our holdings we have recognized as basic that for a statute such as this to be upheld there must be some semblance of a public necessity for the act and it must have some relation to the public health, morals or safety. Further, the price fixing agency must be duly constituted by law and due notice of its action. All of which contemplates that the prices fixed must have some regard to reason besides having a public concern. State v. Ives, 123 Fla. 401, 167 So. 394; Scarborough v. Webb's Cut Rate Drug Company, Inc., 150 Fla. 754, 8 So. 2d 913; Miami Laundry Co. v. Fla. Dry Cleaning and Laundry Board, 134 Fla. 1, 183 So. 759, 119 A. L. R. 956. (The latter case related to health and sanitation in the laundry business.)

[General Welfare Not Served]

Many of the precedents from other jurisdictions on similar acts were made upon the proponents' statement that the general welfare would be served. The exact contrary is now perfectly apparent as will appear from a study of Summary and Conclusion of the Federal Trade Commission, December 13, 1945. We quote from Page LXI:

> "The essence of resale price maintenance is control of price competition. Lack of adequate enforcement of the anti-trust laws leaves a broad field for the activities of organized trade groups to utilize it for their own advantage and to the detriment of consumers. * * *"

[Act Must Conform to State Constitution]

Some of the states have given a broader sphere of operations to the police power than we have. Some authorities inquire only whether the general welfare is in some measure served. This elevates the state over the individual. Under this concept constitutional guaranties are of no effect to minorities and majorities have no need for them. Then, too, some of the state courts have receded from their holdings because of the United States Supreme Court. See Bourjois Sales Corporation v. Dorfman, 273 N. Y. 167, 7 N. E. 2d 30; Old Dearborn Distributing Company v. Seagram-Distillers Corporation and McNeil v. Joseph Triner Corporation, 299 U. S. 183, 57 Sup. Ct. 139, 81 L. Ed. 109, 106 A. L. R. 1476. The gist of the holding in this case was that the state act did not, on the grounds considered, contravene the Federal Constitution. The court of last resort of each sovereign state is the final arbiter as to whether the act conforms to its own constitution whereas the federal courts are concerned only with whether the act offends the Federal Constitution. See 11 Am. Jur., Constitutional Law, Sec. 103.

[Benefits Derived By Retail Groups Only]

It is also well to note that when this type of law was first promulgated its purpose was to protect long established brands which had acquired a substantial value. As time passed and one court after another approved them, perhaps because another court had, little if any inquiry was made of the original purpose. Now new brands by the thousands are created overnight to get the advantage of the act. It is well to remember also that this act applies to every kind of article including such necessities as food and drugs. In that connection it is enlightening to read fully the Summary of the Federal Trade Commission relative to the means employed by certain retail groups to coerce the manufacturers to fix prices for the retailer's benefit and to the detriment of both the manufacturer and the consuming public.

[Act Is Arbitrary, Contract Is Void]

Our conclusion is that the act is arbitrary and unreasonable and violates the right to own and enjoy property; one economic group may not have the sovereign power of the state extended to it and use it to the detriment of other citizens. In that case the legislation serves a private rather than a public purpose. The sovereign power must not be delegated to a private citizen to be used for a private purpose and especially where there is no state supervision. There is yet another reason why relief should be denied this plaintiff. The answer discloses that this plaintiff is one of about forty subsidiary corporations—all owned and controlled by a parent corporation, Public Industries, Inc., a Pennsylvania Corporation; that this parent corporation and four other corporations control eighty to ninety percent of the alcoholic liquors in the United States; that these several corporations utilize numerous brands and are taking advantage of this act to create monopolies in alcoholic liquors and coerce this intervenor and others to pay arbitrary, excessive and unreasonable prices thereby fixing prices and wholly stifling competition. This allegation is not controverted. His contract is, therefore, contrary to public policy and void, and relief should be denied even though the act is not unconstitutional. The act in terms provides that before a contract can be enforced under it (1) there must be competition between manufacturers or producers of the same general commodity; (2) that competition must be free and open. This plaintiff has not only failed to make a case under the act but the answer makes a complete defense.

The writ is issued and the order is quashed.

BARNS, J., concurring: Plaintiff, Continental Distilling Corporation, brought its injunction suit at Tampa, Florida. The chancellor overruled the several motions by defendants, Liquor Stores, Inc., and Webb's City, Inc., to dismiss plaintiff's bill. The defendants-petitioners now seek a review of such order by certiorari.

The bill alleges that Continental Distilling Corporation is the maker, manufacturer and distributor of whiskies, and in particular is the manufacturer, distiller and owner of the trademark, brand and name of a whiskey known as "Philadelphia Blended Whiskey," which is sold to various wholesalers and retailers throughout Florida and the United States; that the plaintiff-respondent, termed the "owner" entered into a contract with two retail concerns in Jacksonville, Florida, termed the "retailer," who are not parties to the suit, which contract, among other things provided:

> "Retailer shall not, directly or indirectly, at any time, offer for sale or sell within Florida any of said beverages which Retailer has heretofore purchased, now has on hand, or may hereafter purchase or otherwise in any way acquire, and which bear, or the labels or containers of which bear, any trademark, brand name, insignia or the name of the said Continental Distilling Corporation, at other than the resale prices therefor to consumers in Florida, or at any other than the terms and conditions of such resales, from time to time designated by Owner; and Owner shall have the right at all times, and from time to time to revise or change any and all such resale prices and terms and conditions of resale, any such revisions or changes to become effective on such date as shall be specified by Owner on not less than two days' prior written notice mailed to Retailer, postage paid, to Retailer's address as herein stated. Such resale prices and terms and conditions of resale shall be in accordance with written schedules furnished from time to time to Retailer by Owner and/or Owner's wholesaler in Florida authorized for the purpose, and such schedules shall constitute a part of this agreement; and at all times the schedule last delivered to Retailer pursuant to this agreement shall govern the resale prices and terms from time to time list additional goods and brands in any such schedule, with designated resale prices and terms and conditions of resale to consumers, and all the provisions of this agreement shall apply to any and all such additions." (Italics supplied.)

And by Paragraph 6 of the bill further alleges:

> "6. That pursuant to the requirements of Chapter 541, Florida Statutes, Ann., 1941, your complainant established the minimum resale price of 'Philadelphia Blended Whiskey' of $4.10 per one-fifth gallon to be charged by all retailers selling direct to the consumers throughout the trade area comprising the State of Florida, which minimum price so established by your complainant is in effect throughout the State of Florida; that on September 1, 1947, October 20, 1947, and March 5, 1948, your complainant addressed to each retail whiskey dealer in the State of Florida a letter advising such dealers that the minimum retail price of 'Philadelphia Blended Whiskey' to be charged by them in the retail sale of said whiskey, was the sum of $4.10 per one-fifth gallon, which letters, so addressed and containing the minimum price to be charged for the whiskey above mentioned were sent through the usual course of the United States mail to the retail whiskey dealers throughout the State of Florida, including the defendant, Liquor Stores, Inc., 812 South Boulevard, Tampa, Florida." (Italics supplied.)

The bill further charged that Liquor Stores, Inc., has violated such agreement by advertising and selling "Philadelphia Blended Whiskey" at $3.49 per fifth, when the price fixed by plaintiff-respondent was $4.10 per fifth, and that the acts and doings of Liquor Stores, Inc., are:

> "* * * contrary to the expressed provisions of Chapter 541, Florida Statutes, Ann., 1941, and is resulting in irreparable injury and damage to your complainant in the following respects:
> (a) The Good Will established by complainant through the expenditure of substantial sums of money in advertising its product under the trademark, brand and name of 'Philadelphia Blended Whiskey' is being destroyed.
> (b) Other retail liquor dealers who are selling your complainant's products at prices not less than the minimum retail sales price heretofore set and esatblished by your complainant in accordance with the 'Fair Trade Act' would be compelled to violate their agreements with your complainant and be compelled to violate the Fair Trade Act by selling your complainant's products below the minimum retail sale price in order to meet the unfair competition created by the acts of the defendant. (Italics supplied.)

(c) The cutting of prices by the defendant below the minimum retail sales price will cause the public and consumers to believe that your complainant's products, including 'Philadelphia Blended Whiskey,' is not worth the uniform minimum retail sales price, in consequence of which said retailers will be unable to sell your complainant's products bearing its trademark, brand and name at the minimum retail sales price so set and established.

(d) The public will become confused as to the various brands of such products being sold in open competition with the products distilled and manufactured by your complainant and bearing complainant's trademark, brand and name. * * *"

After the commencement of the suit against Liquor Stores, Inc., the petitioner, Webb's City, Inc., was allowed to intervene as a defendant, who, like Liquor Stores, Inc., appears not to have signed any price fixing contract with the plaintiff-respondent.

The plaintiff-respondent predicates its right to an injunction upon a law enacted in 1939, which is now Chapter 541, F. S. 1941, F. S. A., and known as the "Florida Fair Trade Law," containing provisions relative to price fixing, as follows:

541.03—Contract may govern price of sale or resale. "No contract relating to the sale or resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trade-mark, brand, or name of the producer or distributor of such commodity and which commodity is in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced or distributed by others shall be deemed in violation of any law of the State of Florida by reason of any of the following provisions which may be contained in such contract:

(1) That the buyer will not resell such commodity at less than the minimum price stipulated by the seller.

(2) That the buyer will require of any dealer to whom he may resell such commodity an agreement that he will not, in turn, resell at less than the minimum price stipulated by the seller.

(3) That the seller will not sell such commodity:

(a) To any wholesaler, unless such wholesaler will agree not to resell the same to any retailer unless the retailer will in turn agree not to resell the same except to consumers for use and at not less than the stipulated minimum price, and such wholesaler will likewise agree not to resell the same to any other wholesaler unless such other wholesaler will make the same agreement with any wholesaler or retailer to whom he may resell; or

(b) To any retailer, unless the retailer will agree not to sell the same except to consumers for use and at not less than the stipulated minimum price." Section 541.03, F. S. 1941, F. S. A.

541.05—Owner alone may establish resale price. "No minimum resale price shall be established for any commodity, under any contract entered into pursuant to the provision of this chapter, by any person other than the owner of the trade-mark, brand or name used in connection with such commodity, or a distributor specifically authorized to establish said price by the owner of such trade-mark, brand or name." Section 541.05, F. S. 1941, F. S. A.

541.07—Suit at law for violation of chapter. "Wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of this chapter, whether the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, and whether the particular lot of such commodity so advertised, offered for sale or sold, was or was not at any time sold to a party to a contract that stipulated the price of such commodity under the provisions of this chapter is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby." Section 541.07, F. S. 1941, F. S. A.

After the enactment during the early and middle '30s by the various states of laws similar to Chapter 541, F. S. 1941, F. S. A., the Federal law was amended as stated in American Jurisprudence, as follows:

"Following the pattern of the state legislatures, the Congress of the United States in 1937 enacted a similar statute, commonly referred to as the Miller-Tydings Act, by way of amendment to the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, declaring in effect that the fixing by agreements of the minimum resale price of such commodities shall not be deemed unlawful by reason of any thing contained in the Sherman Act, whenever such agreements are lawful where the resale is made." 52 Am. Jur.—Trademarks, Tradenames, etc., Sec. 177—p. 649.

The statute relative to price fixing by producers and distributors are applicable only to the commodity as it flows into commerce from producer or distributor to the ultimate consumer through the retailer, and do not relate to cross-agreements between producers or distributors of commodities.

> "The statute does not legalize horizontal price-fixing agreements entered into between the same class of persons, such as between manufacturers, or between wholesalers or under state and Federal anti-trust acts. The only resale price maintenance permitted by the act is vertical, that is, by agreements entered into between a producer or manufacturer or wholesaler on the one hand and the retailer or other intermediate handler in a straight vertical line on the other. The law does not authorize cross-agreements between competitors, and whatever agreements are permitted all face one way." Ib.—Sec. 180—p. 651.

The agreements made unlawful and above referred to are termed "horizontal" agreemental agreements, but "vertical" agreements by the producer or distributor, or as by him authorized for "price fixing," are made lawful, and also the sale below the stipulated price is termed "unfair competition" and actionable. See Chapter 541, F. S. 1941, F. S. A.

The true legislative intent and purpose of Chapter 541, F. S. 1941, F. S. A., was to permit price fixing by the producers and distributors of the identified commodities, as follows:

Section 541.03 supra, provides that contracts relating to sale or resale of the identified goods shall not be "deemed in violation of any laws" by reason of any provision:

> "(1) That the buyer will not resell * * * at less than the minimum price stipulated by the seller.
> (2) That the buyer will require of any dealer to whom he may resell * * * that he will not, in turn, resell at less than the minimum price stipulated by the seller.
> (3) That the seller will not sell such commodity:
> (a) To any wholesaler, unless such wholesaler will agree not to resell the same to any retailer unless the retailer will in turn agree not to resell the same except to consumers for use and at not less than the stipulated minimum price, and such wholesaler will likewise agree not to resell the same to any other wholesaler unless such other wholesaler will make the same agreement with any wholesaler or retailer to whom he may resell; or
> (b) To any retailer, unless the retailer will agree not to resell the same except to consumers for use and not less than the stipulated minimum price.

Section 541.04 prescribes that "for the purpose of preventing evasion of the resale price restrictions imposed" by contract certain specified acts "shall be a violation of such resale price restrictions."

Section 541.05 specified that "no minimum resale price" shall be established except by "the owner of the trademark, brand or name used" or by an "authorized distributor especially authorized to establish said price by the owner of trademark, brand or name."

Section 541.07 prescribes that it "is unfair competition" for anyone wilfully and knowingly to advertise for sale or to sell such identified goods "at less than the price stipulated in any" (price fixing) contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of this chapter "whether the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, and whether the particular lot of such commodity so advertised, offered for sale or sold, was or was not at any time sold to a party to a contract that stipulated the price of such commodity."

Statutes relating to and prohibiting sales of commodities below cost in certain cases have been enacted and entitled: "Unfair Sales Act," "Unfair Practice Act," and "Fair Sales Act," but we are not now concerned with such a regulation of competition.

The U. S. Supreme Court, in reviewing in the Dearborn-Seagram case a decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois upholding the validity of a similar act under the circumstances then presented, in conclusion stated:

> "But it is unnecessary to pursue the subject further; for since the sole purpose of the present law is to afford a legitimate remedy for an injury to the good will which results from the use of trademarks, brands or names, it is obvious that its provisions would be wholly inapplicable to goods which are unmarked." (Italics supplied.) Old Dearborn Co. v. Seagram Corp., 299 U. S. 183, 198, 57 Sup. Ct., 139 81 L. Ed. 109, 106 ALR 1476.

And observed, as to relief by the U. S. Supreme Court, that:

> "There is a great body of fact and opinion tending to show that price cutting by retail dealers is not only injurious to the good will and business of the producer and distributor of identified goods, but injurious to the general public as well. The evidence to that effect is voluminous; but it would serve no useful purpose to review the evidence or to enlarge further upon the subject. True, there is evidence, opinion and argument to the contrary; but it does not concern us to determine where the weight lies. We need say no more than that the question may be regarded as fairly open to differences of opinion. The legislation here in question proceeds upon the former and not the latter view; and the legislative determination in that respect, in the circumstances here disclosed, is conclusive so far as this court is concerned." (Italics supplied.) Ib., Text 195-6.

And thereby gave weight to the statement found in American Jurisprudence as follows:

"It has also stated that the action of a State legislature in enacting a police regulation attacked as unreasonable, and of the highest court upholding its validity, indicates the existence of evils for which it is an apparent appropriate remedy." 11 Am. Jur., p. 1080, Sec. 304, citing O'Gorman v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 282 U. S. 251, 75 L. Ed. 324. 51 S. Ct. 120, 72 ALR 1163.

Public policy of Florida in re price-fixing. Agreements and contracts tending to fix prices and restrain trade have been unlawful in this State since it became a state. At present Sections 542.01-542.11, F. S. 1941, F. S. A., provide that combinations, confederations and agreements to fix or maintain prices of commodities tending to preclude free and unrestricted competition in the sale of such commodities are made criminal offenses and such agreements are declared invalid and offending the public policy of the sovereign State of Florida, and that the offenders should be subject to fine and imprisonment.

It is further provided by law that:

"Any contract or agreement in violation of the provisions of this chapter shall be void and not enforceable either in law or equity." Section 542.10, F. S. 1941, F. S. A.

The foregoing statute governing intrastate commerce of Florida corresponds to the Sherman Anti-Trust Acts of the Federal Statutes, relating to interstate commerce.

Unfair discrimination has been prohibited in this State since 1915, and the present provisions are:

540.01—Unfair discrimination and competition prohibited. "Any person doing business in the State of Florida, and engaged in the production, manufacture, sale or distribution of any commodity in general use, that shall, for the purpose of destroying the business of a competitor in any locality, discriminate between different sections, communities, or cities of this state by selling such commodity. at a lower rate in one section, community or city, than is charged for said commodity by said party in another section, community or city, after making due allowance for the difference, if any, in the grade or quality and in the actual cost of transportation from the point of production, if a raw product, or from the point of manufacture, if a manufactured product, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination, which is declared unlawful." Sec. 540.01, F. S. 1941, F. S. A.

540.06—Unfair commercial discrimination prohibited; penalty. "Any person, firm, company, association or corporation violating any of the provisions of Section 540.01, and any officer, agent or receiver of any firm. company, association or corporation, or any member of the same, or any individual, found guilty of a violation thereof, shall be fined not more than five thousand dollars or be imprisoned in the county jail not to exceed one year." Sec. 540.06, F. S. 1941, F. S. A.

The foregoing sections of Ch. 540, F. S. 1941, F. S. A., relating to intrastate commerce of Florida, correspond to the Robinson-Patman Act of the Federal Statutes, relating to interstate commerce, as stated in American Jurisprudence, as follows:

"A Federal statute known as the Clayton Act, as amended in 1936 by an enactment known as the Robinson-Patman Act, prohibits discrimination between purchasers in respect of the price of commodities marketed through the channel of interstate or foreign commerce, where the effect of such discrimination would be to lessen, injure. or destroy competition or tend to create a monopoly." 52 Am. Jur. —Trademarks, Tradenames, etc., Sec. 175, p. 645.

To hold Ch. 541, F. S. 1941, F. S. A., valid would be to say to the petitioners that horizontal agreements and contracts fixing prices or tending to stifle competition are void, as against public policy, and bind no one, and that those who execute them may be prosecuted criminally and subjected to fine or imprisonment and, if a foreign corporation, denied the right to do business in this State or, if a domestic corporation, charter forfeited; however, in respect to the same commodities, that vertical contracts or agreements fixing prices or tending to stifle competition are not only valid and binding on the parties who execute the contract and also upon all who are advised or informed as to the price fixed by the producer or distributor; and, furthermore. he who stifles competition by vertical price fixing may procure the courts to aid him in doing so.

Chapter 541, F. S. 1941, F. S. A., purports to authorize price fixing in the vertical plane of branded or trademarked goods by producers or distributors, but all price fixing of commodities in the horizontal plane is illegal and criminal. See Ch. 542, F. S. 1941, F. S. A.

Section 541.07, supra, specifies that it shall be unfair competition for the retailer-vendee to sell the identified goods for less than the prices fixed by the distributor-vendor when the retailer in fact is not a competitor of the producer or distributor, but his patron, either directly or indirectly, and, according to the bill of complaint, the plaintiff is not suffering from any competition between it and the retailer but only because the retailers are in competition between themselves as to a commodity which it once owned and as to a commodity in which it now has no property interest.

It is true that the commodity in question may bear the trademark, brand or trade name of the plaintiff and it is recognized that trademarks, trade names and brand are utilized to promote good will for the purpose of inducing sales, but once the product is sold, with the trade name. trademark or brand on the commodity, then the purchaser becomes the owner of the commodity with the trademark, trade name or brand attached and a part of it, and the producer or distributor no longer retains what he has sold, and the purchaser is entitled to what he has bought, to be dealt with by him as granted by Sections 1 and 12 of the Declaration of Rights of the Florida Constitution, subject only to the proper exercise of the State and Federal police power in the protection of the property right which the owner of a trademark, trade name or brand may have in or franchises, or privileges, otherwise conferred by law.

The Supreme Court of the United States recognized that vertical price control was in restraint of trade, as re-stated in the headnote, as follows:

> "A system of contracts between manufacturers and wholesale and retail merchants by which the manufacturers attempt to control not merely the prices at which its agents may sell its products, but the prices for all sales by all dealers at wholesale or retail whether purchasers or subpurchasers, eliminating all competition and fixing the amount which the consumer shall pay, amounts to restraint of trade. * * *" Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U. S. 373, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502.

And in reference to the effect as a restraint of trade the opinion by Chief Justice Hughes stated:

> "But agreements or combinations between dealers, having for their sole purpose the destruction of competition and the fixing of prices, are injurious to the public interest and void. They are not saved by the advantages which the participants expect to derive from the enhanced price to the consumer. * * *
> "The complainant's plan falls within the principle which condemns contracts of this class. It, in effect, creates a combination for the prohibited purposes. No distinction can properly be made by reason of the particular character of the commodity in question. It is not entitled to special privilege or immunity. It is an article of commerce and the rules concerning the freedom of trade must be held to apply to it. Nor does the fact that the margin of freedom is reduced by the control of production make the protection of what remains, in such a case, negligible matter. And where commodities have passed into the channels of trade and are owned by dealers, the validity of agreements to prevent competition and to maintain prices is not to be determined by the circumstance whether they were produced by several manufacturers or by one, or whether they were previously owned by one or by many. The complainant having sold its product at prices satisfactory to itself, the public is entitled to whatever advantage may be derived from competition in the subsequent traffic." (Italics supplied.) Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., supra, text 408-9.

Justice Hughes further stated in the Dr. Miles Medical Co. case that:

> "The essential features of such a system are thus described by Mr. Justice Lurton (then Circuit Judge), in the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Samuel B. Hartman, 153 Fed. Rep. 24, 42: 'The contracting wholesalers or jobbers covenant that they will sell to no one who does not come with complainant's license to buy, and that they will not sell below a minimum price dictated by complainant. Next, all competition between retailers is destroyed, for each such retailer can obtain his supply only by signing one of the uniform contracts prepared for retailers, whereby he covenants not to sell at less than a standard price named in the agreement. Thus all room for competition between retailers, who supply the public, is made impossible. If these contracts leave any room at any point of the line for the usual play of competition between the dealers in the product marketed by complainant, it is not discoverable. Thus a combination between the manufacturer, the wholesalers and the retailers to maintain prices and stifle competition has been brought about.'" Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., supra, text 399-400.

The vertical price fixing by the distributor, arrived at by contract and independent of any statute dealt with by the Dr. Miles-Park case, was condemned because such acts stifled competition and thereby were injurious to the public interest and void.

With the aid of Ch. 541, F. S. 1941, F. S. A., there would be little or no difference in the ultimate effect upon the public under the Dr. Miles-Park contract and under the distiller's contract; the effect upon the public of price fixing agreements is the same whether they be with or without the aid of a statute.

The Florida Fair Trade Act provides, Sec. 541.03, F. S. 1941, F. S. A.:

> "No contract relating to the sale or resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trademark, brand, or name of the producer or distributor of such commodity and which commodity is in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced or distributed by others shall be deemed in violation of any law of the State of Florida by reason of any of the following provisions which may be contained in such contract;" (Italics supplied.)

In the case of Scarborough v. Webb's Cut Rate Drug Co., 150 Fla. 754, 8 So. (2d) 913, we said that price fixing may be sustained on the following basis:

> "So far as we have been able to find, no statute has been upheld which attempted to compel the producer of a trademarked commodity to enter into contracts with retailers fixing prices. Nor do we think that such provision could be upheld because it is contrary to the due process and equal protection clause of both State and Federal Constitutions. Const. Fla. Declaration of Rights, 1, 12; Const. U. S. Amend. 14. This is not all. Price fixing Acts have been upheld only upon the theory that such may be resorted to protect the interest of the public and to prevent destroying competition in businesses or vocations, the success of which is materially affected with public interest. * * * (Italics supplied.)

The purpose of such price fixing then was to prevent ruinous competition. Price fixing is legal when it is to the public interest and is accomplished by lawful means. Such competition can exist only in times of over-production, resulting in cut-throat competition for the available potential markets. It was not contemplated by the Legislature of 1939 that this Act would operate in periods of scarcity of consumer goods when there were not enough consumer goods to satisfy the demands of the public, with the same effect as in periods of over-production and abundance.

It is well recognized that a law under one state of facts may be reasonable but under another state of facts may be unreasonable. The public need of the Unfair Competition Acts during the early and middle '30s reflects reasonableness, and they do not appear so unreasonable for those times. These so-called Fair Competition Acts were enacted during the '30s and began in California in 1931, during a period when the entire United States was undergoing one of the most severe and prolonged depressions that the country had ever experienced, with a deflated currency as relating to purchasing power; when the inventories of the wholesale and retail merchants were high; the factories were idle, and unemployment of labor was great; and when credit policies had become restricted, all of which has resulted in an economy of abundance of goods and an economy of scarcity as to purchasing power; with many bankruptcies occurring and with business generally operating with a fear of bankruptcy and with the banking situation becoming so serious that the President closed all of the banks in one day and allowed only the reopening of such banks as were liquid enough to withstand runs. Conditions then were such that, in order to remedy the imbalance between commodities and purchasing power, pigs were killed and cotton and corn were plowed under; that grain was at times used by the producers for fuel instead of being sold at the market price. It was a time when the maxim that "competition is the life of trade" had been supplanted by the term "ruinous competition" because of the general down-trend of prices, which was resulting in retail sales below cost.

"In a recent case the U. S. Supreme Court has held that the reasonableness of the exercise of the police power of the state must be considered in the light of the current economic conditions." 11 Am. Jur. 1080, citing West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish (1936), 300 U. S. 379, 81 L. Ed. 703, 57 Sup. Ct. 578. 108 A. L. R. 1330.

In the Parrish case, supra, the U. S. Supreme Court (per Justice Hughes) stated:

"We may take judicial notice of the unparalleled demands for relief which arose during the recent period of depression and still continue to an alarming extent despite the degree of economic recovery which has been achieved. It is unnecessary to cite official statistics to establish what is of common knowledge through the length and breadth of the land. While in the instant case no factual brief has been presented, there is no reason to doubt that the State of Washington has encountered the same social problem that is present elsewhere."

The Florida Fair Trade Act wisely provided that before anyone could enforce that Act as against another, certain conditions must exist. Those conditions are: (1) There must be competition between producers or manufacturers of the same general commodity; and (2) that competition must be free and open.

The present conditions are now somewhat reversed as to those of 1939 and most of the preceding ten years. We now have a dearth of goods where we had an abundance in the '30s; and we have money without purchasing power. where money had a high purchasing power during the '30s. As under those conditions the fixing of a minimum sales price was considered within the police power of the State, the fixing of maximum sales price might now be considered within the police power, e. g., OPA.

It is common knowledge that the world in 1945 emerged from a long drawn-out conflict, resulting in acute shortages in many items of commerce. The demand for some of those items has not yet been saturated by over-supply. So long as the prerequisite conditions of free and open competition as to the particular commodity do not exist, any contract attempted to be made under the provisions of the Fair Trade Act is void, as being contrary to public policy. It cannot be successfully contended that competition exists in a particular product when there has been a shortage of that product over a period of years and that shortage has not yet been overcome. It is not in the public interest that the Florida Fair Trade Act should be enforced on behalf of any manufacturer of a product in which there is no competition or in which the competition is not free and open as to price.

Those who attempt to enforce the provisions of this or any other Act of the Legislature must allege and prove that all prerequisite conditions have been complied with or that these conditions exist for the effective operation of the state. It becomes necessary therefore for plaintiff to allege and prove not only that there was a contract but also, as to the commodity in question, that there was free and open competition. That is a factual element that must be established before the contract may become effective, and before it may be enforced.

A producer or distributor may, by price fixing to remove competition between retailers as to "price" of a commodity, effectively remove such commodity from the status of "free and open" competition of the market as to market price. Under present conditions, contracts fixing a minimum sales price of commodities involved in the vertical or horizontal plane would be considered as a restraint upon free and open competition unless the contrary is shown.

Relative to classification. the U. S. Supreme Court, in the Hartford-Harrison case, held that a statutory discrimination between the mutual companies and the stock companies which write fire, casualty, etc., insurance in the State, forbidding stock companies to act through agents who are their salaried employees but permitting this to mutual companies, is repugnant to the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. and that:

"The applicable principle in respect of classification has often been announced. It will suffice to quote a paragraph from Louisville Gas & Electric Co. v. Coleman, 277, U. S. 32, 37, 38.

"'. . . it may be said generally that the equal protection clause means that the rights of all persons must rest upon the same rule under similar circumstances . . . and that it applies to the exercise of all the powers of the state which can effect the individual or his property, including the power of taxation . . . It does not, however, forbid classification; and the power of the state to classify for purposes of taxation is of wide range and flexibility, provided always, that the classification "must be reasonable, not arbitrary, and must rest upon some ground of difference having a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation, so that all persons similarly circumstanced shall be treated alike." . . . That is to say, mere differences is not enough; the attempted classification "must always rest upon some difference which bears a reasonable and just relation to the act in respect to which the classification is proposed, and can never be made arbitrarily and without any such basis." Discriminations of an unusual character especially suggest careful consideration to determine whether they are obnoxious to the constitutional provision.'

"Despite the broad range of the State's discretion, it has a limit which must be maintained if the constitutional safeguard is not to be overthrown. Discriminations are not to be supported by mere fanciful conjecture. Borden's Co. v. Baldwin, 293 U. S. 194, 209. They cannot stand as reasonable if they offend the plain standards of common sense." Hartford Co. v. Harrison, 301 U. S. 459, 461-2.

The validity of legislative classification depends upon the object and purpose of the law and the legal effect thereof according to the circumstances:

"When the classification made by the legislature is called in question, if any state of facts reasonably can be conceived that would sustain it, there is a presumption of the existence of that state of facts, and one who assails the classification must carry the burden of showing by a resort to common knowledge or other matters which may be judicially noticed, or to other legitimate proof, that the action is arbitrary. * * * The principle that the State has a broad discretion in classification, in the exercise of its power of regulation, is constantly recognized by this Court. Still, the statute may show on its face that the classification is arbitrary (Smith v. Cahoon, 283 U. S. 553, 567) or that may appear by facts admitted or proved, * * * Or, after a full showing of facts, or opportunity to show them, it may be found that the burden of establishing that the classification is without rational basis has not been sustained. * * * But where the legislative action is suitably challenged, and a rational basis for it is predicated upon the particular economic facts of a given trade or industry, which are outside the sphere of judicial notice, these facts are properly the subject of evidence and of findings." Borden's Co. v. Baldwin, 293 U. S. 194, 209-10, 55 Sup. Ct. 187, 79 L. Ed. 281.

This Court has held that the provision that all men are "equal before the law" has been generally interpreted to mean that:

". . . the rights of all persons must rest upon the same rule under similar circumstances and that it applies to the exercise of all the powers of the state which can affect the individual or his property including the power of taxation. It does not however forbid classification and the power of the State to classify for purposes of taxation is of wide range and flexibility, provided always that the classification must be reasonable, not arbitrary, and must rest upon some ground of difference having a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation, so that all persons similarly circumstanced shall be treated alike. Mere difference is not enough; the attempted classification must rest upon some difference which bears a reasonable and just relation to the Act in respect to which the classification is proposed and can never be made arbitrarily and without any such basis." State, ex rel. v. Knott, 135 Fla. 206, 211-13, 184 So. 752.

To be "equal before the law" does not preclude the state from resorting to classification, provided the classification is reasonable, not arbitrary, and rests on some ground of difference having a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation. The classification, in order to avoid the constitutional mandate, must be founded upon pertinent and rational basis and not upon a capricious and unreasonable basis.

A state may not prohibit and make punishable those who enter into agreements in restraint of trade or which tend to restrict competition and then great immunity to a class consisting of those who enter into vertical contracts and agreements having the same obnoxious impact upon the public interest. It is the effect of the contract or agreement that is to be considered.

When it is determined that contracts in restraint of trade are injurious and offensive to an interest which the state is entitled to protect, and legislation is enacted to protect that interest, then special privileges or immunities cannot be granted unless the granting of such special privileges and immunities is to serve the public interest or purpose as distinguished from a private interest or purpose.

The special privileges and immunities granted plaintiff-respondent by Ch. 541, supra, under present economic conditions and statutory laws serve a private interest and contravene the constitutional guaranties.

Sections 1 and 2 of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of Florida (as well as the Fourteenth Amendment to the U. S. Constitution) require that all shall stand "equal before the law" and that "no person shall * * * be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken without just compensation." It seems obvious that such arbitrary selections for legislative favor as are contained in the Fair Trade Act were precisely what the constitutional provisions were designed to prevent.

The legislature has designated selling below the fixed price to be "unfair competition" (Sec. 541.07) for anyone, whether the person "selling is or is not a party to such contract" * * * and "actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby."

"Equity regards substance rather than form." The mere designation of an act as "unfair competition" does not preclude judicial appraisal, and courts of equity will not be misled by mere devices or baffled by mere forms, but they will disregard names and penetrate disguises of form to discover the substance of an act or transaction. The bill fails to set forth facts sufficient to show unfair competition in fact.

For a court of equity to entertain plaintiff-respondent's bill would be to uphold and honor the special privileges and immunities attempted to be conferred by the statute when generally other acts of like force and effect are proscribed and made penal.

The writ of certiorari should issue and the order of the chancellor should be quashed.

HOBSON, J., concurring specially: It is my view that legislation of the type under consideration here (which is essentially price fixing of the worst character, i. e. the fixing of a minimum price floor as distinguished from a maximum price ceiling without a yardstick for the establishment of such minimum prices or any provision for public notice or hearing) may be valid but it is so only when emergencies which threaten the general welfare require its enactment. Such condition should be real and not fanciful. Resort to the drastic expedient of invoking the police power of a sovereign state by the passage of legislation of this character should not be permitted in the absence of concrete evidence of public necessity.

Some of the situations which the writer can now envisage which may give rise to valid legislation of this class are the exigencies of war or threats of economic chaos. It is true that courts of last resort in several states and the Supreme Court of the United States have upheld acts similar to this so-called Fair Trade Act. The fact that those laws were either enacted at a time when we were experiencing a depression national in its scope or were challenged when such was our economic status, is worthy of serious consideration in connection with the present litigation.

If not actually essential, by far the better procedure and that fraught with less danger of non-essential invasion of constitutional rights of the consumer and the retail merchant would be the finding as a predicate for such legislation that extremities requiring it exist as a matter of fact. If well founded this would assure validity at the time of its enactment but would not necessarily guarantee its permanency as valid legislation. The basis for such law actually should be present not only at the time of its passage but the law should exist only so long as the situation which gave rise to it continues. The duration of its existence should be from one legislative session to the next, at which time the law could be re-enacted if the necessity for it should still subsist. Without appropriate predicate, legislation of this kind is unconstitutional from its inception and absent a limitation on its life span it could become so by virtue of changed or improved conditions.

[Validity of Legislation Rests on General Welfare]

The validity of such legislation can be founded only upon, what was termed in the ancient days of the Roman Empire, the summum bonum—the greatest good for the greatest number—and what we now call general welfare. It is solely upon such premise that a legislative enactment, which is flagrantly violative of the established law of contracts, which destroys initiative on the part of the retail merchant and affects adversely the economic life of the common man and which portrays monopolistic, if indeed they are not communistic, tendencies, can be sustained. Under normal conditions such legislation is not consonant with our philosophy and fundamental principles. It is not truly a "Fair" Trade Act so far as its effect upon the consuming public is concerned, but actually it is "unfair" and unconstitutional.

It is the failure to first investigate and make a determination of public necessity which causes such legislation to be fraught with shocking possibilities. An act of this type must be subjected to close scrutiny with respect to its constitutionality. Its genesis must find justification in, and its life depend upon, public necessity. By this I mean that the subject of the act and the purposes to be accomplished by it should bear, in a vital and practical sense, a reasonable relationship to the public health, safety, morals or similar element which is fundamentally and essentially a component part of the general welfare. Otherwise, a law of this nature not only offends certain of our constitutional provisions but it is also inimicable to some of our elementary democratic principles. It stifles individual initiative and allows no premium upon the personal ingenuity and efforts of the successful merchant—as distinguished from the lethargy of the mediocre—and sometimes, as here, it violates the basic law of contracts.

The very technical and finespun theory of vertical contracts as distinguished from those which are horizontal does not appeal to, satisfy nor indeed protect the average citizen. He does not appreciate nor understand why the interest of the consuming public, which group is comprised of a vast majority of our people, should be subservient to the property right of the individual owner of a trade-name, mark or brand. It appears to the writer that his reasoning is sound. Admitting the existence of such property right the welfare of the "greatest number" should take precedence over that of a favored few if a choice must be made which will invade or infringe the constitutional guaranties of either group. The average citizen of whom I speak, the common man, if you please, believes in free enterprise and that the principles of supply and demand and of building a "better mouse-trap" have contributed in no small measure to making this Nation great.

[Act Only Constitutional in Extreme Situations]

If we are to have a "controlled economy" there may be a place for laws of the type here under consideration. But as I understand a "controlled economy" it should not exist absent emergencies which require it in the interest of the general welfare. In any event, a law which provides for the fixing of minimum prices should contain a yardstick as a guide for the establishment of such ground level prices.

The power to determine those prices should not be left to the unleashed discretion of the trade-name owner but should be confined within impregnable specified boundaries. A definite measuring stick should be set forth in the body of the act. This statute contains no such rule. No checkrein is included therein. The unrestrained whim or fancy of the trade-mark owner is the only criterion. There is no provision for the public to be heard or the public interests to be considered much less protected.

The law is not aimed directly at the "loss leader" problem. It goes far beyond such point. As I comprehend the expression "loss leader" it means that a retail merchant may advertise a well known trademarked article for sale at less than cost to entice patrons to his establishment who, while there, might purchase other merchandise upon which the retailer makes a profit and thereby more than overcomes his loss. If this or any such law should, by its express terms, only prohibit the "loss leader" practice it might be less offensive. We are not now confronted by such an act.

According to one of the parables contained in Holy Writ, a vineyard owner hired some laborers early in the morning at a penny a day. Others were employed, and came to work, later. At the end of the day the employer paid all of them the same wage. He was severely criticized. The answer which he gave was: "Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil because I am good?" Matthew 20:15. This philosophy is currently as fundamentally sound as it was in Biblical days. But it is suggested a trademarked article does not actually or in every sense belong to the retailer who purchases it for resale because the trade-mark owner has a property right in the trade-mark and the good will, which may attach thereto, is his.

Let it be granted, as it should and must be, that our Constitutions do expressly provide protection to the property rights of every individual, just how far does such protection, as intended by the Constitution of Florida, extend? Is the theoretical protection provided by this act really contemplated by our constitutional guaranties? What is, or should be construed to be, the scope of the protection which is provided by our constitution to the property rights of the individual? Is such protection a shield or is it a sword which can be used to pierce and draw the life blood from the same constitutional rights of others who constitute by far the greater number of our citizens? It is my opinion that it should become a sword only in the event it is essential to the survival of the economic life of this body of free people. Laws of this character should not be passed under the pretense of protection to the property rights of the individual trade-name owner or in the alleged interest of the general welfare unless such protection is necessary or the general welfare really requires their enactment.

The owner of a trade-name, mark or brand does not need such protection—particularly when it transgresses the rights of others—because he has it within his power to protect himself. He need not furnish his product to the retailer who refuses to agree to his minimum resale price.

Why should we have protection, which he does not need, at the expense of the consumer? The statement was once made and it is profound that "When reason and the law part there is no law". When I contemplate the means employed by many selfish interests to bring about the ends which they desire my mind reverts to Cicero's outburst in one of his orations against Caliline when he said: "To what length will thou abuse my patience; to what extent wilt thy unbridled audacity affront itself?"

Such legislation is constitutional and can be constitutional only in extreme situations wherein our economic structure is seriously endangered. In some periods through which this Nation has passed no one should have questioned the propriety of such drastic measures for blood transfusions probably were essential to the preservation of a healthy body politic. It is another thing, however, to foist such legislation upon the general public in normal times under the guise of ultimate protection and benefit to the public when exigencies which might demand it are nonexistent.

It is my conclusion that the enactment of this law, which contains a provision for the fixing of minimum resale prices and provides that parties not parties to a contract must nevertheless be bound by such contract, was an unwarranted, unreasonable and arbitrary exercise of legislative power and should be declared invalid.

CHAPMAN, J., Dissenting: Challenged on this appeal on various grounds is the constitutionality of Florida's "fair trade law" authorizing contracts establishing resale prices on commodities bearing "trade-marks, names or brands", which is Chapter 19201, Acts of 1939, Laws of Florida, or Sections 541.01 to 541.08, inclusive, F. S. A.

The Act is viz:

"541.01. Short Title of Chapter.—This chapter may be known and cited as the 'Florida fair trade law'.

541.02. Definition of Terms Used in Chapter.—The following terms, as used in this chapter, are defined as follows:

(1) 'Commodity' means any subject of commerce.

(2) 'Producer' means any grower, baker, maker, manufacturer, bottler, packer, converter, processor or publisher.

(3) 'Wholesaler' means any person selling a commodity, other than a producer or retailer.

(4) 'Retailer' means any person selling a commodity to consumers for use.

541.03. Contract May Govern Price of Sale or Resale.—No contract relating to the sale or resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trade-mark, brand, or name of the producer or distributor of such commodity and which commodity is in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced and distributed by others shall be deemed in violation of any law of the State of Florida by reason of any of the following provisions which may be contained in such contract:

(1) That the buyer will not resell such commodity at less than the minimum price stipulated by the seller.

(2) That the buyer will require of any dealer to whom he may resell such commodity an agreement that he will not, in turn, resell at less than the minimum price stipulated by the seller.

(3) That the seller will not sell such commodity:

(a) To any wholesaler, unless such wholesaler will agree not to resell the same to any retailer unless the retailer will in turn agree not to resell the same except to consumers for use and at not less than the stipulated minimum price, and such wholesaler will likewise agree not to resell the same to any other wholesaler unless such other wholesaler will make the same agreement with any wholesaler or retailer to whom he may resell; or

(b) To any retailer, unless the retailer will agree not to resell the same except to consumers for use and at not less than the stipulated minimum price.

541.04. Inducements to Evade Contract Restrictions Prohibited.—For the purpose of preventing evasion of the resale price restrictions imposed in respect of any commodity by any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of this chapter (except to the extent authorized by said contract):

(1) The offering or giving of any article of value in connection with the sale of such commodity.

(2) The offering or the making of any concession of any kind whatsoever (whether by the giving of coupons or otherwise) in connection with any such sale; or

(3) The sale or offering for sale of such commodity in combination with any other commodity, shall be a violation of such resale price restrictions, for which the remedies prescribed by Sec. 541.07 shall be available.

541.05. Owner Alone May Establish Resale Price.—No minimum resale price shall be established for any commodity, under any contract entered into pursuant to the provision of this chapter, by any person other than the owner of the trademark, brand or name used in connection with such commodity or distributor specifically authorized to establish said price by the owner of such trade-mark, brand or name.

541.06. Exceptions.—No contract containing any of the provisions enumerated in Sec. 541.03 shall preclude the resale of any commodity covered thereby without reference to such contract in the following cases:

(1) In closing out the owner's stock for the bona fide purpose of discontinuing dealing in any such commodity and when plain notice of the fact is given to the public; provided the owner of such stock shall give to the producer or distributor of such commodity prompt and reasonable notice in writing of his intention to close out said stock, and an opportunity to purchase such stock at the original invoice price.

(2) When the goods are altered, secondhand, damaged, defaced or deteriorated and plain notice of the fact is given to the public in the advertisement and sale thereof, such notice to be conspicuously displayed in all advertisements and to be affixed to the commodity;

(3) By any officer acting under an order of court.

541.07. Suit at Law for Violation of Chapter.—Willfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of this chapter, whether the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, and whether the particular lot of such commodity so advertised, offered for sale or sold, was or was not at any time sold to a party to a contract that stipulated the price of such commodity under the provisions of this chapter is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby.

541.08. Law Not Applicable to Certain Contracts.—This chapter shall not apply to any contract or agreement between or among producers or distributors or (except as provided in subsection (3) of Sec. 541.03) between or among wholesalers, or between or among retailers, as to sale or resale prices."

The bill of complaint alleged, in substance, that the Continental Distilling Corporation was engaged in the business of distilling and selling intoxicating liquors in the State of Florida and other States of the Union, and one of its products was trademarked as "Philadelphia Blended Whiskey". It is alleged further that in the conduct of its business, the plaintiff under the provisions of the aforesaid Act entered into two contracts with certain retailers in Jacksonville, Florida, by the terms whereof the trade-marked product of the plaintiff known as "Philadelphia Blended Whiskey" should be retailed in the State of Florida at the price of $4.10 per one-fifth gallon. The plaintiff alleged that it notified the Liquor Stores, Inc., of the execution and existence of the two contracts wherein the retail price of the trade-marked product "Philadelphia Blended Whiskey" was fixed at $4.10 per one-fifth gallon, but the defendant Liquor Stores, Inc., continued to advertise and sell the trade-marked whiskey supra at $3.49, being a sum less than $4.10 per one-fifth gallon, contrary to the two retail contracts which fixed the retail price under the "fair trade law".

One of the petitioners here applied for and, by appropriate order, was permitted or allowed to file in the court below such a pleading in the cause as any other defendant and pursuant thereto the Webb's City, Inc., filed an answer to the bill of complaint and also a motion to dismiss on several grounds. Likewise the Liquor Stores, Inc., filed a motion to dismiss and the cause was heard by the Chancellor below on the motions of the defendant to dismiss directed to the bill of complaint. Extensive and able arguments were presented to the Chancellor on the issues made by the pleadings and thereafter an order was entered overruling the motions to dismiss and the effect thereof was to sustain the constitutionality of Sections 541.01 to 541.08, inclusive, F. S. A.

The questions posed here for adjudication are viz:

1. Where the Legislature enacts a law in the exercise of its police power, in order to be valid and constitutional, must not such statute bear a reasonable or rational relation to the protection of the public health, morals, safety or welfare?

2. Where, in the exercise of its police power, the Legislature enacts a law which authorizes arbitrary individual restraint over ordinary articles of commerce and trade, including all necessities of life, is not such statute detrimental to the public welfare, and therefore, outside and beyond the power of the Legislature to enact?

3. Is Chapter 541, F. S. A., and more particularly Sections 541.03 and 541.07 violative of and repugnant to Sections 1 and 12 of the Declaration of Rights of the Constitution of Florida?

4. Is Chapter 541, F. S. A., and more particularly Sections 541.03 and 541.07 violative of and repugnant to Section 1, Article III, of the Constitution of Florida?

5. Is the "non-signer clause" provided for by Section 541.07, F. S. A., violative of and repugnant to the Miller-Tydings Amendment to the Federal Sherman Anti-Trust Act?

6. Is the Florida Fair Trade Act in violation of the Miller-Tydings Amendment to the Federal Sherman Anti-Trust Act relating to contracts between wholesalers and retailers?

7. Are the instruments attached to the bill of complaint and referred to as 'contracts' sufficient to support plaintiff's cause of action?

Attached to the bill of complaint and made a part thereof is a contract dated September 6, 1947, and signed by the Continental Distilling Corporation, called the "owner", and Avondale Liquor Wine Store, called the "retailer". One of the provisions thereof is that the contract "shall continue in full force and effect until terminated by either party after notice . . ., the retailer agrees not to sell or offer for sale in the State of Florida any beverages which bear, or the labels or containers of which bear, any trade-mark, brand name, insignia or the name of the said Continental Distilling Corporation, at other than the resale prices thereof to the consumers in Florida or at any other than the terms and conditions of such resales, from time to time designated by the owner, the owner shall have the right at all times, and from time to time revise or change any and all such retail prices, and terms and conditions of such resale, any such revision or change to become effective on such date as shall be specified by owner . . ." A price list of the plaintiff's whiskeys as agreed to by the parties is attached to the bill of complaint. A second contract of similar import signed by the plaintiff as owner and Barron's Bar of 382 Park Street, Jacksonville, Florida, as the retailer with price list attached is attached to and made a part of the bill of complaint.

It is contended under questions 1 and 2 supra that Florida's "fair trade law" cannot be sustained under the police power of the Florida Constitution. It is fundamental in statutory construction that the intent of the Legislature is to be found in the language of the Act and the intention sustained if found to be with the constitutional limitations, as courts have no power to legislate. Curry v. Lehman, 55 Fla. 847, 47 So. 18. The police power of a State embraces regulations designed to promote the public convenience or general prosperity or the public welfare. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Coachman, 59 Fla. 130, 52 So. 377, 20 Ann. Cas. 1047. It is argued that under the terms of the Act arbitrary power is granted to fix the minimum resale price "on all necessities of life". The answer to the contention is found in Section 541.03, F. S. A., and is viz.: "No contract relating to the sale or resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trade-mark, brand or name of the producer or distributor of such commodity and which commodity is in the free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced and distributed by others". It is to be observed that contracts are restricted to brands and trade-marked products then in free and open competition with similar products.

Whether a particular Act enacted under the police power for the purpose of regulating a business, trade or profession is valid depends on whether or not the legislation is addressed to a legitimate end. If the measure of regulation attempted to be undertaken is reasonable and appropriate to a legitimate end for the protection of a basic industry of society and is not a subterfuge in the form of law designed to bring about some unjust advantage to particular individuals to the prejudice of the general rights of others in the same calling similarly situated, the courts have no authority to declare the regulation prescribed invalid, although they may strongly disapprove of the wisdom or policy of the measure adopted or may deem the regulation prescribed foolish or unwise. State ex rel. Municipal Bond & Invest. Co. v. Knott, 114 Fla. 120, 154 So. 143.

The economic interest of a state may justify the exercise of its continuing and dominant protective police power for the promotion of the general welfare, notwithstanding interference with lawful callings and even contracts. See State ex rel. Municipal Bond & Invest. Co. v. Knott, supra. It is generally recognized that the police power is an inherent attribute of sovereignty and exists without any reservation in the Constitution, being founded on the duty of the state to protect its citizens and provide for the safety and good of society. Laws enacted under the police power of a sovereign state for the purpose of regulation may in some instances be harsh and oppressive without contravening constitutional limitations. The police power is no longer limited to measures designed to protect life, safety, health and the morals of the citizens, but extends to measures designed to promote the public convenience and general prosperity and includes economic measures regulating competition. Nebbia v. New York, 291 U. S. 502, 54 S. Ct. 505, 78 L. Ed. 940, 89 A. L. R. 1469.

Under questions 1 and 2 of petitioners' brief arguments are presented on certain facts set out in the answer of Webb's City, Inc., and the contention is made that the terms and provisions of the Act are arbitrary and unreasonable and have no reasonable relation to the public safety, welfare, morals or health of the people of the sovereign State of Florida and the Legislature was without constitutional authority to enact the "fair trade" Act. Counsel for respondent filed a motion to strike from petitioners' brief certain facts so set out in the answer and which were not considered by the court below at the time the challenged order was entered. This Court entered its order of denial prior to hearing oral arguments on the merits. It now appears by the record that the Chancellor below heard the cause and made its order on the respective motions to dismiss filed by Liquor Stores, Inc., and Webb's City, Inc., and the facts so set out were not considered. We fail to find merit in this assignment.

The next contention is that Sections 541.01 to 541.08, inclusive, supra, and particularly Sections 541.03 and 541.07 are in conflict with and in derogation of Sections 1 and 12 of the Declaration of Rights of the Constitution of Florida and each thereof is repugnant to and in violation of Section 1 of Article III of the Constitution of Florida.

Section 1 of the Declaration of Rights is viz.:

> "Section 1. Personal Rights.—All men are equal before the law, and have certain inalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing and protecting property, and pursuing happiness and obtaining safety."

Section 12 of the Declaration of Rights is viz.:

> "Sec. 12. Double Jeopardy; Compelling Testimony; Due Process of Law; Eminent Domain.—No person shall be subject to be twice put in jeopardy for the same offence, nor compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken without just compensation."

Section 1 of Article III of the Constitution is viz.:

"Section 1. Houses of Legislature; Meeting Place.—The Legislative authority of this State shall be vested in a Senate and House of Representatives, which shall be designated. The Legislature of the State of Florida and the sessions thereof shall be held at the seat of government of the State."

Arguments, in part, offered in support of this assignment are: (1) it deprives the retailers of the right to fix the prices of their commodities to the purchasing public; (2) the consuming public, by the terms of the Act, is deprived of the right to purchase the necessities at the lowest possible price; (3) the Act compels the purchasing public to pay prices fixed by the producer or manufacturer; (4) the Act authorizes arbitrary price levels fixed by the producer or manufacturer and in so doing confers legislative functions and destroys free and open competition; (5) minimum resale prices on articles are fixed without regard to cost or reasonableness and without any hearing; (6) the owner of labeled or branded articles may enter into a contract with a Florida retailer for the sale of the article at a fixed price and the contract becomes binding on all other retailers in Florida of the branded articles and this power infringes on the liberty of contract; (7) individual initiative is destroyed—approval is given to the lazy and unprogressive retailer—while the thrifty, alert and progressive retailer is penalized and the general public is deprived of cheaper prices and not benefited; (8) Section 541.07, F. S. A., authorizes a unilateral contract and the terms thereof made binding on all non-signers retailing the branded or trade-marked articles; (9) the provisions of the Act binding the non-signing retailer is unconstitutional; (10) the producer or manufacturer of trade-marked articles by the Act is permitted to determine what is in open and free competition, to the public detriment; (11) the Act grants to the producer of such articles delegated authority to fix the retail price thereof; (12) it is a price fixing Act and not a "fair trade" Act; (13) it is not in the interest of the public to fix the retail prices on branded articles but promotes the interest of the producer and manufacturer; (14) the Act is void because it fails to provide for a notice and hearing prior to fixing the retail price on the trade-marked article; (15) the Act discriminates between the retail signer of the retail contract and the non-signer, who is bound thereby under the terms of the Act. Authorities are cited to sustain many of the arguments supra.

It will be observed that the Act limits contracts to the sale or resale of commodities which bear, or the label or container of which bear trade-marks, brands or the name of producer or distributor of such commodities, which commodities are in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced and distributed by others. These contracts are authorized only between the producer or wholesaler and the retailer, provided the commodity is found in free and open competition with other commodities of the same general class. The act provides for vertical contracts only, as distinguished from horizontal ones, and competition in this manner is continuously maintained among the producers or wholesalers. Contracts cannot under the Act be lawfully made between producers of trade-marked articles.

Our study discloses that all the States of the Union since 1931, have adopted "fair trade acts", except the States of Vermont, Texas and Missouri. The courts of last resort of some fifteen States have sustained the respective Acts. Various questions were presented and argued before the courts of last resort where the respective Acts have been considered. It is difficult for us to close our eyes to rulings of courts of other jurisdictions when considering the merits of the arguments presented in the case at bar. The economic philosophy motivating the Florida Legislature in the enactment of the challenged Act is fully sustained as being within the police power of a sovereign state. Courts are not permitted to strike down a statute because it fails to square with their individual social or economic philosophies or theories, neither can we consider the question of public policy, wisdom or lack of wisdom or other motives which may address themselves to the legislative department of our government. The philosophy or predilection of Judges as to what the law should be in such instances is nothing more than an idle gesture.

The able arguments presented by counsel for petitioners in support of the unconstitutionality of the Act are fully answered by the following authorities: Seagram-Distillers

Corp. v. Old Dearborn Distilling Co., 363 Ill. 610, 2 N. E. (2d) 940; Joseph Triner Corp. v. McNeil, 363 Ill. 559, 2 N. E. (2d) 929, 104 A. L. R. 1435; Max Factor & Co. v. Kunsman, 5 Cal. The next contention is that Florida's "fair trade law" conflicts with and is in derogation of Section 1 of the Miller-Tydings Amendment of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. The pertinent portions thereof quoted in petitioners' brief are viz:

> "'Section 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal: Provided, that nothing herein contained shall render illegal, contracts or agreements prescribing minimum prices for the resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trade mark, brand or name of the producer or distributor of such commodity, and which is in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced or distributed by others, when contracts or agreements of that description are lawful as applied to intrastate transactions, under any statute, law, or public policy now or hereafter in effect in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in which such resale is to be made, or to which the commodity is to be transported for such resale, and the making of such contracts or agreements shall not be an unfair method of competition under section 5, as amended and supplemented, of the act entitled "An Act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties and for other purposes", approved September 26, 1914; Provided further, That the preceding proviso shall not make lawful any contract or agreement, providing for the establishment or maintenance of minimum resale prices on any commodity herein involved, between manufacturers, or between producers, or between wholesalers, or between brokers, or between factors, or between retailers or between persons, firms, or corporations in competition with each other.'"

Arguments in support of the above contention have been weighed and considered. It was clearly the intention of Congress by the enactment of the above Amendment to remove doubts and uncertainties as to the power of a sovereign state to enact "fair trade laws" when functioning under the police power of their respective constitutions. It is in the nature of a legislative interpretation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. See Schill v. Remington Putnam Book Co., 179 Md. 83, 17 A. (2d) 175; Pepsodent Co. v. Krauss and Ely Lilly & Co. v. Saunders, supra.

The seventh question posed here by petitioners' counsel is viz: "Are the instruments attached to the bill of complaint and referred to as 'contracts' sufficient to support plaintiff's cause of action?" After hearing arguments on the motions to dismiss addressed to the bill of complaint, it was the view of the Chancellor that the contracts, by appropriate allegations made a part of the bill, were prima facie sufficient on the then state of the pleadings. Emphasis, during the course of the oral arguments here, was placed on the illegality of the contracts because of the lack of a sufficient showing on both (a) lawful consideration, and (b) mutuality. The door on these two points was not forever closed against the petitioners by the entry of the challenged order. It is generally recognized under our system of government that the use of property and contractual agreements are usually matters of private concern, but the liberty of contract guaranteed by the Constitution is freedom from arbitrary restraints, and not immunity from reasonable regulation to safeguard the public interest by a sovereign state when legislating under its police power. Miller v. Wilson, 236 U. S. 373, 35 S. Ct. 242, 59 L. Ed. 628.

I would deny the petition for a writ of interlocutory certiorari.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil Action No. 49-358. April 1, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Baseball and Interstate Commerce—Purpose of Injunctive Relief—Injunction Denied. —The application of two professional baseball players for an injunction which would prohibit the Commissioner of Baseball from keeping them on an ineligible list, until final disposition of their claim for treble damages, was denied. The issuance of an injunction is almost prohibitive where it is not designed to preserve the position of the parties but rather seeks preliminarily the ultimate relief to which the party may be entitled. An injunction may not issue where the issues of law are doubtful and especially where the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the matter is unsettled. It was found that the plaintiff failed to show that irreparable damage would result if the relief was not allowed.

[Injunction Sought]

CONGER, J.: This is an application by the Plaintiffs, professional baseball players, for a preliminary injunction enjoining the Defendants and their respective agents, servants, officers and employees (1) from continuing the Plaintiffs on a list of suspended and ineligible players of "organized baseball"; (2) from in any manner directly or indirectly interfering with the Plaintiff's practice of their profession; (3) from refusing in good faith to negotiate with the Plaintiffs for their services; and (4) from demanding that the Plaintiffs sign contracts containing either a reserve or termination clause as a condition of their employment.

[Pleadings]

The complaint, filed in this Court on March 8, 1949, sets forth causes of action for injunctive relief and treble damages amounting to $1,000,000. and $1,500,000. respectively under the Sherman and Clayton Anti-Trust Act (15 U. S. C. A. Sections 1, 2, 3, 13 and 14).

In substance, the complaint alleges that the Plaintiffs, Martin and Lanier, were gainfully employed as professional baseball players from 1935 and 1933 respectively until 1946, for which employment they had prepared themselves.

[Nature of the Reserve Clause]

Each was employed either directly or indirectly by the Defendant St. Louis National League Baseball Club under a uniform contract for each season of employment, such contract containing both a "reserve clause" (whereby a player agrees not to contract with nor play for any other baseball club in "organized baseball" at the expiration of his contract, excepting an assignee of the contracting baseball club) and a clause permitting the employer to terminate such contract on ten days' notice. During the course of employment the Plaintiffs were transferred from city to city in various States without opportunity to bargain in the open market for their services, being precluded therefrom by the terms of the uniform contract.

[Violation of Reserve Clause]

The complaint further alleges that in May, 1946, the Plaintiffs were declared ineligible by the Commissioner of Baseball to play in "organized baseball" for a period of five years by reason of their alleged disregard of the Major League Agreement and Major League Rules and particularly for violating the "reserve clause" of their contracts and for engaging in competition with ineligible players. Subsequent to the Commissioner's declaration, the Plaintiffs sought to earn a livelihood by use of their professional ability but failed because the Commissioner, employing powers vested in him, persuaded, induced and coerced others to refrain from engaging in performances with them under threat of punitive measures.

[Allegation that Agreement between Baseball Clubs Constitute Conspiracy]

It is alleged that the Defendants, who are composed of the Commissioner of Baseball, the President of The National League of Professional Baseball Clubs, the President of the American League of Professional Baseball Clubs, the President of The National Association of Baseball Leagues, and sixteen corporate defendants who own and operate the baseball clubs comprising the Major Leagues, have by entering into the Major League Agreement, the Major-Minor League Agreement and the National Association Agreement and by their concert of action in adopting and enforcing said Agreements and the Rules concomitant therewith, engaged knowingly and continuously in an unlawful conspiracy to monopolize and restrain trade and commerce among the States in violation of the Sherman and Clayton Acts, and have by reason of such conspiracy and concerted action denied and continue to deny the Plaintiffs the opportunity to earn a livelihood in their profession.

According to the complaint, the so-called Major Leagues operate under the Major League Agreement, by the terms of which the office of the Commissioner of Baseball was created, and pursuant to which the Defendant Chandler was elected to such office.

[Disciplinary Power of Commissioner]

The complaint further avers that in addition to the Major Leagues, there are 59 Minor Leagues, so-called, comprised of more than 465 baseball clubs located in various cities in the United States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, Canada and Cuba, operating under The National Association Agreement and Rules adopted. The Major Leagues and the Minor Leagues constitute so-called "organized baseball." By the terms of the Major-Minor League Agreement, to which the Major Leagues and the National Association are parties, the office of Commissioner of Baseball is recognized by the Minor Leagues. Under the terms of the Major League Agreement and the Major-Minor League Agreement, the Commissioner is given absolute disciplinary power over all players and officials in the Leagues. He may investigate any actions considered detrimental to the best interests of baseball, punish for infractions and settle disputes between the Leagues, Clubs and Individuals.

It is alleged that The Major League Agreement, the Major-Minor League Agreement and the Rules adopted prohibit any other than the standard or uniform contract between clubs and players.

[Exclusive Aspects of Agreements]

Moreover, the various Agreements provide for territorial rights within which the clubs may transact business exclusively, and in addition, the clubs are granted exclusive areas in the media of radio and television to broadcast and telecast their performances. Such broadcasts and telecasts are heard and viewed by millions of people throughout the United States, by transmission across State lines. The broadcasts and telecasts are sponsored by corporations engaged in interstate and international commerce.

Furthermore, in fulfilling their schedules of games in the regular season, and in the training period prior to the commencement thereof, the clubs transport equipment across and through the several States; they pay employees, so-called scouts, who travel among the several States in search of talent for their respective employers; the personnel of the clubs reside in various States and execute their contract of employment in various States.

[Allege Interstate Character of Organized Baseball]

In general, then, the complaint charges that "organized baseball," as it is presently conducted, is of an interstate character and that the agreements under which it operates create an unlawful monopoly of which the Plaintiffs are victims.

The Defendants have not answered the complaint, their time to do so having been extended until April 23, 1949, by order of this Court.

[Supporting Affidavit Evidence]

In support of the present application, the Plaintiffs have filed affidavits in which they recite the history of their careers on various baseball teams in the St. Louis National League organization, the compensation received, and the efficiency of their work. They assert that they served in the Armed Services of the United States in the late war, and that after their return to baseball, they accepted offers to play in the Mexican League at greater remuneration than they were receiving in St. Louis. Subsequent to their departure, they were notified by the Commissioner that they were suspended from "organized baseball" for five years, which suspension expires April 15, 1951. In the winter of 1946 and 1947, they played in the Cuban League, but they were prevented from being so employed in 1948 because the Cuban League had become affiliated with the Defendants. In the summer of 1948, they toured the United States with a group of other players, but the tour resulted in financial loss by reason of the conduct of Defendants' agents who threatened owners of baseball parks and players with dire penalties, including suspension for five years, if they permitted use of their parks or teams in competition with Plaintiffs. They assert that they are unable to support their families by working at their profession and have no future probabilities in baseball, the Commissioner having informed Lanier on February 26, 1949, that he has no present plans for reinstatement; and if the suspension is allowed to stand, it will terminate their careers.

[Affidavit Evidence in Opposition]

In opposition to the present application, affidavits have been submitted by officers or agents on behalf of all the corporate Defendants. In general these affidavits deny the allegations of the complaint, and deny making threats or sending letters and telegrams in the summer of 1948 to owners of baseball parks or players as charged in the moving affidavits. They assert that the rules and regulations for the conduct of baseball have as their purpose the promotion of competition between teams, the development of players, the preservation of the integrity of the game, and the maintenance of public confidence in the game, objectives which could not be accomplished without such rules and regulations. In addition, there are two affidavits of Eddie Dyer, manager of the St. Louis National League Club at the time of Plaintiffs' departure and at present, in which he states that the Plaintiffs, both of whom were under contract with the club for the 1946 season, refused to play for the team after May 26, 1946, because "* * * they were getting so much cash from the Mexicans that they would come out ahead if they were barred from American baseball for life." One of Mr. Dyer's affidavits and an affidavit of counsel on behalf of some of the corporate Defendants state that in recent polls taken of the players on the rosters of the St. Louis Club and the Pittsburgh Club, the players voted unanimously in favor of retaining the "reserve clause" in the baseball contract.

Finally, three affidavits purport to show the residences of Defendants Chandler, Harridge and Trautman to be outside the Southern District of New York, and another annexes telegrams and letters to and from the Commissioner in connection with the effect of the suspended players' participation with other players. The Commissioner's responses indicate that any "professional", i. e. a player under contract with a club in "organized baseball", will suffer suspension if he participates with the Plaintiffs. Amateurs and semi-professional players so participating will be unaffected presently, of course, or in futuro in case they desire to become professionals.

The Defendants urge the denial of Plaintiffs' application on four grounds: (1) that the Defendant Chandler, who has not been served with process within the jurisdiction of this Court, and is not a resident of this District for purposes of venue, is an indispensable party to the suit, and, therefore, the Court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter; (2) that the preliminary injunction sought would change the status quo and would grant preliminarily the final relief sought; (3) that there are disputed questions of fact and law; and (4) that the Plaintiffs have failed to show that they will sustain irreparable damage pendente lite.

1. I deem it unwise and unnecessary to dispose of the Defendants' initial contention at this time.

It appears to be true that Commissioner Chandler has not been served with process within the jurisdiction of this Court and that he is not a resident of this District.*

Whether he is an indispensable party, i. e. one who has "* * * an interest of such a nature that a final decree cannot be made without either affecting that interest, or leaving the controversy in such a condition that its final termination may be wholly inconsistent with equity and good conscience"*, depends upon a construction of the Major League Agreement, which step I feel should not be gratuitously undertaken on a proceeding in advance of trial where there are other and sufficient grounds for determining the Plaintiffs' application.

2. Injunction is one of the most drastic remedies in law, and its use depends upon the most compelling showing that it is indispensable to the final relief sought. And the issuance of an injunction is almost prohibitive where it is not designed for its common function—to preserve the status quo but, rather seeks preliminarily the ultimate relief to which a party may be entitled. Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc. v. Gittone, 110 F. (2d) 292, (C. C. A. 3, 1940); U. S. v. Adler's Creamery, 107 F. (2d) 987, (C. C. A. 2, 1939); American Mercury v. Kiely, 19 F. (2d) 295, (C. C. A. 2, 1927).

In the Warner Bros. case, supra, the Court stated at page 293:

> "In the present case the trial judge found that the exhibitor plaintiffs have suffered and will continue to suffer irreparable loss unless given injunctive relief. The defendants strongly urge that this finding is not supported by the record. We need not decide this question, however, for we are clear that the effect of the preliminary injunction which the court granted was not to preserve the status quo but rather to alter the prior status of the parties fundamentally. Such an alteration may be directed only after final hearing, the office of a preliminary injunction being, as we have pointed out, merely to preserve pendente lite the last actual noncontested status which preceded the pending controversy."

To grant the Plaintiffs' application would disturb the status quo, would restore them to positions they resigned voluntarily and would accord them preliminarily on papers alone the relief to which they might ultimately, after trial, be entitled.

3. The complaint and moving affidavits and answering affidavits in many instances do not disclose serious issues of fact. The charge of threats to club owners and players who might have dealings with the Plaintiffs is one issue of fact obviously in dispute. Moreover, both sides to this controversy should have full opportunity at a trial to develop the factual situation with respect to the entire case, and should not be burdened by any predisposition of what the facts are upon papers alone. The Defendants deny that they are engaged in any illegal restraint of trade or monopoly under the anti-trust laws and this issue will depend largely upon the factual situation which should be developed, as I have heretofore stated. In addition, these denials present a very serious question of law encompassing further grave questions in connection with the necessity of the method of operation to preserve the game, a factor mentioned in all of the answering affidavits, whether the laws embrace personal services, and whether the restraints are reasonable, for it is only unreasonable restraints which the law condemns.*

Apart from all of the foregoing is the serious question of whether the Court has jurisdiction of the suit in itself. Remember that in Federal Baseball Club v. National League, 259 U. S. 200. The Supreme Court held in 1922 that baseball was not trade nor commerce within the scope of the Federal anti-trust laws. And the recent opinion of the Court of Appeals in Gardella v. Chandler, et al., decided February 9, 1949, was not decisive of the point. It merely held that a trial must be had to determine whether baseball as now conducted comes within the scope of those laws.

> "When the case goes back for trial * * * it will be necessary, as I view it, to determine whether all the interstate activities of the defendants—those, which were thought insufficient before in conjunction with broadcasting and television—together form a large enough part of the business to impress upon it an interstate character" (per L. Hand, C. J., in the Gardella case).

[No Injunction Where Jurisdiction Unsettled]

Even assuming that the facts are not greatly in dispute, the issues of law are too

* The situation with respect to Defendants Harridge and Trautman is similar.
* Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. 130, 139.

* U. S. v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106; Chicago Board of Trade v. U. S., 246 U. S. 231.

doubtful for any sort of pre-judgment in the matter. Certainly, an injunction may not issue where the situation is so dubious in numerous respects, and especially where the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the matter is unsettled. Lowe v. Consolidated Edison Co., 67 F. Supp. 287 (S. D. N. Y., 1941); Quigley Pub. Co., Inc. v. Showman's Round Table, Inc., 7 F. Supp. 410 (S. D. N. Y., 1934).

[Meritorious Argument not Sufficient]

4. The Plaintiffs assert in their moving papers that irreparable damage will result if the present relief is not allowed. Strictly, this does not appear to be so. The Plaintiffs have sued for treble damages, and if successful, they will recover all the loss they will have sustained up to the time of trial multiplied by three. Future harm will be precluded by final injunction against the Defendants. In legal contemplation they will receive all the relief to which they are entitled. However, one circumstance enters into the problem which renders the situation somewhat unique. The Plaintiffs, being skilled competitors, need similar competition to maintain the state of their skill prior to suspension. In this respect, it is asserted, final injunctive relief will find them incapable of following their profession on its previously high standard because of non-user, so to speak. There is some merit to the argument. It is not sufficient, though, to warrant the granting of such drastic relief here, especially in view of the compelling legal bases for denying it.

[Motion Denied on All Grounds]

I deny, therefore, the Plaintiffs' motion on all the grounds set forth above.

I think I should state here, to avoid misconception of the effect of this decision, that it in no way concerns the ultimate merits of the controversy. A trial of the matter must be had to determine the legal and factual issues involved.

Motion denied.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civ. 30-165. November 7, 1947.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Patented Oil Cracking Processes—Allegations of Fraud and Bribery—Motions To Strike Out Pleadings.—In an action taken by a firm of engineers and designers of oil refining equipment, certain motions by the defendant oil companies to strike out pleadings were denied and others granted. The pleadings alleged that the named oil companies entered into a conspiracy to monopolize the trade in the licensing of patented cracking processes and the installation of oil cracking equipment by creating and controlling a patent pool, eliminating competition among themselves and using economic force acquired through the patent pool to exclude others. One of the methods employed was alleged bribery in litigation and the subsequent use of the decision to force the plaintiff to withdraw from the business. It was held that the pleading was sufficient to embrace the bribery charges. It may not be said as a matter of law that the prosecution of a case to a successful conclusion through bribery was not within the conspiracy pleaded or a foreseeable consequence of it.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.614.

For defendant Shell Union Oil Corporation: Cravath, Swaine & Moore, New York, New York.

For defendant Standard Oil Company (Indiana): Buell F. Jones, Pike H. Sullivan, Weymouth Kirkland, A. L. Hodson, Townley, Updike & Carter, New York, New York.

For defendant Universal Oil Products Company (Delaware): Dwight, Harris, Koegal & Caskey, New York, New York.

For defendant Gulf Oil Corporation: M. S. Gibson, New York, New York.

[Nature of Motion]

CONGER, D. J.: The defendants move to strike certain portions of the complaint herein pursuant to Rule 12 (f), F. R. C. P., on the ground that they are redundant, immaterial, impertinent or scandalous, and also for a bill of particulars with respect to various facts.

[Nature of Action]

The complaint demands treble damages for injuries allegedly sustained as a result of a conspiracy among the defendants to monopolize and restrain trade in connection with patented oil cracking processes and apparatus in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. A. §§ 1, 2).

The complaint alleges that plaintiff, a Kansas corporation, had been engaged in designing and supervising the installation of refining equipment, particularly distillation equipment, and that it had developed and perfected, prior to 1928, plans for an oil cracking device to make gasoline, subsequently known as the Winkler-Koch still, utilizing a process which became known as the Winkler-Koch oil cracking process. The still and process were unpatented. Plaintiff offered to engineer, construct and install said still for refiners in consideration of payment for plaintiff's engineering services and without the requirement of continuing royalty payments. Between April, 1928 and the end of 1929, plaintiff entered into 16 contracts for the construction and installation in the United States of Winkler-Koch cracking stills for various independent refiners with substantial profits resulting, in competition with various of the defendants herein, some of which were engaged in seeking to grant licenses for the use of their respective cracking processes and to design and construct either themselves or through another defendant, the cracking equipment necessary thereto.

It is further alleged that the defendants, beginning in 1928 and continuing during all the times hereinafter referred to, have combined and conspired to monopolize and restrain, and have in fact monopolized and restrained, trade in the licensing of patented cracking processes and apparatus, and in the business of engineering, designing and supervising the purchase, sale and installation of cracking processes and equipment by various means including the creation of a patent pool, cross-licensing, elimination of competition previously existing among themselves, and the use of the economic force acquired through the patent pool.

Paragraph 64 of the complaint sets forth the objects of the conspiracy as follows:

"(a) To prevent any manufacturer from selling, and any engineering company from contracting for and installing, any cracking equipment to or for any refiner in the United States not licensed by one of the defendants under the aforesaid patent pool.

(b) To impose on every independent refiner in the United States the necessity of entering into a license agreement under the aforesaid patent pool in order to acquire cracking apparatus and a cracking process, if he previously had none, or in order to continue to operate a previously acquired cracking process without danger of bankruptcy.

(c) To impose on every independent refiner who acquired a license under the aforesaid pool of patents and unfair and onerous royalty which created a destructive competitive differential in costs between such licensees and those of the defendants who were and are engaged in the production of gasoline without any royalty obligation and who directly or indirectly share in the royalties paid by such licensees whereby said operating defendants are enabled to control and maintain the price of gasoline at a higher price than would have been possible if a cracking process were available royalty free to all independent refiners.

(d) To eliminate the plaintiff from the business of designing and installing unpatented, royalty free cracking equipment and processes in the United States."

And it is further alleged that these objects have been substantially accomplished by numerous acts, arrangements and contracts including the obtaining by Universal Oil Products Company [Delaware] of a corrupt affirmance of a judgment in the Third Circuit Court of Appeals through bribery of a judge, and certain settlements and dismissals of litigation as a result of the proceedings in the Third Circuit.

[Grounds of Motion]

The motion to strike is directed toward certain allegations of the complaint, as to which, these defendants assert, proof would not be admissible and which on their face are immaterial and irrelevant. In addition, the defendants object to the headings which precede certain paragraphs in the pleading.

I shall first take up the objections to Paragraph 137 of the complaint, which reads as follows:

> "In 1941 as a result of information brought to its attention, the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit authorized an investigation into the question of possible fraud and corruption of the Court of Appeals in the Root case. Pursuant to proceedings had in this investigation, in which Universal participated and was fully heard, the Court on June 15, 1944, entered its order (reported in 62 U. S. P. Q. 114) adopting the findings and conclusions of a Special Master appointed by it and adjudged the Root judgments to be so tainted with fraud as to be wholly invalid and void. The Root judgments were vacated and the mandates to the lower court were recalled."

The defendants object to this paragraph on the grounds (1) that the order of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals, dated June 15, 1944, referred to therein, has no legal effect as an adjudication of the invalidity of the Root judgments; and (2) that, assuming its validity, it is still not admissible in the trial of this action.

The defendants' first objection is based upon an opinion of the Supreme Court in Universal Oil Products v. Root Refining Co., 328 U. S. 575, in which the Court, in reversing an order of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals allowing counsel fees to the amici curiae assisting in the Root investigation, indicated quite strongly that the order of June 15, 1944, although not directly in issue, was of no effect as an adjudication of the rights of the parties because of the informality of the proceeding, the Court stating, among other things, that "a court cannot deprive a successful party of his judgment without a proper hearing." [page 580]

However, without deciding the effect and status of the proceedings in the Third Circuit, I pass to the second objection which is decisive.

[Evidence on Previous Judgment Inadmissible]

The allegations contained in paragraph 137 would be admissible upon the trial as evidence only upon the theory of res judicata. But it is a general rule that a judgment is evidence in a subsequent suit solely between the parties to the preceding suit, or their privies. Rudd v. Cornell, 171 N. Y. 114; St. John v. Fowler, 229 N. Y. 270, rearg. den. 229 N. Y. 608; U. S. v. Pink, 315 U. S. 203; Restatement of the Law of Judgments, Section 93. The plaintiff was neither party nor privy to the Root case, nor were the defendants, other than Universal.

Paragraph 137, and the parts of paragraphs 138, which allude to the matter contained therein should be stricken, as well as the expression "as later held by the Supreme Court of the United States" in paragraph 108.

[Allegation of Bribery]

Beginning with paragraph 132, the complaint sets forth allegations concerning the purported bribery of Judge Davis. I quote the pertinent paragraphs of the complaint.

> "132. With the object of assuring a successful outcome of the Root appeals, Universal, at some time pending the appeal or prior thereto, employed one Morgan S. Kaufman, an obscure referee in bankruptcy residing at Scranton, Pennsylvania, who was personally intimate with said Judge J. Warren Davis. The said Kaufman had a general understanding with Davis whereby Davis was to render Kaufman judicial favors in return for monetary rewards in cases in which Kaufman was interested. Following the argument of the Root appeal, Davis and Kaufman vacationed together at Miami Springs, Florida, and after Davis's return and on June 26, 1935, the purported opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals was filed in favor of Universal in the Root case. Davis wrote the decision for the court. Subsequently Davis denied Root's petition for rehearing, and the Supreme Court of the United States denied Root's petition for certiorari.

133. The order denying certiorari was entered on October 21, 1935. On October 22, 1935, Universal, through its president Hiram J. Halle, paid Morgan Kaufman the sum of $25,000.00 and entered into an agreement with Kaufman for the payment to him of an additional $25,000.00 to be paid to him during the following year. Morgan S. Kaufman rendered no legal services for Universal in the Root case and no legal services for Universal in any other case save as a local associate in one other case which did not involve a Winkler-Koch still. Universal, through its president Hiram J. Halle, agreed to pay, and did pay, Kaufman the said sum of $50,000. with the knowledge and purpose that the money or the prospect of receiving it would be used by Kaufman to insure a decision favorable to Universal on the Root appeal.

134. On October 24, 1935, said Morgan S. Kaufman, in Judge Davis's chambers, agreed with one Charles L. Stokley, a cousin of the said Davis, to loan Stokley the sum of $10,000.00 upon the security of certain properties of Stokley at Mt. Dora, Florida. Subsequently the $10,000.00 loan was actually made by Kaufman to Stokley. The said purported loan was, in fact, a mere disguise or cloak for the payment by Universal, through its agent Kaufman, to Davis of the sum of $10,000.00 as a reward for his decision favorable to Universal in the Root appeal, it being understood between Davis and Kaufman that the loan should be repaid by Stokley to Davis and not to Kaufman. Stokely in fact made payments of interest thereon to Davis up to the date when the Federal Bureau of Investigation in 1939 investigated this transaction.

135. The fraudulent and corrupt conduct of Universal improperly influenced Judge Davis in the Root case with the effect that the decision written for the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit by Judge Davis and the judgments entered thereon were corrupt and void. The said fraudulent decision in the Root case remained in effect as an apparent adjudication and lawful determination that the operation of the Winkler-Koch still constituted an infringement of Universal's said Dubbs and Egloff patents throughout the life of said patents, thereby eliminating the Winkler-Koch still as a threat to defendants' licensing structure at least until May 12, 1942, when the said Egloff patent expired. Universal's said fraud in the Root case was a step taken by it in furtherance of the objects of the conspiracy among these defendants. Plaintiff alleges that but for the fraudulent intervention of Universal the erroneous decision of Judge Nields would have been reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit as, in fact, it was ultimately overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Globe case.

136. Universal publicized widely the decision of the Court of Appeals in the Root case which it had fraudulently obtained, through the medium of articles in trade papers, telegrams and letters to unlicensed refiners, and the distribution of printed copies of the opinion throughout the industry. All independent refiners not yet licensed by the defendants were advised by Universal that only by taking a license from it could they avoid costly litigation in the form of infringement suits which Universal intended to bring, based on the Root decision and under the patents involved therein. The telegram sent by Universal to unlicensed refiners gave prominence to the fact that a Winkler-Koch still had been held to infringe Universal's patents in the Root case. Universal's threats to unlicensed refiners, based on this fraudulent decision, caused many of them to enter into license agreements with Universal.

139. Thereafter [following the investigatory proceedings in the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit] Universal entered into stipulations with defendants in all of its cases then pending against Winkler-Koch users, in which Universal had alleged the Root decree as either a precedent or a binding estoppel against the defendant under the doctrine of res judicata, dismissing each case with prejudice. Except for the fact of Universal's fraud and corruption in the Root case becoming known, Universal by these means would have continued to endeavor, as it had endeavored up to June 15, 1944, to compel the unlicensed users of Winkler-Koch stills to enter into agreements with Universal paying tribute to it under its patents."

The defendants urge that these allegations be stricken upon the ground that the alleged bribery by Universal was not within the scope of the conspiracy pleaded, nor was it a reasonably foreseeable consequence thereof.

The defendants refer to Paragraph 64 of the complaint to substantiate their contentions; and they argue that the scope of the conspiracy as set forth in those allegations or revealed in any other part of the complaint fails to embrace the charges of bribery and corruption pleaded in Paragraphs 132 et seq.

Generally, the charge is that these defendants entered into a conspiracy to monopolize the trade and commerce in the licensing of patented cracking processes by creating and controlling a patent pool, eliminating competition among themselves, and using the economic force acquired through the patent pool to exclude others from the business of licensing patented cracking processes and of designing and installing cracking processes, whether or not patented.

Paragraph 64, quoted before, further particularizes the charge, and paragraph 65 then goes on to allege the specific means by which the defendants accomplished the objects sought to be obtained.

These means, called in the complaint "acts, arrangements, and contracts", consist among other things, of the institution by various defendants of a multiplicity of infringement suits against users of the Winkler-Koch still; the use of unfair, illegal, oppressive and unconscionable methods of competition against the plaintiff; concentration of licensing rights; and settlements of suits among the defendants, all in addition to the alleged bribery in the Root case and the subsequent use of that case as an instrument to force the plaintiff to withdraw from the business.

Actually, the complaint does not charge that the bribery was committed pursuant to the conspiracy among the defendants. The allegation found in Paragraph 135 that "Universal's said fraud in the Root case was a step taken by it in furtherance of the objects of the conspiracy among the defendants" seeks to connect the others to the deed. There is no charge that the defendants, other than Universal, had knowledge of, participated in, or ratified, the act. It is a general rule, however, that co-conspirators are vicariously responsible for acts committed in furtherance of the joint venture, subject to the limitation that "* * * the acts so imputed must be in execution of the venture as all understand it * * *." U. S. v. Crimmins, 123 F. (2d) 271, 273, (C. C. A. 2nd, 1941); U. S. v. Peoni, 100 F. (2d) 401, (C. C. A. 2nd, 1938); Pinkerton v. U. S., 328 U. S. 640.

It is this limitation of the general rule which the defendants assert at this time.

[Pleading Embraces Bribery Charges]

However, I have come to the conclusion that the pleading is sufficient to embrace the bribery charges.

The complaint alleges a conspiracy to create and control a patent pool. The methods by which the patent pool was to be controlled are found in the various "acts, arrangements and contracts" described in the complaint. One of the methods charged was the institution of a multiplicity of infringement suits designed to pressure those who had refused to take a license under the patent pool. One of these suits was the Root case. If it may be taken as true that the defendants were part of the conspiracy to create and control the patent pool by the methods charged, it may not be said as a matter of law that the prosecution of the Root case to a successful conclusion through bribery was not within the conspiracy pleaded or a foreseeable consequence of it.

The motion to strike Paragraphs 132-136 and the last sentence of Paragraph 139, is denied.

[Settlement of Suits]

Paragraphs 138, 139, 111 and portions of Paragraphs 114, 116 and 118 of the complaint refer to various matters to which the defendants object, including a settlement between Universal and Root Refining Company following the proceedings in the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, as well as dismissals of suits begun by certain defendants against strangers to the instant case.

It appears that these allegations have been inserted in the complaint as admissions of the truth of the findings of the Circuit Court for the Third Circuit in the Root proceedings; and, with respect to the dismissals, as evidence of the bad faith character of a multiplicity of suits allegedly brought by certain defendants pursuant to the conspiracy.

It is a generally accepted rule that a settlement or compromise and particularly with a stranger of a dispute arising out of the same facts involved in a subsequent suit is not evidence as an admission of liability or of any other fact involved in the prior suit. Hawthorne v. Eckerson Co., 77 F. (2d) 844, (C. C. A. 2nd, 1935); National Battery Co. v. Levy, 126 F. (2d)

33, (C. C. A. 8th, 1942), cert. den. 316 U. S. 697; Wigmore on Evidence. § 1061; Wigmore, Supp., 1934, p. 460; 31 C. J. S. Evidence, § 292, p. 1055.

The settlement alleged in Paragraph 138 between Universal and the Root Refining Co., a stranger to the instant case, offends this rule, is therefore impertinent, and should be stricken.

[Dismissal of Suits]

The dismissals alleged present a different problem.

The plaintiff, although submitting no authority in support of their inclusion, nevertheless insists that the allegations are proper as evidence of the bad faith of the defendants in instituting the many suits.

Ordinarily, the only penalty for instituting unsuccessful litigation is the imposition of costs, except in certain types of cases such as malicious prosecution where a prior favorable verdict is an essential element of the cause of action, or an attachment proceeding where damages for wrongful seizure are allowed.

[Allegation of Mala Fides Struck Out]

To permit the assertion of these dismissals here as evidence of mala fides in commencing the suits would, it seems to me, give unprecedented significance to them, and serve as a novel caveat to potential good faith litigants who might contemplate withdrawals for one reason or another.

Further, assuming, arguendo, that evidence of the institution of a multiplicity of suits is admissible to prove a conspiracy, I fail to see how the good or bad faith of the parties gives force to the charge.

It is well established that acts committed in effectuation of a conspiracy need not be illegal in themselves; indeed, the acts may be wholly innocent, yet be part of, and tend to accomplish, an illegal conspiracy. U. S. New York Great A. & P. Tea Co., Inc., 137 F. (2d) 459, (C. C. A. 5th, 1943), cert. den. 320 U. S. 783; Lynch v. Magnavox Co., 94 F. (2d) 883, (C. C. A. 9th, 1938); U. S. v. Reading Co., 226 U. S. 324; U. S. v. Patten, 226 U. S. 525.

The assertion of bad faith here stands in the same light. It adds nothing to the acts alleged, and evidence of it would be highly prejudicial to the defendants, in addition to being impertinent.

The first sentence of Paragraph 139, Paragraph 111, and the offensive portions of 114, 116 and 118 should be stricken.

[Headlines Helpful to Court]

Finally, the defendants move to strike the headings in the complaint of which there are fifteen. For example, Paragraph 1 is headed by the caption, "THE PARTIES", and Paragraph 13 by "PURPOSE OF ACTION, JURISDICTION AND VENUE."

Technically, these "headlines" violate Rule 10 (b), F. R. C. P., but they are commonly used in bulky pleadings, and are helpful to the Court in directing its attention to their content. They can in no way prejudice the defendants here, pleadings not being in evidence, and may remain in the complaint.

The defendants move for a bill of particulars pursuant to Rule 12 (e), F. R. C. P. in order that they might prepare their answer. Specifically, they seek facts allegedly essential for pleading applicable statutes of limitations. Their request is composed of five items which seek: (1) Identification of prospective customers claimed to have been dissuaded from doing business with plaintiff; (2) the times when such business was solicited and refused; (3) the specific means by which each such prospective customer was dissuaded from doing business with plaintiff; (4 the alleged damages by years; and (5) the alleged damages with respect to each of the divisions of plaintiff's business.

The plaintiff resists the application upon the ground that the defendants may properly plead the statutes of limitations upon the allegations of the complaint without further particularization. It contends that the complaint sets forth a single cause of action, arising in Kansas where plaintiff at all times had its property and place of business and where it suffered the losses, and that the conspiracy has continued and cannot, therefore, be barred.

This argument misconceives the nature of the action.

As indicated before, the complaint alleges numerous and diverse methods and means by which the defendants carried out the conspiracy. Each alleged act, if true, constitutes a separate effectuation of the conspiracy and is actionable. Foster v. Kleiser Co. v. Special Site Sign Co., 85 F. (2d) 742, (C. C. A. 9th, 1936), cert. den. 299 U. S.

Initially, the applicable statute of limitations would be the one of the State wherein the action is pending, no Federal statute of limitations having been enacted for suits under the Sherman Act. 28 U. S. C. A. 725; Chattanooga Foundry & Pipe Works v. City of Atlanta, 203 U. S. 390; Seaboard Terminal Corp. v. Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, 24 F. Supp. 1018, (S. D. N. Y. 1938), aff'd on opinion below, 104 F. (2d) 659, (C. C. A. 2nd, 1939). But Section 13 of the New York Civil Practice Act provides as follows:

> "Where a cause of action arises outside of this state, an action cannot be brought in a court of this state to enforce such cause of action after the expiration of the time limited by the laws either of this state or of the state or country where the cause of action arose, for bringing an action upon such cause of action, except that where the cause of action originally accrued in favor of a resident of this state the time limited by the laws of this state shall apply."

The plaintiff herein is a foreign, not a domestic corporation and would, therefore, not be a resident of the State, and the statute of limitations of the jurisdiction where the cause of action arose would be applicable, if such statute be shorter than that of New York.

The allegations of the complaint in some respects are rather general. As to these, defendants are entitled to some particulars so that they may plead the applicable statutes of limitations.

I am mindful of the fact that bills of particulars have lost favor in Federal procedure.* See Moore's Federal Practice, Cumulative Supplement to Vol. 1, pages 295-314. But I believe that the present situation is a proper case calling for them under the Rule as now interpreted. Mendola v. Carborundum Company, 26 F. Supp. 359 (W. D. N. Y. 1938); Alden-Rochelle, Inc. v. A. S. C. A. P., 3 F. R. D. 157 (S. D. N. Y. 1942); Frederick O. Muller, Inc. v. Dun Bradstreet, Inc., 4 Fed. Rules Serv., 12 e.21, Case 1 (S. D. N. Y. 1940); Klein v. Debway Hats, Inc., 2 F. R. D. 356 (S. D. N. Y. 1942).

Accordingly, the motion with respect to items 1 and 2 is granted. The answers to these items should be sufficient to defendants so that any applicable limitations statutes might be pleaded. The other items do not appear to be necessary for this plea, and are denied.

The defendants' application for an extension of 60 days to answer is denied. If enlargement of time becomes necessary later, the defendants may apply for such relief upon proper showing.

All the rest of defendants' motions are denied.

Settle order in accordance herewith.

STRICKER, V. J.: Coming on this day to be heard an application by the Complainant for a temporary injunction restraining the Defendants from selling certain commodities below the price fixed by the manufacturer on the alleged authority of what is designated as the Fair Trade Act of this State, and on defendants right reserved, with permission, to file such pleadings as might be proper later in the hearing to bring all pertinent questions in issue before the Court, and the Court desiring and directing argument on the questions,

Sherman Antitrust Act

Patent Monopoly—Price Control of Patented Article—Misuse of Patents as a Defense. —A complaint filed by an electrical manufacturing company alleged that its licensee was infringing certain patents that it owned for the manufacture of circuit breakers. A motion for summary judgment of dismissal was allowed when it was found that the licensor had misused its patents. The Court refused to uphold schedules of prices and terms in the license agreement prohibiting the licensee from selling the patented product any cheaper than the licensor because it appeared that the plaintiff had granted a license for the manufacture of its patented circuit breaker to another company holding a patent for an improvement in the commercial application of the plaintiff's product in exchange for a similar grant. Through such an exchange of patents an improved circuit breaker known by a different name was manufactured. The license agreement sued upon covered the new product which was the result of this exchange of patents. In declaring that two or more patent owners can not combine their patents and issue licenses under the combination and restrict the terms at which the resulting article can be sold, the Court held the patent license sued upon to be in restraint of trade and dismissed the action.

[Review of Proceedings]

BAKER, District Judge: On November 10, 1943, the plaintiff, then known as Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Company, filed its complaint against Bulldog Electric Products Company, alleging that the defendant was infringing certain patents owned by the plaintiff for the manufacture of circuit breakers. A circuit breaker is a device for cutting electric current out of a circuit when the power load becomes dangerously high. The basic principle of the device had been known and used for years.

In the early 1930s, the Westinghouse Company decided that it would be advantageous to manufacture a small circuit breaker which would retail at a low enough price to be used in private homes and small commercial buildings in place of fuses then and still commonly in use. The circuit breaker is more convenient to use than a fuse, and does not require the user to keep on hand a supply of replacement fuses. The Westinghouse Company was issued certain patents under which the device, known as the AB circuit breaker, could be manufactured.

At about the same time, the Square D Company had pending applications for patents of a similar nature. Interferences arose in the patent office between Westinghouse and Square D in connection with the latter's applications. These were resolved by Square D's conceding priority to Westinghouse. At the same time, Westinghouse gave Square D a license under its patents, and received from Square D a license under Square D's patents. The Square D patents covered an improvement in the commercial application of the Westinghouse patents and, by use of both patents, a circuit breaker, known as the Multibreaker, could be manufactured.

It was agreed that Westinghouse would issue Multibreaker licenses under its patents, and the royalties derived therefrom would be split between Westinghouse and Square D in the proportion of sixty to forty, if Square D issued non-assertion agreements to the Westinghouse licensees. For the purposes of this case, I can see no distinction whatever between a non-assertion agreement and a license. Westinghouse issued several licenses under this contract, and Square D issued non-assertion agreements to the licensees involved. In most instances, the non-assertion agreement was issued practically simultaneously with the Westinghouse license. The license agreements provided, among other matters, that the licensee could not sell the patented product for a cheaper price than that charged by Westinghouse, and Westinghouse, from time to time, issued a schedule of prices and terms, which the licensees were required to observe.

On January 10, 1944, the defendant filed a motion for summary judgment of dismissal upon the grounds that the patents in suit were being illegally used as a part of a combination in restraint of trade. This motion was overruled May 23, 1944, because I felt that the doctrine of United States v. General Electric Co., 272 U. S. 476, permitted the type of price control complained of in this case. On July 1, 1944, the defendant's answer was filed.

After several other steps and hearings, it came to the attention of the court that there was a suit pending in the Eastern District of New York between these same parties, which involved these same patents. The New York suit had proceeded much further than the one in this court. There was an indication that the New York litigation would settle many, if not all, of the issues before me and, since it had started before the case here, I stayed the proceedings in this District on March 2, 1945. There was no objection by either party to this suit to the stay. On May 17, 1948, after the proceeding in the Eastern District of New York had terminated, both in the district and appellate courts, this stay lifted, and the case here resumed.

The defendant again filed a motion for summary judgment of dismissal, alleging generally the same grounds it had urged in its prior motion. However, in the meantime, two decisions had been handed down by the United States Supreme Court, clarifying that Court's ruling in the General Electric case and, in my opinion, materially modifying what I had thought was the rule of that decision. These cases were United States v. Line Material Co., 333 U. S. 287, 92 L. Ed. 510, and United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 333 U. S. 364, 92 L. Ed. 552. It might be noted here parenthetically that the lower courts apparently agreed with my interpretation of the General Electric decision. The basic ruling in these cases, reduced to its simplest terms, is, in effect, that while under the General Electric decision one patent owner may issue a license to one licensee and, as a condition of that license, restrict the price which the licensee must charge for the finished product, two or more patent owners can not combine their patents and issue licenses under the combination and restrict the terms at which the resulting article can be sold. It is the contention of the defendant that, in the instant case, we have a combining of patents by different owners, and the use of the combined patents in a manner that fixed prices, in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust law. The plaintiff contends that it has not used its patents illegally or that if there has been a misuse in some instances, that misuse has been purged.

I do not deem it necessary in this memorandum to go into all the arguments and authorities advanced by the respective parties. Each party knows the positions taken and authorities cited in support therefor. I deem it sufficient here to say that it is my opinion the plaintiff has been guilty of a misuse of its patents; that it is, therefore, without clean hands in this court; that this situation has not been purged; and that the instant proceeding must be dismissed. In accordance therewith, I make the following findings of fact and conclusions of law:

[Findings of Fact]

1. On July 1, 1934, plaintiff entered into certain agreements with Square D Company of Detroit, Michigan, and Cutler-Hammer, Inc., of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, wherein plaintiff granted non-exclusive and non-divisible licenses, involving patents in suit, to said companies under patents of plaintiff to make and sell the AB type of circuit breaker. Each of said licensees was obliged to pay a 5% royalty to plaintiff. The license grants were conditioned on the said licensees selling the AB type circuit breakers at prices no more favorable to customers than those established and followed by plaintiff in making its sales.

Said sales price condition of the grant has continued to be and now is in effect.

In such license agreements, Square D Company and Cutler-Hammer, Inc., agreed not to assert against plaintiff any of their patents; and Westinghouse agreed to be bound to the price schedules published by it for minimum thirty-day periods.

2. After the development of the Multibreaker type circuit breaker, plaintiff, by agreement with Square D Company dated July 1, 1936, and by agreement with Cutler-Hammer, Inc., dated October 1, 1936, amended its said agreements dated July 1, 1934, with said Square D Company and Cutler-Hammer, Inc., to include the said Multibreaker in the license grant. Said agreements were further amended to include a new Schedule C of patents, including patents in suit, which were not listed in said original agreements for said AB breakers.

The said amending agreements of July 1, 1936, and October 1, 1936, respectively, inserted an additional price control provision making the grant for the Multibreakers conditional on the licensees selling Multibreakers at prices no more favorable to the customers than those followed by plaintiff.

By letter dated April 9, 1949, plaintiff irrevocably waived said selling price control provision of the licensees applying to Multibreakers and withdrew and cancelled every price schedule applying to Multibreakers.

No such letters were sent out as to the price control provisions of the AB agreements, these remaining in effect, nor has plaintiff cancelled its right to fix prices charged by Frank Adam Electric Co., in its sale of its breakers.

The said 1936 amendments did not change the above 1934 agreements in any way as to the AB devices, but merely expanded the agreements to cover the Multibreakers and additional patents of Westinghouse. These price control provisions provided that plaintiff would not change its prices for Multibreakers without first giving the licensees thirty-days notice.

The non-assertion clauses from Square D Company and Cutler-Hammer, Inc., in favor of plaintiff apply to the Multibreakers as well as to the AB breakers.

As to Multibreakers, the royalty rate to Square D Company was only 2½%, but as to AB breakers, the royalty rate to Square D Company remained 5%. The Cutler-Hammer, Inc., royalty, as to AB breakers, and Multibreakers as well, was 5%.

3. That on July 1, 1936, a license agreement was entered into between said Square D Company and plaintiff, whereby plaintiff was granted a non-exclusive and non-divisible license to manufacture, use and sell Multibreakers under inventions of certain applications for patents of licensor, Square D Company, which were later filed and subservient to the dominant patents of plaintiff covering Multibreakers. Said license is still in effect. Under said license plaintiff was obligated to pay to the licensor, Square D Company a 2½% royalty for devices made and sold by plaintiff embodying inventions, the subject of applications for patents identified in said license.

It was also agreed that if licensor, Square D Company, should in the future grant a non-assertion under certain of its patents to any licensee of plaintiff for the manufacture, use and sale of Multibreakers, plaintiff would pay to Square D Company 40% of the royalty received by plaintiff from such Multibreaker licensees as have been granted the non-assertion.

4. Plaintiff issued Multibreaker licenses to Cutler-Hammer, Inc.; to Trumbull Electric Mfg. Co.; to Colt's Patent Fire Arms Mfg. Company (now Federal Electric Company); and Arrow-Hart & Hegeman Electric Co.

Substantially simultaneously, Square D Company issued non-assertions to these same companies, and in accordance with said Agreement of July 1, 1936, a copy of each non-assertion from Square D Company to each of plaintiff's Multibreaker licensees was sent by Square D Company to plaintiff.

Royalties received by plaintiff for Multibreakers have been divided with Square D Company in accordance with the provisions of said agreement of July 1, 1936.

Multibreaker licenses have been issued by plaintiff only to those having such non-assertion agreements from Square D Company, and non-assertions have been issued by Square D Company only to those having Multibreaker licenses from plaintiff. Each such non-assertion from Square D Company to a Multibreaker licensee of plaintiff referred to the corresponding Multibreaker license from plaintiff and was limited to the period during which the corresponding Multibreaker license from plaintiff was effective.

The Colt's Patent Fire Arms Mfg. Company license from plaintiff for Multibreakers further provided that Colt's Patent Fire Arms Mfg. Company would not assert its patents against plaintiff or the plaintiff's licensees for Multibreakers. The Colt's license from plaintiff was transferred to Federal on July 1, 1944, and the Square D Company non-assertion to Federal of March 21, 1946, in recognition of that fact, was retroactive to the date of that transfer, July 1, 1944.

The plaintiff's licenses for Multibreakers were limited to designs manufactured by plaintiff or Square D Company, a limitation abandoned October 1, 1942.

Patents in suit are included in each of plaintiff's Multibreaker licenses.

From time to time after the grant of the said licenses plaintiff furnished schedules of its prices to its licensees, as provided for in the price control provision in each of plaintiff's licenses. These schedules of prices were followed by all of the licensees.

The aforesaid Multibreaker licenses issued by plaintiff and the non-assertion letters given by Square D Company remain in effect, except as herein otherwise indicated.

5. Such licenses of paragraph 4 above were on the same terms as those contained in the license as to Multibreakers given to Cutler-Hammer, Inc., as set forth in the foregoing finding numbered "2."

The Multibreaker is manufactured and sold by plaintiff and by Square D Company and by the four licensees under the subservient patents of Square D Company and patents of plaintiff, and are referred to in the Multibreaker licenses of plaintiff as "Latching Contact Bar Type Circuit Breakers." The various dominant patent claims of plaintiff relating to Multibreakers were involved in Patent Office priority interference contests resulting in the dominant patents issuing to plaintiff as a result of concessions of priority from Square D Company to plaintiff.

6. Plaintiff granted a license, dated January 2, 1947, under certain of its patents involved in this suit, to the Frank Adam Electric Co., for the manufacture and sale of the commercial Frank Adam "Type AC" and "Thermag" circuit breakers, but plaintiff did not issue any price schedules for such breakers.

7. In May, 1944, plaintiff demanded price maintenance by Bulldog as a condition of any license from plaintiff to Bulldog, and no indication of a withdrawal of such demand was given by plaintiff to Bulldog until July 1, 1948, at a hearing before the Court, upon question addressed to plaintiff by the Court.

[Conclusions of Law]

1. Plaintiff's price control program, as to AB and Multibreaker circuit breakers, constitutes combination in restraint of trade.

2. The aforesaid combination in restraint of trade involves the patents in suit.

3. The aforesaid combination in restraint of trade constitutes a misuse of the patents in suit.

4. Plaintiff has made no showing of the termination or any modification of that part of the combination which relates to the control of the prices of AB circuit breakers.

5. Plaintiff has not shown the abandonment and full dissipation of that part of the combination which relates to the control of the prices of Multibreakers.

6. Plaintiff has not shown complete abandonment of misuse of the patents in suit or full dissipation of the consequences of that misuse.

7. Defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment dismissing the complaint shall be granted by suitable order of this Court.

Counsel are requested to attempt to agree upon such order. If such agreement can not be reached, each side is directed to submit a proposed order.

Action for an injunction against alleged violations of the antitrust laws. On defendant's motion for a change of venue to the District of Delaware. Motion granted.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Motion for Change of Venue Granted—Discretion in Court To Change Place of Trial. —In a civil action brought by the government for an injunction to restrain alleged attempts to monopolize trade and commerce in cellophane, the defendant's motion made under Section 1404 (a) of Title 28, United States Code, was granted since a transfer of the place of trial would be both in the interest of the convenience of witnesses and in the interest of justice. The statute assumes that the action has been instituted in a proper district, and grants to the court discretion to change the place of trial to some other district in which the action might have been originally commenced.

Opinion

HOLTZOFF, A., District Judge: This is a civil action brought by the United States for an injunction against E. I. du Pont de Nemours and Company, to restrain the defendant from continuing certain alleged violations of the antitrust laws. The activities of which the Government complains are claimed to consist of attempts to monopolize trade and commerce in cellophane. The defendant moves for a change of venue to the District of Delaware.

[Change of Venue Section]

The motion is made under Section 1404 (a) of Title 28, United States Code, which became effective on September 1, 1948, and reads as follows.

> § 1404. Change of venue.
> (a) For the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice, a district court may transfer any civil action to any other district or division where it might have been brought.

This provision introduced a new principle into Federal judicial procedure. It is a comprehensive, general statute applicable to all civil actions without exception. The innovation is salutary, as it enables the courts to make desirable adjustments as to places of trial, and puts plaintiffs and defendants more nearly on a plane of equality in those situations in which an action may be brought in any one of several districts. Previously, the final choice of the jurisdiction lay entirely with the plaintiff. This result obviously involved an element of unfairness, which the new statute endeavors to meet.

[Proper District Assumed]

Manifestly, the general provision relating to change of place of trial, does not affect, and in turn is not restricted or limited by, and statutes relating to venue, — either general venue statutes or special statutory provisions relating to venue in actions of specified types. The new provision assumes that the action has been filed in a jurisdiction where venue may be properly laid, for if it has not been so brought, it is subject to dismissal. The new statute assumes that the action has been instituted in a proper district, and grants to the court discretion to change the place of trial to some other district in which the action might have been originally commenced. In other words the statute assumes that venue exists where suit is filed. The new provision begins where the venue statutes leave off, and empowers the court to change the venue. It seems clear that there is no basis for excepting Government antitrust actions from the purview of the new statute, as obviously the Congress intended that it should be comprehensive and all inclusive in its scope. United States v. National City Lines, 80 F. Supp. 734.

[Corporation Organized Under Laws of Delaware]

There is only one defendant in this action. It is a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Delaware. Its principal executive and business offices are located in Wilmington, Delaware. The activities challenged by the Government are within the purview of the so-called "rayon department" of the defendant. The administrative and executive offices of this department are likewise located at Wilmington, as are the defendant's main offices. The defendant's plants are maintained in Delaware as well as in several other States, but none is located in the District of Columbia. The defendant does not manufacture any cellophane in Washington. The defendant does transact some business in the District of Columbia, and is subject to service of process in this jurisdiction.

[Witnesses and Records Located in Delaware]

The officers and employees of the defendant, who will be called as witnesses, reside in or near Wilmington. None of them resides in the District of Columbia. Voluminous files and records will be necessary at the trial and all of them are located at Wilmington, Delaware. Counsel for the plaintiff claims that the Government will have several witnesses who are Government officers residing in the District of Columbia, but there is no contention that the number of these witnesses exceed, or even equal, the number of witnesses located in Wilmington. The Government's principal argument seems to be that Washington is within easy reach of Wilmington, insofar as Wilmington witnesses are concerned, and that as concerns other witnesses, it is at least as easy for them to travel to Washington, as Wilmington.

[No Reason for Trial in D. C.]

No reason is perceived why this action should be brought and tried in the District of Columbia. Manifestly, it does not properly belong here. Delaware is the proper jurisdiction, even though technically venue may also be laid in the District of Columbia, as well as in a number of other districts. The convenience of witnesses clearly predominates in favor of the District of Delaware, as appears from the foregoing summary of facts.

[Preferential Position of Government Modified]

Until recently, in civil and criminal proceedings under the antitrust laws, as well as in criminal conspiracy cases, the Government had the final choice of forum, since in most cases of these types it is possible to justify venue in any one of several districts. Government counsel are not to be criticized for exercising the right of selection that the law gave them. Nevertheless, it has been recognized by many that the existence of this preferential position of the Government was inherently unfair and needed modification in order that the Government and defendants might approach some degree of equality in this respect and that the defendants would have some rights in this matter.

This undesirable situation was rectified in respect to criminal cases by Rule 21(b) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which authorizes the court on defendant's motion to transfer a proceeding to another district in the interest of justice, if the prosecution might originally have been instituted in that other district. The notes of the Advisory Committee concerning this Rule contain the following comment:

> "The effect of this provision would be to modify the existing practice under which in such cases the Government has the final choice of the jurisdiction where the prosecution should be conducted. The matter will now be left in the discretion of the court."

Section 1404(a), Title 28, United States Code, which became effective on September 1, 1948, among other things, effected a similar change in respect to Government civil cases. As stated above, it is comprehensive in its nature and covers all civil actions, irrespective of the nature of the parties, or of the subject matter.

There is another vital consideration that weighs heavily with this court in determining whether the requested transfer would be in the interest of justice. In Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 330 U. S. 501, 508, Mr. Justice Jackson observed:

> "Administrative difficulties follow for courts when litigation is piled up in congested centers instead of being handled at its origin."

True, he made this observation in discussing the doctrine of forum non conveniens. These comments are, however, equally applicable in determining whether a change of venue would be in the interest of justice. This Court has an exceedingly heavy docket. While its criminal calendar is current, its civil docket is about 12 or 13 months in arrears, that is, the time between the date a case is placed on the calendar and the date on which it is reached for trial in regular course, is about 12 or 13 months. This situation is caused by the peculiar and unique jurisdiction of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Due to the presence of Government agencies in Washington, there is an unusually heavy volume of Federal litigation. Due to the fact that the District of Columbia is a Federal area, this Court has jurisdiction of cases that elsewhere would be tried in State courts. Thus, all felonies and all civil cases involving more than $3,000, as well as matrimonial actions, probate of wills, administration of decedents' estates, and lunacy proceedings come before this court. Every judge in this district sits continuously from the opening of the court term in the fall until the last day of June, with the exception of a few days' recess at Christmas and Easter. Even during the summer, the court continues in session without interruption but on a curtailed schedule, the judges rotating for summer assignments.

[Prejudice to Local Litigants]

It is stated by counsel that the trial of this case would take six to eight weeks, and possibly longer. In the light of the above mentioned circumstances, to immobilize a judge for one case for this long period would be highly detrimental to the remaining business of this court. It would cause the docket to fall further in arrears. Naturally, if this litigation legitimately belonged in this jurisdiction, it would have to be kept here in spite of this consideration. Manifestly, however, bringing the action in the District of Columbia is a pure artificiality. To try this law suit here would be unfair to local litigants, who are waiting to secure a trial of their cases, and who would be further delayed if this antitrust case were to be tried in the District of Columbia.

[Trial Ordered to Be Transferred]

In view of the foregoing circumstances, the court is of the opinion that a transfer of the place of trial of this case to the District of Delaware would be both in the interest of the convenience of witnesses and in the interest of justice. No reason is discernible, on the other hand, why it should be tried here.

Motion of defendant for a change of venue from the District of Columbia to the District of Delaware, is granted.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Dairy Business—Motion To Dismiss Indictment Denied.—In a criminal action charging eight dairy companies with conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act, motions to dismiss the indictment on grounds that (1) the restraints alleged were in intrastate commerce and that (2) no substantial effect upon interstate commerce is directly alleged, are denied. The transactions complained of, namely, refraining from offering inducements to persuade customers to change from one defendant to another and refraining from soliciting other defendants' customers were held to have occurred "in commerce among the several states."

Memorandum

BARNES, J. P.: This case came on to be heard on the motions of the defendants to dismiss the indictment.

Eight of the dairy companies doing business in the so-called Chicago area are charged by the indictment in this case with a conspiracy in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. The conspiracy charged related to sales made by defendants to certain of their wholesale customers and certain named institutions. The conspiracy is alleged to have existed for approximately seven years. It is described as a conspiracy to allocate wholesale customers by (1) refraining from offering inducements to persuade customers to change from one defendant to another, (2) refraining from soliciting other defendants' customers unless such customers were dissatisfied, (3) refraining from soliciting other defendants' customers who had temporarily discontinued business or sold their business without the removal of the store fixtures, and (4) either not to bid or to bid more than the bid of the possible supplier of the thirteen named institutions.

[Grounds of Motion]

The grounds for the various motions are, generally, the same, and are as follows. (a) The restraints alleged were in intrastate commerce; (b) no substantial effect upon interstate commerce is directly alleged or demonstrated by facts alleged in the indictment; and (c) the indictment does not allege an unreasonable restraint of trade or allege facts which demonstrate such a restraint.

[Motion Overruled]

The court was inclined to think that the defendants' points "a" and "b" were well founded and was about to file a memorandum indicating that the indictment might be dismissed for those reasons when the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit announced its opinion in the case of Standard Oil Company v. Federal Trade Commission on March 11, 1949. In the court's opinion, the rationale of the decision of the court in that case requires the holding that the transactions complained of in the case at bar occurred "in commerce among the several states."

The motions to dismiss may be overruled and denied. Appropriate orders may be made, on notice.

Robinson-Patman Act

Secret Rebates—Attack on Constitutionality—Motion To Dismiss Denied.—Motions to dismiss indictments charging two milk companies with paying exclusive rebates to favored customers in violation of Section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act were denied. The Court held that the transactions complained of occurred "in the course of commerce". While expressing doubt as to the constitutionality of the Statute, the Court resisted arguments as to the vague and indefinite nature of both Section 3 and the indictment and as to the unreasonable interference with freedom of contract resulting from enforcement of this Section and declared it inexpedient to determine constitutional questions upon a motion if there was likelihood that the production of evidence would make the answer clearer.

See the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2219.

For plaintiff: Otto Kerner, Jr., Melville C. Williams, Chicago, Illinois.

For defendants Bowman Dairy Company et al.: Leo F. Tierney & Donald M. Graham, Louis E. Hart & L. Edward Hart, Jr., Chicago, Illinois.

For defendants Borden Company et al.: Howard Neitzert, Lloyd S. McClelland, Sidley, Austin, Burgess & Harper, Edwin Clark Davis, Joseph A. Greaves, Chicago, Illinois.

Memorandum

BARNES, J. P.: These cases are before the court on motions of the defendants to dismiss the indictments.

[Violation Charged]

Both indictments charge violations of that portion of Section 3 of the Robinson Patman Act, next hereinafter set forth:

> "It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to be a party to, or assist in, any transaction of sale, or contract to sell, which discriminates to his knowledge against competitors of the purchaser, in that, any discount, rebate, allowance, or advertising service charge is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate, allowance, or advertising service charge available at the time of such transaction to said competitors in respect of a sale of goods of like grade, quality, and quantity;"

[Allegations]

In No. 48CR361 it is alleged that Bowman Dairy Company by contract agreed to pay The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company a certain lump sum rebate, discount and allowance and a continuing secret percentage rebate, discount and allowance on all its purchases of milk and cream subsequent to May 30, 1942, in consideration of the agreement of The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company to continue to purchase milk and cream from the Bowman Dairy Company, that such rebates, discounts and allowances continued until March, 1948, and were not made available to competitors of The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company.

In No. 48CR362 it is alleged that The Borden Company, by two separate contracts, agreed to pay The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company and the Jewel Tea Company, Inc., respectively, secret percentage rebates, discounts and allowances in consideration of their agreement to continue to purchase milk and cream from The Borden Company, that these contracts were performed by the parties from about July 1, 1942, until March, 1948, and that such rebates, discounts and allowances were not made available to the competitors of The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company or of the Jewel Tea Company, Inc.

[Grounds of Motions]

The motions of the defendants to dismiss are substantially alike. The grounds of the motion in No. 48CR362 are stated as follows:

"1. Section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act (15 U. S. C. 13a) is so vague and indefinite that it violates the Fifth and Sixth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

"2. The enforcement of Section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act (15 U. S. C. 13a) would constitute an unreasonable interference with freedom of contract in that the prohibitions of that section have no reasonable relation to any supposed evil to which such prohibitions may properly have been directed, all in violation of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"3. The indictment fails to charge an offense against the United States in that the alleged transactions complained of in the indictment were not in commerce or in the course of commerce as provided by Section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act (15 U. S. C. 13a).

"4. The indictment is so vague, indefinite and uncertain that it fails to inform the defendants of the nature or cause of the accusation, in violation of the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

[Constitutional Issue Raised On Motion]

After studying the carefully prepared briefs of counsel for the parties and after listening to the oral arguments of counsel and reading the transcripts of such oral arguments, the court has finally concluded that, though it be beset with doubts as to the constitutionality of the statute in question and doubts as to whether or not the transactions complained of occurred "in commerce" or "in the course of commerce", the court should, nevertheless, heed the admonition of the Supreme Court of the United States as set forth in such cases as Borden's Co. v. Baldwin, 293 U. S. 194 to the effect that "It is inexpedient to determine grave constitutional questions upon a demurrer to a complaint, or upon an equivalent motion, if there is a reasonable likelihood that the production of evidence will make the answer to the questions clearer." It may appropriately be added that, in the court's opinion, the rationale of the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in Standard Oil Company v. Federal Trade Commission, rendered March 11, 1949, requires the holding that the transactions complained of in the cases at bar occurred "in commerce" or "in the course of commerce."

The motions to dismiss may be overruled and denied. Appropriate orders may be made on notice.

Miller-Tydings Act

Contract Tender Below Established Prices—Acceptance by Government—Binding Contract Formed.—A retailer who offered to fill a government contract for bedspreads at a price below that established by fair trade agreements can not withdraw his bid after acceptance. A binding contract has been formed. There is no duty upon contracting officers of the Government to determine whether prices quoted by bidders conform to fair trade agreements.

See the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7288.

[Issue]

This Office is in receipt of a letter dated February 28, 1949, with enclosures, from the contracting officer, Veterans' Administration Hospital, Framingham, Massachusetts, wherein a decision is requested as to whether the Abbott & Litchfield Company may be permitted to withdraw its accepted bid for the stated reason that the price specified therein is below that prescribed by the "Fair Trade Law" apparently the Fair Trade Act of August 17, 1937, 50 Stat. 693, 15 U. S. Code, section 1.

[Facts]

The Veterans' Administration Hospital, Framingham, Massachusetts, by invitation No. 49-336, requested bids—to be opened January 31, 1949—for furnishing 100 bedspreads to be Bates Fabrics No. 8670-8672, or equal. In response to the invitation, the Abbott & Litchfield Company submitted a bid dated January 28, 1949, wherein it offered to furnish Bates No. 8672 bedspreads for $4.68 each. The bid of the company being the lowest received—the only other bid having been submitted by Bates Fabrics, Inc., in the amount of $4.80 each—was accepted on January 31, 1949.

In a letter dated February 17, 1949, addressed to the Veterans' Administration Hospital, Framingham, Massachusetts, the company requested permission to withdraw its bid for the reason that "At the time we submitted the bid, we did not know anything about a Fair Trade Law which would prevent a dealer or jobber from selling these spreads below the established price of $5.17 each."

[Law Applicable]

Section 1 of the act of August 17, 1937, supra, relating to the illegality of contracts in restraint of trade provides, in substance, that nothing therein shall render illegal, contracts or agreements prescribing minimum prices for the resale of a commodity which bears the trade mark, brand, or name of the producer or distributor, when contracts or agreements of that description are lawful as applied to intra-state transactions under any statute, law, or other policy now or thereafter in effect in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in which such resale is made.

[Duty on Party Who Bids]

The bid of the Abbott & Litchfield Company appears to have been as intended at the time it was submitted. After acceptance of its bid by the Government, the company apparently concluded that its bid price was less than the price for which it had agreed with the manufacturer to sell the bedspreads. The matter of determining the price at which the bedspreads were to be offered to the Government was upon the bidder. The act of August 17, 1937, supra, does not impose any duty upon contracting officers of the Government to determine whether prices quoted by bidders are in conformity with the requirements of any agreements which the manufacturers and suppliers of the products may have entered into pursuant to said act. The matter of bidding is not the responsibility of the contracting officer of the Government, the duty of the contracting officer being to accept the lowest responsible bid meeting the requirements of the specifications.

[Acceptance Consummates Valid Contract]

The present record indicates that the acceptance of the bid of the Abbott & Litchfield Company was made in good faith, there being nothing on the face of the bid to indicate the existence of mistake and no error having been alleged by the company until after award. Consequently, there would appear to be no basis on which it could be held that the acceptance of the bid did not consummate a valid and binding contract.

[Duty To Deliver at Price Specified]

Accordingly, if Abbott & Litchfield Company fails to deliver the bedspreads at the price specified therefor in its bid and the bedspreads are procured from other sources, the excess cost, if any, should be charged to the company.

The contracting officer is not entitled to a decision—the contract having been awarded (Cf. 16 Comp. Gen. 565)—but since a decision in the matter appears necessary, it is being rendered to you.

The papers which accompanied the letter of February 28, 1949, are transmitted herewith.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Alleged Conspiracy in Paint and Varnish Industry—Motion To Dismiss Indictment Denied—Motion for Bill of Particulars Denied.—In criminal prosecutions charging corporations and individuals engaged in various phases of the paint and varnish industry with conspiracy to violate the Sherman Act, motions to dismiss the indictments and in the alternative for a Bill of Particulars made by certain of the defendants were denied. It was held that the indictments were drawn in compliance with Rule 7 (c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and satisfy the Constitutional requirements by charging the offense with such definiteness and certainty as to inform the defendants of the nature and the cause of the accusations, enabling them to prepare their defenses. From the nature of the offense charged it is apparent that the negotiations, transactions, and dealings between the defendants and others are complicated, involved and voluminous, and to restrict the Government in presenting its case seems to be unwarranted. The defendants' motion seek, in great detail, matters relating to overt acts and evidence. These are not proper demands of a bill of particulars in this conspiracy charge under the Sherman Act.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1630.225, 1630.355.

For plaintiff: Edward R. Kenney, Special Assistant to the Attorney General.

For defendants E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Company and Henry Lackey: Earl F. Reed, Pittsburgh, Pa.; William C. O'Neill, Pittsburgh, Pa.; Charles A. Horsky, Washington, D. C.; Orm W. Ketcham, Washington, D. C.

For defendant Columbus Varnish Company and Walter S. Hanna: Obed K. Price, Pittsburgh, Pa.

For defendant The Glidden Company and E. C. Shurtleff: John A. Duncan, Clifton M. Kolb, Cleveland, Ohio.

[Parties]

McVicar, N. J.: Indictments at numbers 12789 and 12790 charge seventeen corporate defendants and twenty-one individual defendants engaged in various phases of the paint and varnish industry with conspiracy to violate the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, Title 15 U. S. C. A. 1.

E. I. Dupont De Nemours & Co., Columbus Varnish Co., and The Glidden Co., corporate defendants, and individuals, Henry Lackey, Walter S. Hanna and E. C. Shurtleff have moved to dismiss the indictments or in the alternative for a Bill of Particulars. The other defendants have pleaded nolo contendere and paid fines pursuant to sentences of this court.

[Nature of Charges]

Indictment No. 12789 charges certain defendants with conspiracy to fix and control prices of paints, varnishes, enamels and lacquers in restraint of interstate commerce, and indictment No. 12790 charges certain defendants with conspiracy to fix and control prices of wood finishes, the charges are essentially the same in the two indictments. Since the grounds urged in support of the motions are the same, both cases will be disposed of by this opinion.

The indictments charge that beginning in or about the year 1937 (the date in number 12790 is 1940) and continuing thereafter to the date of the return of this indictment, the defendants have engaged in a combination and conspiracy to fix, stabilize, maintain and control the prices, discounts, allowances, and terms of sale of paints, varnishes, enamels and lacquers in restraint of interstate trade and commerce; and that the combination and conspiracy has consisted of a continuing agreement and concert of action among the defendants. The indictments set forth the substantial terms of the alleged agreement and concert of action.

[Grounds of Motions To Dismiss]

The defendants' motions to dismiss allege that the indictments are in violation of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States and do not meet the requirements of Rule 7 (c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

The Fifth Amendment provides:

> ". . . Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb."

The Sixth Amendment provides:

> "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation. . . ."

Rule 7 (c) of F. R. Criminal P. provides:

> "The indictment . . . shall be a plain, concise and definite statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged. . . . It need not contain a formal commencement, a formal conclusion or any other matter not necessary to such statement. It may be alleged in a single count that the means by which the defendant committed the offense are unknown. . . ."

Although Rule 7 (c) has made it unnecessary to charge an offense with the precision and detail as was formerly required, it has long been well settled that in charging a conspiracy under the Sherman Act, overt acts, other than the conspiracy itself, need not be pleaded or proved. Nash v. United States, 229 U. S. 373, (1913); United States v. Socony Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150, 252, (1940). In addition, it is not necessary to describe a conspiracy with the same degree of particularity as required in describing a substantive offense. Mercer v. United States, 61 F. (2d) 97, (CCA3, 1932).

The indictments here in question not only charge the defendants with the offense substantially in the words of the Sherman Act, but also set forth the details of the crime by listing the terms of the "agreement and concert of action".

[Indictment Held To Comply With Requirements]

It is the opinion of the court that these indictments are drawn in compliance with Rule 7 (c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and satisfy the Constitutional requirements by charging the offense with sufficient definiteness and certainly to inform the defendants of the nature and cause of the accusations against them to enable them to adequately prepare their defenses, and, to plead an acquittal or conviction thereunder in bar of any other proceeding against them based on the same subject matter.

The defendants' motions to dismiss must be denied.

[Bill of Particulars Denied]

Although an indictment sets forth the facts constituting the essential elements of the offense with such certainty that it cannot be pronounced bad on a motion to dismiss, a defendant is entitled to a bill of particulars where the charge in the indictment is couched in such language that the defendant may be prejudicially surprised at the trial. However, these indictments set forth the conspiracy in sufficient detail to enable the defendants to adequately prepare their defenses without the threat of being surprised at the trial.

From the nature of the offense charged it is apparent that the negotiations, transactions, and dealings between the defendants and others are complicated, involved and voluminous, and to restrict the government in presenting its case seems to be unwarranted. The defendants' motions seek, in great detail, matters relating to overt acts and evidence. These are not proper demands of a bill of particulars in this conspiracy charge under the Sherman Act. See: Swift & Co., v. United States, 196 U. S. 375, (1905); Nash v. United States, 229 U. S. 373, (1913); and United States v. General Electric Co., 40 Fed. Supp. 627, (S. D. N. Y., 1941).

The defendants Motions for Bill of Particulars must be denied.

[¶ 62,406] Opinion of the Attorney General of Minnesota.

417-E, Addressed to George E. Frogner, Fillmore County Attorney, Harmony, Minnesota, by J. A. A. Burnquist, Attorney General, by Charles E. Houston, Assistant Attorney General. March 23, 1949.

Minnesota Unfair Trade Practices Act

Rule of Evidence—Elements of the Offense of Unfair Discrimination.—The crime of unfair discrimination consists of selling below cost for the purpose or with the effect of injuring competitors. Section 325.52 is an evidentiary rule to assist in establishing the violation. If the rule is overcome by evidence showing no intent to injure competitors and that the conduct did not have that effect, then there is no evidence of crime.

See the Minnesota Unfair Trade Practices Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8428.17.

[Review of Sections]

Your letter of March 19 calls for consideration of M. S. A. 325.52. This section of the statutes creates a rule of evidence. When the facts therein enumerated exist, the rule applies. The only effect of Sec. 325.52 is that when a retailer sells at less than the price specified, it is prima facie evidence of the violation of Secs. 325.02 to 325.07. This includes Sec. 325.04. That section defines conduct which constitutes the crime of unfair discrimination. The elements of that crime are (1) selling, offering for sale, or advertising for sale a commodity or goods at less than cost to the vendor, or giving or advertising the intent to give such goods, (2) for the purpose, or with the effect, of injuring competitors and destroying competition. If the conduct involved is not for the purpose or with the effect of injuring competitors and destroying competition, it makes no difference whether or not the sale is below cost. That is as much an essential element of the crime as the selling below cost. And Sec. 325.52 establishes only a rule of evidence. If the rule is overcome by other competent evidence showing that the vendor had no intent to injure competitors, had no intent to destroy competition, and that the conduct complained of did not have that effect, then there is no evidence of crime.

[No Intent or Effect, No Crime]

Standing alone, the facts which you relate in your letter, without showing any intent on the part of the merchant and without showing the effect named in the statute, do not constitute a crime.

Too much attention is usually given to the prima facie evidence rule without consideration of Sec. 325.04.

Restrictive Covenant in Employment Contract Upheld—Reasonable Restraint—Constitutional Prohibition.—In an action taken by a proprietor of a laundry business against a former employee on a covenant in which the latter agreed not to enter into a similar business within a given area for one year after the termination of his services, the contract sued upon was upheld and declared not to offend a state provision voiding contracts whose purpose or effect was to lessen competition or encourage monopoly. Since the restrictions were effective for one year they were found to be reasonable as to time and since they applied only to those portions of the three counties where the employer's business was operated they were reasonable as to area.

By the Court: 1. Article 4, section 4, paragraph 1 of the Constitution of 1945 is in substance the same as article 4, section 2, paragraph 4 of the Constitution of 1877, and its meaning is that fixed by construction by this court in State v. Central Railway Co., 109 Ga. 716 (35 S. E. 37), while it was a part of the previous constitution, and it does not declare any new principle of law and has the same meaning as the Code, § 20-504.

2. The restrictive clause in the contract of employment in the present case is supported by a sufficient consideration in the form of mutual promises and has been rendered definite by performance of the main contract, and being reasonable as to time and area is not void under the above stated clause of the constitution or section of the Code.

[Review of Facts]

The petition of R. M. Vandegriff, doing business as Superior Laundry, against W. B. Griffin and Lee Kennedy, individually, and doing business as Hendricks Laundry, alleged that the petitioner had been injured in the sum of $5000 as a result of the employment of the defendant Griffin by the defendant Kennedy in violation of a contract between the petitioner and the defendant Griffin. The contract relied upon and attached to the petition as exhibit shows that it was executed on December 17, 1946, by the terms of which the petitioner employed the defendant Griffin to call for and deliver laundered and unlaundered goods and to perform such other duties as may be required of him for a compensation of "a percentage of all monies collected in his territory, the amount to be agreed upon," for all laundry and dry cleaning brought in, delivered, and collected for and such additional wages, if any, as may from time to time be agreed upon. The contract recited that such employment enabled the employee to discover and acquire the method of doing business and to become skilled in that business and contained a clause whereby the employee agreed that he would not at any time, while in such employ, or within one year after leaving the same, "call for, deliver, or solicit laundered or unlaundered goods for himself or any other person, persons or company, nor will he directly or indirectly solicit, divert, take away, or attempt to solicit, divert, or take away any of the customers, business or patronage of such customers, within such one year after leaving the services of said party of the first part, in the portion of section which he had served while in the service of the party of the first part. Fulton, DeKalb and Gwinnett Counties of Georgia." The petition alleged that Griffin entered the employment of the petitioner immediately after the date of the contract and continued in his employ until November 6, 1948, at which time he resigned after having given two weeks notice, and that a partial list of customers furnished to the defendant Griffin upon his entering the employment of the petitioner is attached to the petition as an exhibit. Griffin solicited the business of the customers on behalf of the petitioner from the date of his employment to the date of his resignation. The petitioner has been advised and believes it to be true that on November 8, 1948, the defendant entered into an agreement with the defendant Kennedy and Hendricks Laundry whereby Griffin agreed to call for and solicit unlaundered goods and deliver them to Kennedy individually and as Hendricks Laundry. The goods were to be laundered for and on behalf of the defendant Griffin. On November 8, 1948, Griffin contacted the customers of the petitioner listed in Exhibit "B" attached to the petition and secured from them unlaundered goods which he took and turned over to the defendant Kennedy and Hendricks Laundry to be laundered. Kennedy and Hendricks Laundry have been advised that Griffin had been employed by the petitioner, and Kennedy advised the petitioner that he would not stop taking unlaundered goods from Griffin but would continue to do so. By such conduct Kennedy and Hendricks Laundry are aiding the defendant Griffin to violate his contract with the petitioner, which contract remains in force until November 6, 1948. The petitioner has no adequate remedy at law.

The prayers were for an injunction against Griffin during the period of one year from November 6, 1948, from soliciting, serving, or catering to any of the customers of the petitioner whom Griffin served during his employment with the petitioner, that Griffin be enjoined from being interested in or connected with any other person soliciting, serving, and catering to any of the petitioner's customers, and that the defendant

Kennedy be enjoined from aiding the defendant Griffin in violating his contract with the petitioner, and that the petitioner recover a judgment in the sum of $5000 and costs of this proceeding.

The exception here is to the judgment overruling the general demurrer filed by the defendant Griffin to the petition.

1. Article 4, section 4, paragraph 1 of the Constitution of 1945 is as follows:

> "All contracts and agreements which may have the effect, or be intended to have the effect, to defeat or lessen competition, or to encourage monopoly, shall be illegal and void. The General Assembly of this State shall have no power to authorize any such contract or agreement."

With minor changes in sentence structure the quoted clause was taken from article 4, section 2, paragraph 4, of the Constitution of 1877, which was as follows:

> "The General Assembly of this State shall have no power to authorize any corporation to buy shares, or stock, in any other corporation in this State, or elsewhere, or to make any contract, or agreement whatever, with any such corporation, which may have the effect, or be intended to have the effect, to defeat or lessen competition, or to encourage monopoly; and all such contracts and agreements shall be illegal and void."

If this clause of the constitution is ambiguous, the construction placed thereon, while it was a part of the provisions of the Constitution of 1877, in State v. Central Railway Co., 109 Ga. 716 (35 S. E. 37), would be controlling as to its meaning in the present Constitution. Thompson, Lieutenant Governor, v. Talmadge, 201 Ga. 867 (41 S. E. 2d, 883). But if it be unambiguous we would not be authorized to look beyond its actual verbiage to find its meaning, but would be required to give it that meaning which is expressed. It would neither require nor permit a construction which would cause it to mean anything other than that clearly revealed by its own terms. Neal v. Moultrie, 12 Ga. 104, 110; Standard Steel Works v. Williams, 155 Ga. 177 (2d) (116 S. E. 636); State v. Camp, 189 Ga. 209 (6 S. E. 2d, 299); New Amsterdam Casualty Co. v. McFarley, 191 Ga. 334, 337 (12 S. E. 2d, 355); 11 AM. Jur. 678, § 64; 16 C. J. S. 67, § 29. Were it permissible under controlling rules of construction to lift from the context the words thereof one at a time, and while thus isolated, attach the full meaning of each word, then it would appear that the verbiage of this clause would render void any contract or agreement which had the effect of defeating or lessening competition of every kind whatsoever, irrespective of the nature of the enterprise or the public welfare or the legitimate interest of the parties or the degree to which such competition is either defeated or lessened. Such an interpretation would manifestly apply to all contests in athletics, in schools, in politics, and even in the church, and indeed would practically paralyze the whole scope of human relationships. But the law has wisely decreed a rule of construction which does not permit such procedure. The words of this clause under the established rule must be construed in connection with the context with which they are used. Thompson, Lieutenant Governor, v. Talmadge, supra. In the light of the applicable rules of construction is it not thus demonstrated that the clause here considered is obviously ambiguous? Since the verbiage does not limit in any respect the application of the prohibition against defeating competition, it is only by judicial construction in harmony with the established rules of law that proper limitation as to such application can be made. It is unsafe to apply to the constitution or to statutes a literal construction in every instance. In Vol. 2 Sutherland, Statutory Construction, 3rd ed., p. 316, § 4502, it is said:

> "A word is but a sumbol which may stand for one of an innumerable number of objects. It is only as custom and usage and agreement attach a particular meaning to a particular word that it has any significance in relation to either a tangible or an intangible object."

So it is with the word "competition" when used as here in the constitution. But, as pointed out in State v. Central Railway Co., supra, the custom and usage of this word in the common law has attached to it a particular meaning. In 12 Harvard Law Review, p. 417, Mr. Justice Holmes says:

> "It is not true that in practice . . . a given word or even a given collocation of words has one meaning and no other. A word generally has several meanings, even in the dictionary. You have to consider the sentence in which it stands to decide which of those meanings it bears in the particular case, and very likely will see that it there has a shade of significance more refined than any given in the word-book."

We think the disastrous result of a literal construction in all cases is demonstrated by Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, p. 36, as follows:

> "If a literal meaning had been given to the laws which forbade a layman to 'lay hands' on a priest, and punished all who drew blood in the street, the layman who wounded a priest with a weapon would not have fallen within the prohibition, and the surgeon who bled a person in the street to save his life, would have been liable to punishment."

We believe the foregoing quotations are quite sufficient to underline the vital necessity for judicial interpretation in order to effectuate and not defeat the intent of the constitution. That there is need for judicial interpretation is enough within itself to render the law ambiguous. It necessarily follows that the clause here involved requires construction to prevent it from having effect beyond the scope ever intended. Consequently, we revert to the rule of construction first above mentioned and apply the same as being controlling here. The clause, while a part of the previous constitution, was construed as stated in State v. Central Railway Co., supra. It was there ruled that it was not intended to declare a new principle of law, but that the sole purpose of the clause was to declare the common law against restraint of trade and monopoly. The opinion cited in what is now Code, § 20-504, which renders contracts in general restraint of trade void, and quotes from a number of decisions of this court construing that section and holding that it prohibits only general restraints, and that partial restraints are not thereby rendered void. It is apparent that this court considered the constitutional provision to mean precisely the same thing which the Code section has been construed to mean. It simply held that preventing competition and restraining trade were synonymous terms. In so holding, this court was in harmony with numerous decisions of other jurisdictions and the statement of this principle in 19 R. C. L., p. 36, § 20, which is as follows:

> "The distinction, however, is scarcely practical, because whatever restrains trade prevents competition, and whatever prevents competition in trade necessarily restrains trade."

We have good authority for holding that in lifting this clause from the constitution of 1877 there was no intention to cure some defect, remedy some evil or in any manner change the existing law. See Minutes of Constitutional Commission, Vol. 1, p. 185. As ruled in State v. Central Railway Co., supra, where the language does not indicate an intention to declare some new principle, sound construction requires that it be construed to have intended no more than merely to state the law as it existed at the time.

What, then, is the meaning which we are required by law to give this clause of the constitution by construction? Obviously, it was intended to be in harmony with the existing right to contract which is guaranteed by the 14th amendment to the Federal Constitution. In West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U. S. 379 (1), it was held:

> "Deprivation of liberty to contract is forbidden by the constitution if without due process of law; but restraint or regulation of this liberty, if reasonable in relation to its subject and if adopted for the protection of the community against evils menacing the health, safety, morals and welfare of the people, is due process."

To the same effect, see Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578; Chicago & C. R. Co. v. McGuire, 219 U. S. 549 (31 Sup. Ct. 259, 55 L. ed. 328); Bayside Fish Co. v. Gentry, 297 U. S. 422, 427; Morehead v. N. Y. ex rel. Tipaldo, 298 U. S. 587; City of Newman v. Atlanta Laundries Inc., 174 Ga. 99 (162 S. E. 497). The extent to and the purpose for which this right of contract may be abridged in order to prevent monopoly is indicated in Fowle v. Park, 131 U. S. 88, 97, where it is said:

> "Public welfare is first considered, and if it be not involved, and the restraint upon one party is not greater than protection to the other requires, the contract may be sustained."

It would appear that so long as the contract does not adversely affect the interest of the public or injure the obligor beyond what is necessary to protect the legitimate rights of the obligee, it is valid under the laws of this State as they now exist. To apply this rule to individual cases it is necessary, therefore, to discover if the contract involved is reasonable in these respects. Numerous decisions of this court, applying the provisions of the Code, § 20-504, have held that such contracts when reasonable as to time and area of restrictions are not void under that section, the latest of which are Black v. Horowitz, 203 Ga. 294; Orkin Exterminating Co. v. Dewberry, — Ga. — (51 S. E. 2d 669).

[Reasonable Exercise of Right to Contract]

2. Having ruled in the preceding division of this opinion that the new constitution in no wise changed the law with respect to contracts in restraint of trade or which defeat or lessen competition, it remains only to test the contract here involved by the applicable rules of law long followed. Mutual obligations in a contract are sufficient consideration to sustain it. Code, § 20-304. Where as here there has been performance of a contract of employment, its performance is sufficient to make definite the compensation payable for the service rendered, although the contract itself was indefinite in this respect, and such performance is likewise a sufficient consideration to support the ancillary restrictive agreement here sued upon. Therefore, the contract is not subject to the attack made, that it was without consideration. While the recitals in the contract as to the nature of the employer's business and the necessity for protection against use by the employee, after the employment terminated, of knowledge gains of the said business must be supported by evidence upon the trial, yet when and if so supported, it will show a case which would justify the restrictions provided in the contract. Then since the restrictions are effective for a period of only one year, they are clearly reasonable as to time, and since they apply only to those portions of the three counties where the employer's business is operated, they are reasonable as to area, and, consequently, the contract in question is but an exercise of the right to contract and does not offend any law of this State. It follows that the petition alleged a cause of action, and the court did not err in overruling the defendant's general demurrer.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. E 50-59. April 13, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Motion To Strike Allegations Denied—When Evidence of Previous Decisions Admissible—Rule as to Admissibility.—A motion to strike parts of a petition reciting the history of the criminal and civil actions instituted against the plaintiff and disposed of by a plea of nolo contendere and a consent decree is denied. Those actions might play an important role in the history of the issue to be tried and there was no apparent reason why the trial judge should not be aware of them. It was held to be for the trial judge to decide whether evidence as to the previous actions was properly admissible. The Court may take for its own use evidence no party would have a right to force upon it.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.614.

For plaintiff: Robert W. Byerly and Archibald Cox, New York, N. Y.

For defendant: Edward D. Bolton, New York, N. Y.

KNOX, D. J., District Judge: Plaintiff's motion to strike portions of defendant's petition of December 17, 1948 is denied.

Plaintiff, it appears, is particularly concerned with allegations contained in paragraphs 3 and 33 to 36.

These latter portions of Marr's petition recite the history of the criminal and civil actions which were disposed of by a plea of nolo contendere, and a consent decree, respectively. Dick objects that neither the plea nor the decree is evidence in this proceeding, and are therefore improperly averred.

Ordinarily, the rule announced in Alden-Rochelle v. Ascap, 3 F. R. D. 157, D. C. N. Y., 1942, with respect to the Ohio transactions, would be followed, but in this proceeding, I am of opinion that the rule is inapplicable. The above mentioned actions may possibly play an important role in the history of the issue about to be tried, and there is no reason apparent why the trial judge should not be aware of them. In Root Refining Co. v. Universal Oil Products Co., 168 F. 2d 514, C. C. A. 3rd, 1948, the Court did not blind itself to the fact that Judge Davis had been indicted.

Thus, for the moment, the allegations to which Dick objects should stand until the trial judge decides whether or not evidence in connection therewith is properly admissible on the theory that, as was said in a recent reorganization case, the court "may take for its own use evidence no party would have a right to force upon it." Comstock v. Group of Investors, 335 U. S. 211, 227, 1948.

Paragraph 3 alleges that plaintiff conspired to restrain trade and to monopolize, and did restrain trade and monopolize, and that, pursuant to such purpose, it conducted oppressive patent litigation by predatory means and forced competitors to enter into consent decrees and other restrictive arrangements, by concealing and fraudulently suppressing evidence. It is here contended that this paragraph is "impertinent and immaterial." Rule 12, F. R. C. P. While the conclusory form of the paragraph may not represent the best form of pleading, the allegations do contain an offer of proof of which the trial judge may wish to avail himself, especially so in a proceeding such as this. 2 Moore's Federal Practice (2d ed.), 2317.

Paragraph 30 alleges that Dick surreptitiously induced one Hugo Schlatter, a chemical expert hired by Marr, to assist in the defense of this litigation, to leave the employ of Marr and enter the employ of Dick. Dick charges that this allegation is irrelevant, and was put at rest by Judge Patterson's original decision in this suit. At this juncture, it can not be determined that the allegations are impertinent and irrelevant. It must be remembered that respondent's prosecution of the instant case may have been a fraud upon the courts. For this reason, I think a "law of the case" argument can not be entertained.

Other paragraphs are objected to on the ground that they are repetitious of the Government's "Notice of Issue and Facts Bearing Thereon To Be Presented By United States, Amicus Curiae," and because they are said to be immaterial, lengthy, and argumentative. On all these points I hold against the movant.

Motion denied.

California Cartwright Act

Agreement Not To Sell a Commodity—Union Objectives Restrain Trade—Injunction Granted.—A contract between retailers and a union which provided that frozen meat would not be sold during the hours that meat cutters were not employed by a retailer was held to be a combination in restraint of trade even though its primary purpose was to achieve labor benefits. Since the Act did not expressly prevent this type of relief, an injunction to restrain performance of the proposed contract was granted at the instance of manufacturers of frozen meat.

See the California Cartwright Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8075.

For plaintiffs: Ben Gould, Los Angeles, California.

For defendants: McLaughlin, McGinley & Hanson, David Sokol, Los Angeles, California.

[Issue Defined]

HANSON, J.: The primary question presented is whether a provision in a contract, about to be entered into by and between the defendant retailers and the defendant meat cutters union, which will prohibit the retailers from selling packaged frozen meats during the hours the meat cutters are not employed by a retailer, is violative of our laws against restraints in trade and, if so, whether the plaintiffs who are engaged in freezing, packaging and selling meats to the defendant retailers are entitled not only to damages but an injunction as well. Other provisions of the contract such as those that limit the hours the members of the union are to be employed and which prohibit their employment on Sundays and holidays are not here involved.

At the hearing of this cause I expressed the view that the provision of the contract above referred to was a proper labor objective. Since then, upon a review of the cases I have concluded that I was in error.

[Purpose of Contract]

The plain purpose of the contract in the aspect mentioned is to place an embargo upon the sale by the retailers of packaged, frozen meats during such hours as their stores are open for the sale of merchandise, unless the hours coincide with those of the meat cutters. The union's aim in limiting the sale of packaged meats to such hours only as its members are employed in the stores of the retailers is not only to prohibit consumers from purchasing the packaged meats after hours but also to cause consumers to purchase fresh meats from its member employees in preference to purchasing the frozen packaged meat from other clerks, and thereby to tend to increase the employment of more of its own union members at each retail outlet.

Unquestionably the provision is not only of direct benefit to the union and its members in the manner stated but undoubtedly it also gives rise to other incidental benefits. But, be that as it may, the vital question here is whether the provision may be said to be reasonably related to either working conditions or the bargaining power of the union members. In short, is it a proper labor objective and if it is, may it be sustained as against our laws against restraint of trade?

[Contract with Union May Restrain Trade]

The first contention of the defendant Union is that the action is not maintainable against it because by our statute against restraints of trade, trade labor unions are excluded therefrom. The answer to that is that the provision relied upon is a false quantity in a case such as this as was expressly held in Overland Pub. Co. v. H. S. Crocker Co., 193 Cal. 109, 117. It was there said: "Furthermore, the proviso in the Cartwright Act that labor, skilled or unskilled, is not a commodity within the meaning of the act does not authorize any such agreement as was here made between employers and employees."

[Union Conduct Not Privileged]

The next contention urged by the defendant Union is to the effect that the primary purpose back of the provision in the contract is to enlarge employment opportunities for its members and so may not be classed as an unlawful labor objective even though it has the effect of restraining trade. That this contention may not be sustained is the holding of the following cases.

[Authorities]

In Mayer Bros. Poultry Farms v. Meltzer, 80 N. Y. S. (2d) 874, the plaintiff was engaged in New Jersey in freezing, packaging and selling poultry. It arranged to sell its products in the retail food stores of New York City. The defendant Union of Meat Cutters, located in New York City, quickly discerned that it was to its advantage to exclude the products of the plaintiff and that thereby more of its own members would be employed. To that end it made demand upon the retailers to refuse to sell the products of the plaintiff. As a result of the demand agreements between the union and the retailers were entered into. The case, it will be noted, differs from the instant case only in that the embargo there was absolute, whereas in the instant case it is only partial. In the course of its opinion, the court said:

"The purpose of defendant's activities which are sought to be enjoined, as alleged in the complaint and moving affidavits and admitted in an affidavit by defendant's president, is to keep away from the New York City market all frozen kosher poultry slaughtered elsewhere. Plaintiff's frozen products had been making inroads in this area, and were evidently resulting in reductions in prices to consumers and in the quantity of poultry slaughtered in New York City. Defendant's aim is to limit this market to poultry which is slaughtered in this city, so as to obtain better wages due to a more favorable 'economic climate' than would otherwise prevail.

"The defendant contends that since wages may indirectly be affected, this is a legitimate labor objective. It is true that the pay of the shochtim from their employers varies with the quantity of animals which they kill, and that their remuneration is affected by the number of fowl that they slaughter. This is not different in principle from the basis on which any pieceworker is paid, and it does not transform into a labor matter every economic question affecting the volume of the employer's business. The defendant's contention overlooks the fact that there is no dispute concerning wage scales. It does not appear that any demands for a higher rate of pay have been made against the employers of defendant's members, let alone against plaintiff.

"A private embargo to prevent foodstuffs from entering New York City is not a lawful objective, and is not made so by using procedures which would be legitimate if directed toward the accomplishment of other purposes."

In Allen Bradley Co. v. Local Union, 325 U. S. 797, the defendant electrical union procured collective bargaining agreements with the contractors of New York City to employ only the defendant union's members and to install only such electrical equipment as was manufactured in New York City by equipment manufacturers who in turn employed only members of the self-same union. In the language of Justice Black:

"The union's consistent aim for many years has been to expand its membership, to obtain shorter hours and increased wages, and to enlarge employment opportunities for its members. To achieve this latter goal—that is, to make more work for its own members—the union realized that local manufacturers, employers of the local members, must have the widest possible outlets for their product.

"The union therefore waged aggressive campaigns to obtain closed shop agreements with all local electrical equipment manufacturers and contractors. Using conventional labor union methods, such as strikes and boycotts, it gradually obtained more and more closed shop agreements in the New York City area. Under these agreements, contractors were obligated to purchase equipment from none but local manufacturers who also had closed shop agreements with Local No. 3; manufacturers obligated themselves to confine their New York City sales to contractors employing the Local's members."

The court thereupon held that the effect was to restrain trade and that the arrangement was violative of the Sherman Act and was in no sense immunized by the labor objectives of the union.

As recently as April 4, 1949, the Supreme Court of the United States passed on questions here involved in the case of Giboney, et al. v. Empire Storage and Ice Co., — U. S. —. In that case a local ice and coal drivers union in Kansas City, Missouri, sought to induce nonunion ice peddlers to join the union, one of the objectives being to better wage and working conditions of the ice peddlers and their helpers. As most of the nonunion peddlers refused to join the union, the union set about to obtain from all Kansas City wholesale ice distributors agreements that they would not sell ice to nonunion peddlers. Agreements were obtained from all distributors except the Empire Storage and Ice Co. Thereupon the union peacefully picketed the Empire. Under the Missouri restraint of trade statutes, such an agreement is a crime punishable by fine of not more than $5,000 and by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not more than five years. Additionally, the statute provides that a person injured may institute an action for triple damages. Evidently the statute does not expressly provide that injunctions may be granted. In view of the situation, Empire sought to restrain the concerted efforts of the union on the ground that it was in violation of the anti-trade restraint statute and prayed for an injunction against the picketing. The union resisted, contending that they had the right to picket under the First and Fourteenth Amendments because there was a labor dispute and that the picketers published only the truthful information to the effect that Empire was selling ice to peddlers who were not members of the union. The trial court issued an injunction restraining the union from placing pickets or picketing around or about the buildings of Empire. The decision was upheld by the Supreme Court of Missouri. In the Supreme Court of the United States the union in attacking the Missouri statute challenged the power of the state to issue an injunction against their conduct since, as they asserted, the primary objective of their combination and picketing was to improve wages and the working conditions. In the language of the court:

> "On this premise they argued that their right to combine and to picket and to publish must be determined by focusing attention exclusively upon their lawful purpose to improve labor conditions, and that their violation of the state anti-trade restraint laws must be dismissed as merely incidental to this lawful purpose."

In speaking to that contention, Justice Black said:

> "It is contended that though the Missouri statute can be applied validly to combinations of businessmen who agree not to sell to certain persons, it cannot be applied constitutionally to combinations of union workers who agree in their self-interest to use their joint power to prevent sales to nonunion workers. This contention appears to be grounded on the guaranties of freedom of speech and press stemming from the Fourteenth and First Amendments. Aside from the element of disseminating information through peaceful picketers, later discussed, it is difficult to perceive how it could be thought that these constitutional guaranties afford labor union members a peculiar immunity from laws against trade restraint combinations, unless, as appellants contend, labor unions are given special constitutional protection denied all other people . . . To exalt all labor union conduct in restraint of trade above all state control would greatly reduce the traditional powers of states over their domestic economy and might conceivably make it impossible for them to enforce their antitrade restraint laws. . . .
> "It is contended that the injunction against picketing adjacent to Empire's place of business is an unconstitutional abridgement of free speech because the picketers were attempting peacefully to publicize truthful facts about a labor dispute . . . But the record here does not permit this publicizing to be treated in isolation. For, according to the pleadings, the evidence, the findings, and the argument of appellants, the sole immediate object of the publicizing adjacent to the premises of Empire, as well as the other activities of the appellants and their allies, was to compel Empire to agree to stop 'selling ice to nonunion peddlers.' Thus all of appellants' activities—their powerful transportation combination, their patrolling, their formation of a picket line warning union men not to cross at peril of their union membership, their publicizing—constituted a single and integrated course of conduct, which was in violation of Missouri's valid law. In this situation, the injunction did no more than enjoin an offense against a Missouri law,—a felony.
> "It rarely has been suggested that the constitutional freedom for speech and press extends its immunity to speech or writing used as an integral part of conduct in violation of a valid criminal statute. We reject the contention now . . ."
> "We think the circumstances here and the reasons advanced by the Missouri courts justify restraint of the picketing which was done in violation of Missouri's valid law for the sole immediate purpose of continuing a violation of law . .

"We hold that the state's power to govern in this field is paramount, and that nothing in the constitution guaranties of speech or press compels a state to apply or not to apply its antitrade restraint law to groups of workers, businessmen, or others. . . ."

We are not without pertinent authority in this state. Overland, etc. v. H. S. Crocker Co., 193 Cal. 109, was an action for double damages under the Cartwright Act (Restraint of Trade Act). In that case the plaintiff, a printing concern, alleged that the defendants, likewise printing concerns, had entered into an agreement among themselves and with certain unions which prohibited the members of the unions from working for the plaintiff so long as plaintiff continued to refuse to join the defendant employers union. It was held that the agreement was illegal. The court said:

"Therefore, as this agreement between the labor unions and the defendants (printing concern employers) resulted in a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade, it fell within the operation of the Cartwright Act, supra, notwithstanding the fact that some of the parties to the agreement were labor unions."

In view of the foregoing case it is plain that the last quotation above is applicable to the case here.

[Injunctive Relief Authorized]

The next contention that is urged by the defendants is that an injunction does not lie under the provisions of the Cartwright Act. To sustain this position the defendants refer to the following quotation found in Overland, etc. v. Union Lithographing Company, 57 Cay. App. 366, reading as follows:

"Furthermore, the statute gives no right to injunctive relief to a private person in a case of violation of the provisions of the act, but such a person is merely given a right to recover double damages. (Sec. 11, Stats. 1907, p. 984, as amended Stats. 1909, p. 594. See also, National Fireproofing Co. v. Mason Builders Assn., 169 Fed. 259 [26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 148, 94 C. C. A. 5251].)"

The statement is not only dicta, but, what is more, relies on a case which is likewise dicta on the point involved. Before discussing this phase of that case it should be noted that the defendants named therein comprised labor unions and printing concerns who had entered into the agreement referred to in Overland, etc. v. H. S. Crocker Co., in 193 Cal. 109. The District Court of Appeals held the complaint did not state a cause of action. Accordingly the statement of the court that an injunction could not issue under the Cartwright Act was obiter dicta. Inasmuch then as the statement is dicta it is not binding on this or any other court. Turning to the statute we find it gives a person injured by an agreement, conspiracy or combination in restraint of trade the right to recover double damages. The statute does not intimate that an injunction may not issue as is the case under the original Sherman Anti-Trust Act, which expressly provided that no injunction could issue except at the instance of the federal government. As the Cartwright Act, in the language of our Supreme Court in Speegle v. Board, 29 Cal. (2d) 34, merely articulates in greater detail a public policy against restraint of trade that has long been recognized at common law it would seem that the remedies at common law continue except to the extent they are expressly changed by the Act. The only remedy that is changed is the one which permits double damages rather than ordinary damages. Be that as it may, the restraint here is violative not only of the Cartwright Act, but of the common law as well. As was said in the Speegle case,

"Thus, under the common law of this state combinations entered into for the purpose of restraining competition and fixing prices are unlawful. * * * Combinations between insurers or insurers and insurance agents for the purpose of stifling competition in the insurance market and fixing insurance rates are clearly in violation of the common law rules against restraint of trade."

[City Ordinance]

Despite the holdings in the foregoing cases, the defendant Union contends that the provision for the stopping of meat sales at 6:00 p.m. and on Sundays and holidays was ruled to be a proper and lawful union objective in Smith Market v. Lyons, 16 Cal. (2d) 402. That case did not so rule. In that case the Union peacefully picketed the plaintiff's non-union market located in Long Beach, to induce it to enter into a contract with it to employ only members of the Union. It was held that this was a lawful objective and that the market was not entitled to an injunction against the Union merely because the agreement tendered to it by the Union contained a provision which required night and Sunday closing when a City ordinance required such closing. The provision was a lawful objective in that case because of the City ordinance and not otherwise.

Rosenberg v. Raskin, 80 C. A. (2d) 335, likewise cited by the defendants on this phase of the case, is not in point.

That equity will enjoin the violation of acts, combinations or agreements in restraint of trade upon the ground of avoiding a multiplicity of actions is well established by the authorities. Lee Leonard v. Abner-Drury Brewing Co., 25 App. D. C. 161; Hawarden v. Houghiogheny & L. Coal Co., 111 Wis. 545; 36 Am. Jur. "Monopolies" etc. § 214.

The demurrer are overruled. A preliminary injunction will issue along the lines of the restraining order.

Petition to review an order of the Federal Trade Commission. Petition dismissed and order affirmed.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Petition to Review Order Dismissed—Extent of Commission's Power to Enforce Statutes.—Petition to review a Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting use of the terms "unabridged," "complete and unabridged," or "full length novel," in connection with the sale of reprints of books, is dismissed where there is sufficient evidence that petitioners violated Section 5 (a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act. The fact that petitioners have discontinued their unlawful practices in part does not deprive the Commission of power to make such order as it determines necessary to prevent their revival. What order is necessary to enforce the statute fairly and adequately, after findings of particular violations have been made, is a matter as to which the judgment of the Commission is controlling, unless its discretion has been clearly abused.

Before CHASE, CLARK and FRANK, Circuit Judges.

[Nature of Action]

PER CURIAM: After due notice and hearing, the Federal Trade Commission ordered the petitioners, who publish and distribute magazines and books in interstate commerce, to cease and desist from certain practices in regard to reprints. A substantial part of the business of petitioners consists in reprinting and distributing in small paper covered books so-called western, detective and thriller stories.

[Requirements of Order]

The order in its negative aspects required them to refrain, in connection with the distribution of reprints from which substantial part of the original text had been deleted, from representing in any manner that they were "unabridged" or "complete and unabridged" or "full length novel" or any other term of similar import to designate or describe them.

In its affirmative aspects the order required the petitioners to put the word "abridged" on the front cover and title page of such reprints 'in immediate connection with the title and in clear, conspicuous type." If the reprint had an additional wrapper or cover bearing the title the word "abridged" was to be placed on that in a like way. All advertising of such reprints was required to indicate clearly that they were abridged "unless the title of each and every reprint so advertised be immediately accompanied in equally conspicuous type by the word abridged." Whenever a new title was used in place of the original it was required that "such substitute title be immediately accompanied, in equally conspicuous type, by the title under which such story was originally published."

[Findings Based on Adequate Evidence]

The Commission made findings on adequate evidence which establish the facts for us. Benton Announcements v. Federal Trade Commission, 2 Cir., 130 F. 2d 254, These facts show that the petitioners have violated Sec. 5(a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act. 52 Stat. 111; 15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 45(a). See Federal Trade Commission v. Standard Education Society, 302 U. S. 112.

[Commission's Power To Make Order]

Though they have discontinued their unlawful practices in part, that did not deprive the Commission of power to make such order as it determined necessary to prevent their revival. Federal Trade Commission v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 304 U. S. 257; National Silver Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 2 Cir., 88 F. 2d 425; Educators Association v. Federal Trade Commission, 2 Cir., 108 F. 2d 470. What order is necessary to enforce the statute fairly and adequately, after findings of particular violations have been made, is a matter as to which the judgment of the Commission is controlling unless its discretion has been clearly abused. Herzfeld v. Federal Trade Commission, 2 Cir., 140 F. 2d 207. No abuse has been shown.

[Order Affirmed]

Order affirmed.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Baseball and Interstate Commerce—Purpose of Injunctive Relief—Injunction Denied. —A motion of a professional baseball player for an injunction reinstating him into the baseball league was denied since the position of the parties would be altered and issues would be prematurely disposed of. In addition the litigant failed to show irreparable damage.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1650.275.

[Purpose of Motion]

CONGER, J.: Motion for a mandatory injunction compelling defendants to reinstate plaintiff as a player of the National or American League; or, in the alternative, restraining defendants from interfering with plaintiff in pursuit of his calling as a professional baseball player.

[Assuming Jurisdiction, Relief Denied]

Whether the Court has power to issue a preliminary injunction in an action for treble damages under the Anti-Trust Acts, I find it unnecessary to decide. Assuming it has, even though I doubt it, all of the reasons for denying a similar application in Martin, et ano v. Chandler, et al, decided April 1, 1949, apply here. It would disturb the status quo; and it would necessitate a premature disposition on disputed issues of law and fact. Further, the plaintiff has not made sufficient showing of irreparable damage pendente lite.

Motion denied.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil No. 48-736. April 21, 1949.

Sherman Act, Clayton Act

General Provisions as to Venue—Convenient Forum—Motion to Dismiss Denied.— In an action instituted in the Southern District of New York by a theatre company against a chain of film distributors, a motion by individual defendants who reside in the Northern District, to dismiss the action for lack of venue and in the alternative to have the action severed and transferred for improper venue or transferred on the ground of convenience was denied on all grounds. The court ruled that by virtue of Section 1406 (a) of the Judicial Code the action could not be dismissed even though venue was improper. As to the alternative plea, it was held that venue was supported by Section 1392 (a) of the Code relating to actions where defendants are located in the same state but in different districts. Having found the forum neither vexatious nor oppressive, a transfer on the ground of convenience was denied.

The Court ruled as to the priority to be given litigants in examining each other for evidence. As a general rule the party who serves his notice first is entitled to priority.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.291, 1640.619.

For plaintiffs: Milton Pollack, Milton Handler, Richard F. Wolfson, Philip B. Kurland, Gerald Saperstein, all of New York, New York.

For defendants Schine Chain Theatres, Inc., Schine Circuit, Inc., Schine Theatrical Company, Inc., Schine Enterprises Corporation, Schine Lexington Corporation, Chesapeake Theatres Corporation, J. Myer Schine, Louis W. Schine, John A. May; Willard S. McKay, Cravath, Swaine & Moore, Alfred McCormack, Albert Rosenblum, all of New York, New York.

[Nature of Motion]

RYAN, J.: This action is brought under Section 7 of the Sherman Act, as amended, 26 Stat. 210, and Section 4 of the Clayton Act, as amended, 38 Stat. 731, 15 USCA 15, to recover treble damages.

The corporate defendants,—Schine Chain Theatres, Inc., Schine Circuit, Inc., Schine Theatrical Company, Inc., Schine Enterprises Corporation, Schine Lexington Corporation and Chesapeake Theatres Corporation, and the individual defendants—J. Myer Schine, Louis W. Schine and John A. May, move before answer to dismiss the action pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P., 12(b) (3), upon the ground that they are not amenable to suit in this district under the provisions of the anti-trust laws. In the alternative, they seek a transfer of the action to the Northern District of New York.

(1) Section 1406(a) of the Judicial Code provides,

> "The district court of a district in which is filed a case laying venue in the wrong division or district shall transfer such case to any district or division in which it could have been brought."

The provisions of this section are applicable to anti-trust actions notwithstanding the special venue provisions of the Clayton Act. The action may not be dismissed even though venue is improper; the issue on this motion then is, whether the action should be severed and transferred as to the moving defendants for improper venue under this section, or transferred on the ground of convenience under Section 1404(a), 3 Moore Federal Practice 2d. ed. p. 2141, Sec. 19.04.

[Residence of Parties]

Plaintiff, Auburn Capitol Theatre, is a New York corporation and plaintiff, Wallace, is a New York resident; both reside in the Northern District.

The defendants may be grouped as follows: (1) the "Schine" defendants, being those who were defendants in Schine Chain Theatres, Inc. v. United States, 334 U. S. 110; (2) Schine Chain Theatres of Ohio, Inc., and (3) five major and three minor distributors of motion pictures. Schine Chain Theatres of Ohio, Inc., apparently, is a defunct corporation; it was not served with process but was mistakenly joined as a defendant, it has not appeared and since it is not a party to this action may be disregarded on this motion.

All the distributor-defendants have answered with the exception of Radio-Keith Orpheum Corporation which has procured an extension of time. None of these defendants join in making the instant motion, but copies of the moving papers were served on them. None have appeared or submitted affidavits or memoranda. Whether this indicates indifference on their part or whether they feel that they are not parties to the motion because notice thereof was not addressed to them, we do not know. In any event, as to them venue is not in question.

The three individual defendants are residents of Fulton County in the Northern District of New York. Of these, J. Myer Schine was found and personally served in this district, and the other two in the Northern District.

The first five corporate defendants above-named are New York corporations; the sixth, Chesapeake Theatres Corporation, is a Maryland corporation. All have been served in this state and no motion has been made to quash service. For this motion, it must be taken that defendant, Chesapeake, transacts business within the state.

[General Provisions as to Venue]

It is not necessary here to determine whether venue is properly laid under the special venue provisions of the Clayton Act, for venue is supported by Section 1392(a) of the Code. This section relates to venue in actions where defendants are located in the same state, but in different districts. It provides that,

> "Any civil action, not of a local nature, against defendants residing in different districts in the same state, may be brought in any of such districts."

This action is not of a local nature and all the defendants, for purposes of venue, are deemed residents of this state. 28 USCA 1391(c).

Anti-trust plaintiffs are not deprived of the benefits of these general venue provisions. Cf. Sonken-Galamba Corporation v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 29 F. Supp. 796. The venue provisions of the anti-trust laws were enacted to give anti-trust plaintiffs special venue privileges in addition to those granted by general venue statutes. United States v. National City Lines, 334 U. S. 573; they were intended to facilitate the prosecution of anti-trust actions, not to replace or make unavailable general venue provisions. Under this section the action is properly brought in this district and the motion to dismiss (or more properly to sever and transfer) must be denied.

[Convenient Forum]

(2) Section 1404 is but a codification of the doctrine of forum non conveniens. It did not change the doctrine as set forth in Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 330 U. S. 501; applying the rule laid down there transfer must be denied, on this ground. The eight distributor-defendants have their principal places of business in this district. They have not sought a transfer. Although the action affects plaintiffs' property located in Auburn, N. Y., the greater portion of the alleged conspiratorial and illegal acts are alleged to have occurred in New York City and to have been consummated through the New York offices of the distributor-defendants. These defendants are now being examined here without objection from them and their records concerning these acts are here. It cannot be said that the choice of forum is either vexatious or oppressive. A transfer would not serve the interests of justice, nor would it be convenient for all the parties or witnesses.

Having found this forum convenient, it is not necessary to determine whether Section 1404 is to be applied to those anti-trust actions where venue is laid under the special provisions of Sections 4 and 12 of the Clayton Act. Cf., United States v. National City Lines, supra; United States v. National City Lines, 80 F. Supp. 743; Hayes v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 79 F. Supp. 821; Nunn v. Chicago, Milwaukee, St. P. & P. R. Co., 80 F. Supp. 745; Pascarella v. N. Y. Cent. R. Co., 81 F. Supp. 95; Cullinan v. N. Y. Cent. R. Co., (Hulbert, J. unreported, Civ. 47-412; 12/19/48).

[Change in Balance of Convenience]

Suggestion is made by the moving defendants that a settlement of the differences between plaintiffs and the distributor-defendants might be effected, leaving the claims against the "Schine" defendants alone to be litigated; in the happening of such event, the balance of convenience might be changed so as to weigh more heavily in favor of a transfer to the Northern District. This seems, presently, under the facts shown by the affidavits, to be at most only a conjecture, but should it come to pass, the denial of transfer at this time shall be deemed to be without prejudice to renewal.

Motion to transfer is also denied.

[Ruling as to Examinations]

The "Schine" defendants also move to vacate and set aside plaintiffs' notice of examination or to stay the taking of depositions until defendants complete their examination of plaintiffs. Plaintiffs, too, move for similar relief with respect to defendants' notice of examination.

The "Schine" defendants served their notice on February 18, 1949, before answer and simultaneously with their motion to dismiss or transfer, setting March 4, 1949 for the taking of depositions. Plaintiffs served their notice later on the same day, setting February 24, 1949 for the taking of depositions.

(3) As a general rule, the party who serves his notice first is entitled to priority. Graver v. Schenley Products Co., 26 F. Supp. 768. This rule is not, however, inflexible. It is true that plaintiffs must establish their case by proof to be elicited, in large measure, from defendants, but by reason of the Government's anti-trust litigation they are fully advised of the nature, extent and availability of such proof. Defendants have been diligent; no special circumstances appear which would warrant taking from the "Schine" defendants their priority of examination.

Plaintiffs shall appear for examination in New York City, at a time and place to be specified in an order to be settled; such examination shall continue daily until completed. Within 5 days after completion, the "Schine" defendants' examination shall begin; the individual defendants and Willard S. McKay shall be examined in New York City, excepting however, that such portion of these examinations as shall require the production of records shall be held in Gloversville, New York, where also the remaining employees and officers of the "Schine" defendants shall be examined.

Settle orders on notice to all parties.

On appeal from the United States District Court for Rhode Island.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Illegal Jury—Dismissal of Indictment—Subpoena Not Unreasonable Search.—An indictment charging violations of the Sherman Act was dismissed on the ground that the court's practice of intentionally excluding women from the grand jury panel rendered that body illegally constituted, and previously impounded documents were ordered returned. Subsequently the District Court declared that certain subpoenas thereby became unreasonable searches. On appeal it was held that the Government was entitled to introduce the documents demanded in the subpoenas, as evidence in subsequent civil proceedings. The Supreme Court decided that while an illegally constituted jury necessitates the dismissal of an indictment, the exclusion of women from that body, being a circumstance that bears only a remote relationship to search and seizure, does not make a validly issued and served subpoena amount to an unreasonable search in violation of the Fourth Amendment.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.345.

Reversing the decision of the United States District Court for Rhode Island, reported at ¶ 62,305.

For appellant: Philip B. Perlman, Solicitor General; Herbert A. Bergson, Assistant Attorney General.

For appellees: Edwards & Angell, Attorneys for Wallace & Tiernan Company, Inc., et al. (Charles H. Tuttle, Loren N. Wood, William H. Edwards, of Counsel); Hogan & Hogan, Attorneys for Novadel-Agene Corporation, et al. (Edward T. Hogan, Laurence J. Hogan, of Counsel); Hinckley, Allen, Tillinghast & Wheeler, Attorneys for Builders Iron Foundry, et al. (S. Everett Wilkins, Jr., Matthew W. Goring, of Counsel), all of Providence, Rhode Island.

Mr. Justice Black delivered the opinion of the Court.

The basic question here is whether the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures bars the United States from utilizing certain documentary evidence in this civil antitrust proceeding instituted in the United States District Court of Rhode Island. Subsidiary procedural questions involve the doctrine of res judicata.[1] We proceed at once to consideration of the important basic question since for reasons later given we reject the subsidiary res judicata contentions.

[Silverthorne Case Discussed]

First. Whether the Government has a right to utilize the documentary evidence in this civil proceeding can be best understood by an immediate reference to this Court's holding in Silverthorne Lbr. Co. v. United States, 251 U. S. 385. Appellees here contend that the Silverthorne holding is a complete and permanent bar to the Government's introduction of the documents as evidence, to the use of the documents to obtain other evidence, or for any other purpose.

The facts in the Silverthorne case as found by this Court were these: The Silverthornes having been indicted were arrested at their homes early in the morning and detained in custody for some hours. While so detained Government officers "without a shadow of authority" went to the office of their company and made a clean sweep of all the books, papers and documents found there. "All the employees were taken or directed to go to the office of the District Attorney of the United States to which also the books, &c., were taken at once." The District Court ordered all books, etc., returned on a finding that the search and seizure violated the constitutional rights of the parties. Photographs and copies of the papers having been made, a new indictment was returned based upon the knowledge thus obtained. Subpoenas were then issued calling for production of the original papers. Upon refusal to produce, one of the Silverthornes was imprisoned for contempt.

This Court viewed the whole performance of the unlawful search and seizure of the Silverthorne books and papers as an "outrage," planned or at least ratified by the Government. Under these circumstances it was held that the Government was neither entitled to use the original documents nor any knowledge obtained from the originals, the photostats, or the copies. The rule announced was that evidence or knowledge "gained by the Government's own wrong" is not merely forbidden to be "used before the court but that it shall not be used at all." Other cases in this Court have applied the same rule.[2] It is an extraordinary sanction, judicially imposed, to limit searches and seizures to those conducted in strict compliance with the commands of the Fourth Amendment.

[Facts at Bar Distinguished]

In the case before us, however, United States officers did not go to the appellees' offices and seize their documents. Officers served a court subpoena on appellees calling on them to produce certain designated documents for use in a grand jury investigation. Appellees challenged the subpoena on the ground that it was so broad and sweeping as to constitute an unreasonable search and seizure under the Fourth Amendment. The District Court at all times has rejected this contention, and appellees do not urge it here. Thus it cannot be thought that the form of the subpoena or the method of its enforcement constitutes even a "constructive" search or seizure barred as "unreasonable" by the Fourth Amendment. Oklahoma Press Co. v. Walling, 327 U. S. 186, 202-208. And up to this point nothing that happened in this case is even remotely analogous to the situation that evoked this Court's condemnation in the Silverthorne case. But the

[1] Appellees have moved to dismiss this appeal taken by the United States under § 2 of the Expediting Act of February 11, 1903, 32 Stat. 823, 15 U. S. C. § 29, as amended, Pub. L. No. 773, 80th Cong., 2d Sess., § 17 (June 25, 1948). The judgment appealed from was as follows: "The Government's 'request' for judgment and relief prayed for in the complaint is denied and judgment may be entered dismissing the action without prejudice. It is so ordered."

This judgment followed the court's action in denying the Government's motions for production of documents essential to prove the Government's case. The record fails to sustain appellees' contention that the Government invited the court to enter this order denying relief and dismissing the action. That the dismissal was without prejudice to filing another suit does not make the cause unappealable, for denial of relief and dismissal of the case ended this suit so far as the District Court was concerned. Wecker v. National Enameling Co., 204 U. S. 176, 181-182. See also United States v. National City Lines, 334 U. S. 573, 577, and Bowles v. Beatrice Creamery Co., 146 F. 2d 774. The motion to dismiss the appeal is overruled.

[2] Weeks v. United States, 232 U. S. 383; Johnson v. United States, 333 U. S. 10; Go-Bart Co. v. United States, 282 U. S. 344; Byars v. United States, 273 U. S. 248; Gouled v. United States, 255 U. S. 298; United States v. Lefkowitz, 285 U. S. 452; Trupiano v. United States, 334 U. S. 699; and cf. Harris v. United States, 331 U. S. 145; Zap v. United States, 328 U. S. 624; Davis v. United States, 328 U. S. 582.

District Court found and appellees here urge that subsequent developments in this case call for application of the Silverthorne rule. Those developments were as follows:

The grand jury before which the documents were produced returned an indictment against appellees and others charging violations of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.[3] Shortly after we decided Ballard v. United States, 329 U. S. 187, the District Court on motion of appellees dismissed the indictment on the ground that the court practice of intentionally and systematically excluding women from the grand jury panel rendered the grand jury an illegally constituted body. On the same day the court granted appellees' motion for return of the previously impounded documents. Later the court ordered the Government to return a number of photostats that had been made of the original documents. In an opinion discussing return of the photostats the District Court reaffirmed its belief that the "subpoenas did not violate the Fourth Amendment and the Government was entitled to have the documents produced for presentation to a legal grand jury." The Court held, however, that "when the grand jury turned out to be illegally constituted and the indictment was dismissed . . . the subpoenas amounted to unreasonable searches and seizures in violation of the Fourth Amendment . . ."

[Illegal Jury Results in Dismissal of Indictment Only]

In order to implement a congressional policy to have the grand jury "a truly representative" cross section of the community, we held in the Ballard case, supra, that exclusion of women from the grand jury required dismissal of an indictment. The effect of the District Court's holding here was to add to the Ballard requirement for dismissal of the indictment a further extraordinary sanction devised by this Court to prevent violations of the Fourth Amendment. For here there was no official culpability in issuance or service of the subpoena duces tecum. The sole ultimate reason for the District Court's application of the Silverthorne rule was that no women were on the grand jury, a circumstance that bears only a remote if not wholly theoretical relationship to search and seizure. We cannot agree that the Silverthorne rule requires such a result.

[Refusal to Extend Exclusionary Rule]

Aside from the limited extent to which the Fourth Amendment applies to the subpoena process, see Oklahoma Press Co. v. Walling, 327 U. S. 186, there are other reasons why the Silverthorne exclusionary rule should not be extended to the situation in this case. That rule stems from the Fourth Amendment. This Court has said that the Fourth Amendment command rests "upon the desirability of having magistrates rather than police officers determine when searches and seizures are permissible and what limitations should be placed upon such activities." Trupiano v. United States, 334 U. S. 699, 705; see also McDonald v. United States, 335 U. S. 451, 455-456. The Silverthorne search and seizure was made without any authority from a magistrate. And the seizure was so sweeping in nature that it probably could not have been authorized by a search warrant. Weeks v. United States, 232 U. S. 383, 393-394. The Silverthorne exclusionary rule as explained in that case and others is designed to safeguard the privacy of people, and to prevent seizure of their papers and property except in compliance with valid judicial process. As tersely stated in the Silverthorne case the rule's purpose is to prevent the Fourth Amendment from being reduced to "a form of words."

[No Invasion of Privacy]

Only by engaging in the most exaggerated apprehensions can the action of the prosecuting officers in this case be considered a threat to the Fourth Amendment. They went to the court for their subpoena. The court approved it. There is no claim that the subpoena was obtained or served in an improper manner or that any Government officer committed a wrong in the way the documents were handled or return. At least many of the documents were highly relevant to the serious monopoly offenses charged against appellees. That there were no women on the grand jury did not contribute to any invasion of appellees' privacy. Dismissal of the indictment could not transform what had been proper official conduct into the type of conduct condemned in the Silverthorne and other cases.

[Specious Argument]

It is true that a metaphysical argument can be made to support a strained analogy between the situation here and that in the Silverthorne and other cases. That argument is that the "illegal" grand jury was only a "so-called" grand jury, and that the considered judicial command for production of papers before it must be treated as though the court had ordered production of papers before a group of appellees' competitors. This argument has a superficial plausibility on the word level, but if our attention is directed to substance rather than symbols the speciousness of the argument is exposed.

[3] 26 Stat. 209, as amended 50 Stat. 693, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2.

[Injury Remedied]

Whatever injury appellees may have suffered resulted from the absence of women on the grand jury and that injury has been remedied by freeing appellees from prosecution under the indictment. Furthermore the search and seizure here, if such it can be called in any true sense, was not the kind that has prompted this Court to hold that the Government has by wrongful conduct of its officers forfeited all opportunity to make use of evidence unlawfully seized. We decline to extend the Silverthorne rule to such an extent. The Fourth Amendment, important as it is in our society, does not call for imposition of judicial sanctions where enforcing officers have followed the law with such punctilious regard as they have here. We hold that dismissal of the grand jury because no women were on it is no sufficient reason for holding that the Government is barred from making use of the summoned documents.

[Subsidiary Procedural Questions]

Second. At the same time the District Court ordered the indictment dismissed it also ordered that the documents be returned to the defendants. The Government did not appeal from the order dismissing the indictment. See United States v. Hark, 320 U. S. 531, 535-36. It is contended that by its failure to appeal, the Government is barred by the doctrine of res judicata from challenging the dismissal and return orders.

Assuming that the Government by failure to appeal is barred from challenging the court's holding that the grand jury was illegally constituted and that the documents were properly ordered returned, it by no means follows that these orders permanently barred the Government from any future use of the documents as evidence. For the Government forfeited no rights to use the documents in a future valid proceeding by failing to appeal from the dismissal of the indictment—a dismissal it believed to be supported by our holding in the Ballard case. And dismissal of the pending indictment after holding the grand jury illegal created a situation where appellees were entitled to return of their papers as a matter of course. Consequently an appeal from the return order alone, even if such an appeal could have been taken, would have availed the Government nothing. For the foregoing reasons we hold that orders dismissing the indictment and requiring return of the documents did not affect the Government's right to have the documents produced in these civil proceedings.

For the same reasons we hold that the Government's right to demand production in this civil case was not affected by the District Court's later order requiring return of photostatic copies of the documents. Return of the photostats, like return of the originals, necessarily followed from the dismissal of the indictment. This was recognized by the District Court when in directing return of the photostats the court said, "Since these motions stem from Indictment No. 6055, the Clerk is ordered to make the motions, the hearings thereon, and this opinion part of the record of said indictment."

Third. For their claim of res judicata appellees also rely on a third order of the District Court "precluding and restraining the United States from using in any way or for any purpose any knowledge, information or evidence obtained from or contained in any of the aforesaid illegally seized papers and documents." This order was entered prior to the court's action in this civil proceeding in which it quashed the subpoena duces tecum and refused to order production of the documents. Appellees contend that this order was a "decree of judicial outlawry" against any future Government use of the papers or knowledge acquired from them; that the Government could have but did not appeal from the order; that for this reason the "decree of judicial outlawry" had become final and binding upon the Government at the time it asked for production in this proceeding. The Government denies that the order had or was intended to have the broad proscriptive effect urged by respondents. In addition, the Government contends that the order was interlocutory and therefore not appealable. On this latter premise the Government relies on "familiar law that only a final judgment is res judicata as between the parties." Merriam v. Saalfield, 241 U. S. 22, 28.

To some extent both phases of the contention—scope of the order and its appealability—depend upon whether the proceeding was handled by the court as an independent plenary proceeding or one to suppress evidence at a forthcoming trial. For a judgment in an independent plenary proceeding for return of property and its suppression as evidence is final and appealable and the scope of relief in such a case may extend far beyond its effect on a pending trial; but a decision on a motion to return or suppress evidence in a pending trial may be no more than a procedural step in a particular case and in such event the effect of the decision would not extend beyond that case. Whether a motion is to be treated as independent and plenary or as merely a procedural step in a pending trial must be determined by particular circumstances. See Cogen v. United States, 278 U. S. 221. The circumstances here we think show that the order now considered was not one of permanent general "outlawry" against all use of the documents involved, but an order to prevent their use in a particular criminal proceeding then pending.

After the court had dismissed the indictment because no women were on the jury, the Government filed in the same District Court an information charging the same offense. The defendants filed a motion in the information proceeding (1) to dismiss the information; (2) in the alternative to dismiss and expunge those facts of the information based on knowledge obtained from the papers and documents; (3) to preclude and restrain the United States from using in any way or for any purpose knowledge or evidence obtained from or contained in the documents. The court denied (1) and (2) but granted (3). The motion, court opinion, and court order bore the title and number (6070) of the criminal information proceeding. During the argument colloquies took place between court and counsel which emphasized that the motion related to "Criminal 6070."

The motion was argued at length before the district judge. Government counsel took the position that the court's order on the motion would not be appealable. See Cobbledick v. United States, 309 U. S. 323; United States v. Rosenwasser, 145 F. 2d 1015. He therefore asked the court to be careful about the form of the order, expressing apprehensions that counsel for appellees would later argue that the order entered in the criminal proceeding was broad enough to bar use of the documents in the civil proceedings. Government counsel indicated his plans subsequently to present the issue of the Government's right to use the documents in this civil proceeding, taking the position that an appeal would then lie. He therefore asked the court to await entry of any order until his plans could be carried out. Appellees' counsel told the court that "The plans which Mr. Kelleher has concern Civil 6055. This is Criminal 6070." And the court told Government counsel that the preclusion order would preclude use of the documents "only in this [criminal] action." The court further said to Government counsel that if the court made a wrong order "Then you can go ahead as you contend or plan to go ahead in your civil action." Finally, just before conclusion of the hearing on the order, the court told Government counsel, "I don't see how this is going to prejudice you in some other case, and this Court is only concerned with 6070 [criminal information charge] at this time, as I understand it."

We hold that the proceedings leading up to the preclusion order must be deemed a part of the criminal proceedings, see Cogen v. United States, 278 U. S. 221, 227; that the order did not preclude use of the documents except in these proceedings; and that this order does not stand as a bar to consideration of the availability of the documents for use as evidence in this civil case.

Other contentions of appellees have been considered and found to be without merit.

In the New York Supreme Court, Bronx County. Special Term, Part I. N. Y. L. J. 1525, April 28, 1949.

New York Antitrust Act

Refusal To Supply Labor—Monopoly in Labor Market.—After failing to secure a collective bargaining agreement with a union which was found to enjoy a monopoly over the supply of labor in the industry, a member of an organization of employers took court action for equitable relief. It was held that the union's refusal to furnish labor in order to maintain a high level of prices constituted a violation of Section 340 of the General Business Law and an order was made to restrain the union from interfering with the plaintiff in the performance of any lawful contract obtained by it and from preventing the plaintiff from securing union men.

See the New York Antitrust Act, annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8615.20.

[Review of Facts]

BRISACH, J.: Plaintiff brought this action against the defendant asking for a variety of equitable relief. The evidence discloses that the plaintiff was a member of an organization of employers who operated under collective bargaining agreement with the defendant union for many years prior to, and particularly between the years 1934 and 1941, but suspended activities during the war years.

After cessation of hostilities plaintiff, individually and as a member of the association, attempted to enter into a new collective bargaining agreement with the defendant but to no avail.

The evidence shows that the defendant union is comprised of approximately thirty to thirty-five members, which constitute all of the available manpower in the entire industry, and enjoys a monopoly in the supply of labor in the metropolitan area.

[Nature of Refusal]

Defendant's refusal to furnish labor or manpower to plaintiff is based on its own defined contention that the prices were getting too cheap in the industry and that the defendant union would refuse to furnish labor to subcontractors, and classified plaintiff as subcontractor, in direct contradiction to the evidence as furnished by plaintiff that the character of its business was the same since its inception some forty years ago, except that it suspended its business during war years, from 1941 to 1946.

Plaintiff has sustained the burden of proof in establishing its case and the defendant offered no evidence to controvert any of the plaintiff's testimony, and from the evidence it is clear that the acts of defendant constituted a violation of section 340 of the General Business Law and that plaintiff is entitled to the relief sought in the complaint (see Falciglia v. Gallagher et al., 299 N. Y. Supp., 890; Clark v. Curtis, 273 App. Div., 797, aff'd 297 N. Y., 1014; Albrecht v. Kinsella, 119 Fed., 2d, 1003; J. H. Wallace v. Smith, Ohio Court of Common Pleas, decided February 23, 1949, vol. 4, L. R. R., Man., 854).

[Relief Granted]

Settle findings and judgment in accordance with the above decision (1) restraining defendant from interfering with the plaintiff in the performance of any lawful contract obtained by him; (2) enjoining the defendant from preventing plaintiff from securing union men in the performance of any lawful contract obtained by it; (3) restraining defendant from threatening plaintiff or any person with whom he may contract from issuing any statement, do any act, or perform any act on the part of defendant, its agents or servants tending to prevent plaintiff from obtaining union men.

Judge's Opinion

Nature of the Case

This is an indictment charging a number of corporations and individuals with the violation of the Sherman Anti-trust Act.

Motion to Dismiss

The defendants have offered a number of objections to the indictment, among which is a motion to dismiss, in that it fails to describe the offenses attempted to be charged therein with sufficient definiteness and certainty to inform said defendants, or any of them, of the nature or cause of the accusations made against them.

The Sherman Law

The Anti-trust Act was seemingly written before our legislators grew so voluble as some of them now appear to be. Stated in a few words, the law is substantially as follows:

"Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations is hereby declared to be illegal * * * Every person who shall make any contract or engage in any combination or conspiracy declared by Sections 1-7 of this Title to be illegal shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor * * *" 15 USCA 1-7.

The Indictment

The indictment contains some twenty-nine sections. The first twenty sections name the defendants, including five corporations, all being electrical concerns, and some fourteen individuals. Other sections set forth definitions, defining various terms pertaining to the business of the defendants, referring also the volume of business done by members of the Association indicted as one of the defendants. Count No. 1 of the indictment is embraced in Section 21 and is as follows:

"Beginning in or about the year 1946, the exact date being to the Grand Jurors unknown, and continuing to the date of the presentment of this indictment the defendants have been engaged in a combination and conspiracy in restraint of the aforesaid trade and commerce among the several states in electrical equipment and services in violation of Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, as amended (15 U. S. C. Sec. 1), commonly known as the Sherman Act".

Count #2 of such indictment is embraced in Section 25 as follows:

"Each and every allegation contained in this indictment numbered 1, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 19 and 20 are here realleged with the same force and effect as though said paragraphs were here set forth in full. The acts alleged in this indictment to have been done by the defendant corporation Northeast Texas Chapter, NECA, were authorized, ordered or done by the officers, agents, or directors of said chapter, including the officers, agents or directors named as defendants herein".

Rule Seven

Bearing upon the sufficiency of the indictment we are cited by all parties to Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, the pertinent part of which is Rule 7, Section C, "The indictment . . . shall be a plain, concise, and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged." (Italics ours).

The Purpose of the Law

The Sherman Anti-trust Act was clearly for the purpose of protecting the buying and selling public, insofar as it was affected by interstate commerce, against monopolies and corners being made or had upon any given subject of commerce or service, such being declared unlawful. The law was designed to prevent the unreasonable restraint of trade or commerce by controlling the prices of any given commodity. It is not, however, every act of pricing of a given commodity that comes within the category of unlawful acts, any more than the forgery of a man's name, unless it is done with intent to injure or defraud. In an often-cited authority, the Apex Hosiery Co. case, 310 U. S. 495, we find this declaration of law:

> "A . . . significant circumstance is that this Court has never applied the Sherman Act in any case . . . unless the Court was of opinion that there was some form of restraint upon commercial competition in the marketing of goods or services . . .".

At about the time this proceeding was instituted, the government seemingly instituted similar actions at other points in the United States, namely, at San Francisco, Seattle, and Springfield, Missouri, the one at Dallas now under consideration being the fourth. The motion to quash the indictment in the Seattle case was disposed of on the 17th of last June before trial Judge Black. From his opinion we take the following statement:

> "Plaintiff's memorandum states that since about last November indictments have been returned in Federal Court against electrical contractors in Texas, Missouri and in this Court in Washington. Such memorandum says, 'The charges of these indictments, while not identical, are quite similar'."

In holding the indictment insufficient, the trial Judge uses the following language:

> "But charges of price fixing as to electrical systems which are a part of Seattle buildings, regardless of how censurable such practices may be, will not support federal prosecution for price fixing of 'equipment' moving in interstate commerce when there is not a single allegation that interstate commerce of such 'equipment' is or is intended to be restrained or burdened thereby".

The Missouri indictment has also been dismissed by the trial court, Justice Reeves, in which he says:

> "In the instant case there is not a single averment that the free flow of commerce was affected or would have been affected in any way whatsoever by the exactions made by the defendants upon owners and builders".

The California case was heard upon the merits, and the proof in the light of the indictment was held insufficient. The reasoning of the courts in the Washington and Missouri cases is believed to be sound.

The government insists that the language of the indictment is well within the language of the statute itself and for that reason it is sufficient. Referring back to Rule 7 of Criminal Procedure, it is noted that "the indictment shall contain the essential facts constituting the offense". In an anti-trust case, as with many other offenses, a mere quoting of the statute is not sufficient to put a defendant on notice of the character of the offenses for which he is to be tried. This can be perceived by a layman, taking for illustration the statute on housebreaking or burglary. It is not sufficient to charge "A" in an indictment with the general term of burglary, nor merely to quote the statute. It is true the defendant may know in his own mind that he is entirely innocent and feel competent to defend himself but, if during the trial the government should bring a case of circumstantial evidence where a burglary was committed, where the defendant was seen in the locality of its commission and other attending facts that would make a case against the defendant, and the defendant had in the meantime heard nothing about this burglary's having been committed until he was confronted with the evidence in the trial itself, he would have no opportunity to prepare his defense to overcome the government's case of circumstantial evidence. It thus becomes important, in the language of the Rule, to accompany the charge, or embrace in the charge, a statement of the essential facts constituting the offense alleged.

The Court in the Sixth Circuit, dealing with an indictment under the present Sherman Anti-trust Law, makes the following ruling, as summed up in the syllabus, which is borne out by the decision in the body:

> "Under the act of July 2, 1890, 'to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' an indictment simply following the language of the statute would be wholly insufficient, for the words of the act do not themselves fully, directly, and clearly set forth all the elements necessary to constitute the offense; and the indictment must, therefore, be tested by the specific facts alleged to have been done or committed." 52 F. 104.

The First Circuit, bearing on this same question, in an opinion by Justice Putnam, says:

> "This statute is not one of the class where it is always sufficient to declare in the words of the enactment, as it does not set out all the elements of a crime. A contract or combination in restraint of trade may be not only not illegal, but praiseworthy; as, where parties attempt to engross the market by furnishing the best goods, or the cheapest . . . And by the well-settled rules of pleading it is not sufficient to allege the means in general language, but, if it is claimed that the means used are illegal, enough must be set out to enable the court to see that they are so, and to enable the defense to properly prepare to meet the charge made against it." 55 F. 638.

Manifestly, all the evidence that would be offered in the event of a trial on the merits would not pertain to one defendant, or be applicable to him. Under the general and indefinite language contained in the indictment, a defendant would be unable to know, as the trial progressed, whether the government's evidence was looking to his conviction or to that of his co-defendants. We are confronted with a situation not unlike that found in the Reardon case, again by Justice Putnam, in which he says:

> ". . . the . . . indictment . . . is clearly defective, because it fails absolutely to allege anything in the way of showing wherein the transactions complained of were unlawful. Of course, general phraseology is used charging illegality and all that; but it is impossible to ascertain from what is said here wherein what was done was unlawful." 191 F. 457.

So viewing the motion to dismiss the indictment it becomes unnecessary to pass upon the other motion pertaining to the trial.

The indictment is quashed, and the case is dismissed.

Appeal from Henry Circuit Court.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Property Rights in Secret Formulas—Agreement Not To Disclose Trade Secrets—Injunction Granted.—In an action taken by a manufacturer of poultry feeds and concentrates for an injunction to restrain a hatchery operator from breaking a contract in which he agreed not to teach or disclose trade secrets relating to a method and process for the culling of chickens, the Court approved the decision of the lower Court, where the defendant had sought to avoid the contract by pleading that its provisions contradicted the antitrust laws, by declaring that the property rights in secret formulas and processes acquired by a valid contract will be protected by injunction against those who through a breach of trust attempt to apply the secret to their own use.

[Review of Pleadings]

[Digest] This is an action in equity for injunctive relief from the violation by defendant of his contractual obligations. Plaintiff obtained a final judgment by the terms of which defendant was restrained from teaching or disclosing trade secrets of the plaintiff related to a certain method and process for the culling of chickens known as "Eamesway" and which had been taught and was being taught in the Eames Institute of Poultry Technology, an institute then owned by the plaintiff. Defendant was further restrained from the use of the names and terms "Eamesway" and "Eames Institute of Poultry Technology" and from soliciting and advertising in any manner to teach said method of culling poultry under any name or names whatever.

The defendant has duly appealed. The points for consideration presented in his brief pertain only to claimed errors in the findings of fact and conclusions of law made by the trial judge. The adequacy and propriety of the pleadings are not questioned, and although they are somewhat extended a brief reference thereto will suffice for an understanding of the issues which are raised thereby.

The amended petition states that plaintiff is an Illinois corporation with offices in East St. Louis; that it is and for many years has been engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling poultry feeds, concentrates, medicines, and remedies under the names of "Ultra-Life Feeds" and "Ultra-Life Poultry Concentrates" in connection with which it gathers and distributes to its customers and their patrons information regarding the breeding, care, feeding and culling of poultry; that in the spring of 1936, plaintiff learned that the defendant was using a method and process for culling chickens wherein by means of a physical examination and internal palpation of the organs, it could be determined whether or not a chicken was capable of and was producing eggs, and whether or not it would be profitable to retain said chicken in a flock as a producer of eggs; that thereafter defendant was employed by plaintiff to demonstrate his method and process under the sponsorship and supervision of plaintiff, and defendant was to devote his entire time to the business of plaintiff after September 1, 1936, except he was to be at liberty during the hatching period to operate his hatchery at Forest City, Iowa; that while defendant was engaged by plaintiff he developed and perfected his method of internal culling; that defendant desired to establish a school for the purpose of teaching his method and process and in 1938, in partnership with one C. W. Gates, he established the Eames Institute of Poultry Technology under the sponsorship of the plaintiff; that plaintiff spent large sums of money advertising the Eames method and furnished facilities for the conduct of the school; that the Eames method of culling poultry became identified with plaintiff's products; that prior to June 10, 1940, defendant and his partner were in disagreement and the partnership was dissolved, and as of that date plaintiff for valuable consideration acquired all the right, title, interest and privileges theretofore derived and to be derived from said Eames Institute of Poultry Technology; that both of said partners assigned all their right, title, interest and privileges in said partnership, including the names "Eames-Way" and "Eamesway" which were then used in reference to said method and process, to plaintiff and agreed not to teach, disclose or sell any information considered trade secrets concerning said method and process for a period of twenty years except to plaintiff; that thereafter defendant was employed by plaintiff, and in the course of said employment conducted schools wherein said method was taught under the name "Eamesway" to certain selected persons, and the Eames Institute of Poultry Technology continued as a department or division of plaintiff's business and was so advertised at great expense, with the knowledge and consent of defendant; that defendant continued in the employ of plaintiff until April 30, 1947, at which time he voluntarily left the employ of plaintiff to engage in the operation of a hatchery and to sell a spraying device; that on or about July 22, 1947, the defendant, in violation of the terms of his said contract dated June 10, 1940, proceeded to conduct schools under the name and style of Eames Institute of Poultry Technology, or a name or names similar thereto, where he taught said method and process, advertised said schools and said method and process; that he solicited students for said schools from lists of prospects compiled by plaintiff which said lists were the property of plaintiff; and in the course of such advertising identified himself as having been associated with plaintiff in the operation and conduct of said Eames Institute of Poultry Technology; that prior to August 11, 1947, defendant announced his plans to open and conduct a school under the name of Eames Institute of Poultry Technology, or a name or names similar thereto, in the town of Clinton, Henry County, Missouri; that he advertised for students to attend said school in violation of his contract and contrary to the right, title and interest of the plaintiff. The petition concludes with an allegation of facts showing the lack of an adequate remedy at law, and that unless defendant is restrained plaintiff will suffer irreparable damage.

The answer of defendant admits the execution of the contract of August 1, 1938, and of the contract dated June 10, 1940, and denies all other allegations. The answer alleged that the contract of June 10, 1940, was executed in the State of Illinois and the validity and construction thereof will be governed by the law of that state; that said contract is void and of no effect because its provisions are contrary to public policy and in restraint of trade; that the petition failed to state a cause of action; that plaintiff did not have any proprietary right or any other right in the Eames method of internal culling of poultry; that plaintiff is not engaged in the business of teaching methods of culling poultry and therefore could suffer no damages; that no trade secrets were actually sold and delivered to plaintiff; that the internal culling of poultry is not a secret, but is known to divers other persons; that the contract is illegal because it violates the antitrust laws of the United States and of the State of Illinois, and because it attempts to create a monopoly on behalf of the plaintiff. Defendant alleged damages to him in the sum of $10,000, and prayed the court to increase the injunction bond to that amount.

[Grounds of Appeal]

The brief on behalf of appellant presents two principal points for consideration in an effort to show error in the findings and judgment of the court. First, that plaintiff did not prove a trade secret existed. Second, that the contract he is charged with having violated is void and against public policy. In reference to the validity of the contract, and in the course of the argument, the following admissions and statements were made by counsel for appellant: "In order to clarify defendant's position may we state that we are in complete accord with the plaintiff's contention that trade secrets may be sold and the buyer may take a covenant from the seller that the seller will not disclose the trade secrets to any other person. Such contracts are not in restraint of trade." And this further statement in connection with the argument that the contract is unduly restrictive: "The plaintiff says that an employer or vendee can take a covenant against the disclosure of a trade secret without any limitation as to time or space. This is true where there is actually a trade secret." The principal authorities cited by appellant to sustain his contention that the contract is void and against public policy are not in point because no trade secret was involved in those cases, all of which is clearly shown in the case of Larx Co. v. Nicol, 28 N. W. (2d) 705, 711, wherein the Supreme Court of Minnesota in considering the validity of an Illinois contract, with extended compilation of authorities, held the law to be to the same effect as that admitted by appellant in his last quoted statement. It is thus seen that the validity of the contract is made to depend upon the existence or non-existence of a trade secret being involved in the sale and transfer of defendant's business to the plaintiff. Addressing attention to that question, appellant says that the court must determine first whether or not internal culling of poultry is a trade secret. That is not stating the problem as we understand it. So far as the existence of a trade secret is concerned it is not a question whether internal culling is such, but whether the Eames system and process is a trade secret. Probably the best and most generally accepted definition of a trade secret is the following from the Restatement of the Law of Torts, Sec. 757 (b), where it is stated: "A trade secret may consist of any formula, pattern, device or compilation of information which is used in one's business and which gives him an opportunity to obtain an advantage over competitors who do not know or use it." Further on in the same section is the following: "Some factors to be considered in determining whether given information is one's trade secret are: (1) the extent to which the information is known outside of his business; (2) the extent to which it is known by employees and others involved in his business; (3) the extent of measures taken by him to secure the secrecy of the information; (4) the value of the information to him and to his competitors; (5) the amount of effort or money expended by him in developing the information; (6) the ease or difficulty with which the information could be properly acquired or duplicated by others."

[Authorities Reviewed]

Taking into account the appropriate factors for consideration, we are of opinion that the findings and conclusion of the trial court were fully justified and amply supported by the evidence in the case. The defendant was not in position to deny that his processes and methods were secret. His contract not to teach or divulge such methods is in itself an admission of a positive character that such methods were secret. S. Jarvis Adams Co. v. Knapp, 121 Fed. 34, 40. In a discussion of this subject, Callman in his work on Unfair Competition and Trademarks, 1945 Edition, Vol. 1, Sec. 53.3, p. 666, states: "Express agreement not to disclose any of the processes and methods * * * is a positive acknowledgment of the fact that such processes and methods are secret; the stipulation would otherwise be meaningless." Williston on Contracts, Revised Edition, Vol. V, p. 4626, says:

> "The owner of a secret on selling it, may effectively promise not to compete by making use of the process himself or divulging it to others. Indeed, the sale of a secret process as such carries with it the implied obligation not to disclose it to others."

There are many cases which support the conclusion of the court and show a great variety of subjects entitled to protection as trade secrets. Some of them are: Sandlin v. Johnson, 141 F. (2d) 660; Larx Co. v. Nicol, 28 N. W. (2d) 705; International News Service Co. v. Associated Press, 248 U. S. 215, 39 Sup. Ct. 68; F. W. Dodge Co. v. Construction Information Co., 183 Mass. 62, 66 N. E. 204; Pressed Steel Car Co. v. Standard Steel Car Co., 210 Pa. 464, 60 Atl. 4.

In the case of Board of Trade of the City of Chicago v. Christie Grain & Stock Co., 198 U. S. 236, 25 Sup. Ct. 637, 639, Justice Holmes, in discussing a similar problem, said:

> "In the first place, apart from special objections, the plaintiff's collection of quotations is entitled to the protection of the law. It stands like a trade secret. The plaintiff has the right to keep the work which it has done, or paid for doing, to itself. The fact that others might do similar work, if they might, does not authorize them to steal the plaintiff's. Compare Bleistein v. Donaldson Lithographing Co., 188 U. S. 239, 249, 250. The plaintiff does not lose its rights by communicating the result to persons, even if many, in confidential relations to itself, under a contract not to make it public, and strangers to the trust will be restrained from getting at the knowledge by inducing a breach of trust and using knowledge obtained by such a breach."

There are other cases holding that absolute secrecy is not required and that others might have knowledge of a trade secret, but this is no defense to one who discloses the trade secret in violation of a contract. Vulcan Detinning Co. v. American Can Co., 72 N. J. Eq. 387, 67 Atl. 339, 342, 343; Radium Remedies Co. v. Weiss, 173 Minn. 342, 217 N. W. 339; Callman on Unfair Competition and Trademarks, 1945 Ed. Vol. 1, Sec. 53.3, p. 672.

Appellant contends that because other persons have for many years used internal culling of poultry, and the method is of general knowledge in the poultry industry, it is therefore not a trade secret. Citations in support of this contention are not in point. In the case of Brunson v. Reinberger & Collier, 203 S. W. 269, 134 Ark. 211, the court was unable to ascertain that the original trade secrets had been acquired from the plaintiff, and whether or not any confidence had ever been violated. In Sach v. Cluett, Peabody & Co., 31 N. Y. S. (2d) 718, the court held that trade secrets are property and will be protected in equity against unauthorized disclosures. In Godefroy Mfg. Co. v. Lady Lennox Co., 134 S. W. (2d) 140, the St. Louis Court of Appeals held there was an independent discovery by the defendant of its method, and no proof that defendant was in possession of plaintiff's secret formula. In Chadwick v. Covell, 151 Mass. 190, 23 N. E. 1068, the opinion recognized that a trade secret should be protected by courts of equity. In Southwest Specialties Co. v. Eastman, 130 Kansas, 443, 286 P. 225, the court said there was no express contract not to disclose the trade secret, and that there was in fact no trade secret involved.

While the validity of the contract in question must be determined by the law of the place where the contract was made, matters respecting the remedy depend upon the law of the place where the suit is brought. Ruhe v. Buck, 124 Mo. 178, 183, 27 S. W. 412. In consideration of the remedy to which plaintiff is entitled, we then look to the law of Missouri where the rule is well established that secret formulas and processes are property rights which will be protected by injunction against those who through a breach of trust or a violation of confidence attempt to apply the secret to their own use or to impart it to others. Luckett v. Orange Julep Co., 271 Mo. 289, 196 S. W. 740; Germo Mfg. Co. v. Combs, 209 Mo. App. 651, 240 S. W. 872, 881; Charles Reilly Optical Co. v. Burke, 41 S. W. (2d) 909; Harrington v. National Outdoor Adv. Co., 355 Mo. 524, 532, 196 S. W. (2d) 786; Sandlin v. Johnson, supra. When trade secrets are involved the law of Illinois is in accord with the Missouri rule. Witkowsky v. Affeld, 283 Ill. 557, 119 N. E. 630; Victor Chemical Works v. Iliff, 299 Ill. 532, 547, 132 N. E. 806, 813.

An outstanding fact in this case, which appellant overlooks or ignores, is that the plaintiff purchased a business known as the Eames Institute of Poultry Technology with all the rights and privileges incident thereto.

That business has been sponsored and developed at an enormous expense to plaintiff, and plaintiff has a property right which equity will protect against such an unlawful invasion as that attempted by defendant.

[Lower Court Judgment Affirmed]

According to the authorities heretofore cited and having in mind the nature and extent of plaintiff's business, which is in effect nationwide, the judgment of the court is not unduly restrictive. In view of all of the foregoing the judgment should be affirmed. The Commissioner so recommends.

SPERRY, C., not sitting.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of BOYER, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court. The judgment is affirmed.

[¶ 62,418] In the Matter of the Application of Harry Alexander, Inc. et al., to Quash Grand Jury Subpoenas Duces Tecum.

In the United States District Court of New York, Southern District. M-11-188. January 3, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Unreasonable Subpoena—Documents not Essential—Portions Stricken.—Certain items and classifications were ordered to be stricken from a subpoena taken out by the Government which required members of an electrical contractors association to produce an unreasonable quantity of documents before a grand jury empaneled to determine as to the possible existence of restraints of trade in the electrical contracting industry which might involve violations of the antitrust laws.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1630.156.

For applicant: Weisman, Grant & Jaffe, John Harlan Amen, William J. Butler, New York, New York.

For the United States: J. Francis Hayden, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, New York, New York.

[Nature of Applicants' Problem]

CLANCY, D. J., District Judge: This is an application made by thirty-five members of New York Electrical Contractors Association, Inc., to quash subpoenas duces tecum purporting to require production by each of them of a mass of papers before a grand jury. The answering affidavit says that the Government has "information indicating possible restraints of trade in the electrical contracting industry which may involve violations of the Antitrust law" and it is the amorphous intangible charge embodied in this guarded language that is to be examined. The applicants have presented their problem to the Court with a lucid factual exposition of their business and their business methods, the nature and number of the records required to be produced and the effect on them and on their business of attempted obedience to the subpoenas. Every fact they state is ignored in the Government's answering affidavit which may be summed up as a series of unsupported conclusions that all the papers called for are essential sometimes, it is said, to investigation and sometimes to prosecution under an imaginary indictment.

[Constitutional Provisions Governing a Subpoena]

The constitution requires that the forced production of documents by subpoena be not unreasonable. Boyd v. U. S., 116 U. S. 616; Hale v. Henkel, 201 U. S. 43. It was said in McMann v. Securities Exchange Commission, 87 Fed. (2d) 377; "The search is 'unreasonable' only because it is out of proportion to the end sought as when the person served is required to fetch all his books at once to an exploratory investigation whose purposes and limits can be determined only as it proceeds." The Antitrust Division can hardly take seriously the notion that a grand jury or its successor or successors will ever see any considerable part of the material these applicants are called on to produce. Both grand jurors and prosecutors are human beings and he would be a person of incredible competence and capacity who could contain or absorb any significant fraction of it over a long time. It is sworn to and not contradicted that "'one of the thirty-five applicants has 9600 active contracts and accounts for maintenance alone and that just in its maintenance business it experiences a turnover of 1000 contracts and accounts per year. The records of this department alone, exclusive of correspondence would require a minimum of fifteen cabinets of four drawers each." This is an inconsiderable part of the intended product of the Government's dragnet. The subpoenas express a studied attempt to include what is incorporated in the imaginative concept of every shred of paper in a contractor's office and to avoid the possible exclusion of anything there. In Brown v. U. S., 276 U. S. 134, can be found a sample of what a proper subpoena calls for when the author must depend for description in classifications. The matter demanded was "probably material" on its face and could readily be located by an intelligent clerk.

The Government leans entirely on excerpts from opinions but when the cases are read they will be found irrelevant to the case of these applicants. The subpoenas in Consolidated Rendering v. Vermont, 207 U. S. 541; Norcross v. U. S., 209 Fed. 13 and U. S. v. Invader Oil Corp., 5 Fed. 2715, were coextensive with the definite charges in those cases. Oklahoma Press Co. v. Walling, 327 U. S. 186, sustained the investigatory power of the Fair Labor Standards Administrator. Shotkin v. Nelson, 146 Fed. (2d) 402, sustained the War Production Board's authority to examine the books and records for one year of a dealer in essential war material.

The Judge in Matter of Eastman Co., 7 F. R. D. 760, had the benefit of three earlier judgments to acquaint him with the nature of what was relevant and proper when he limited the subpoena in accordance with Rule 17-c. We have only the face of the subpoena to serve as a guide.

Items I and II are allowed with the following elisions: After the words "Operating Committee" in the second line of item I, omit everything down to and including "group thereof" in the fifth line. Omit the words "manufacturing, producing" in the eighth line and all that remains in paragraph I after the word "licensing" in the ninth line. Classification No. 23 must be stricken. From paragraph II are stricken classifications D, F, G, H and I. Incorporate in the order items I and II as thus modified. The subpoenas are otherwise vacated and quashed. What has been allowed should reveal some evidence if any exists of any past or present crime of which the applicants possess evidence and serve as a sufficient basis for intelligent process and progress thereafter.

In the United States District Court for the Western District of Louisiana. Criminal Action No. 12,087. May 13, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Production of Documents—Personal Papers—No Immunity Granted.—The motion of an individual manager and owner of three named ice companies to dismiss a criminal prosecution, alleging conspiracy to restrain trade and monopolization of the ice business, on the grounds of immunity from prosecution guaranteed to him when he delivered up his personal papers in response to a subpoena was denied. The Court found the affairs of the individual and corporate defendants to be so badly mixed it would be difficult to tell where his personal interests ended and corporate dealings began. It was held that to grant immunity in such circumstances would open the door to abuse by those individuals seeking relief from personal responsibility for their illegal activities.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1630.539.

For plaintiff: Malcolm E. Lafargue, United States Attorney, Shreveport, La.

For defendant: Horace L. Flurry; Jacob M. Raey; Fred D. Turnage; S. W. Plauché, Jr., Lake Charles, La.

[Pleadings]

DAWKINS, J., District Judge: Defendants, Samuel Ross Morgan, and three corporations, Consumers Ice Company, Inc., called Consumers; Louisiana Ice Company, Inc., called Louisiana; and Morgan Vivian Ice Company, Inc., called Vivian, are charged in an indictment returned October 22, 1948, with violation of Sections 1 and 2 of Title 15 U. S. C. (Anti-Trust Act.) It is charged that Morgan, the individual, "within three years next preceding this indictment has been associated with or employed by defendant corporations, and controls, or within said three year period has controlled operations of defendant corporations. He has done and caused to be done within said three year period many of the acts hereafter alleged."

The indictment consists of two counts and in the first he and the corporations are charged with having agreed and conspired to restrain trade and commerce in the ice business, and (2) with monopolizing trade and commerce in the ice business within the areas described in the indictment.

All defendants, including Morgan, filed written pleas of not guilty, the latter with reservation of the right to file a motion to dismiss. On the same day, January 19, 1949, Morgan filed a motion to dismiss on the grounds that he had been given immunity from prosecution because the Court had issued a subpoena duces tecum requiring him to produce before the grand jury, which returned the indictment, records and documents as set forth in Exhibit A, attached to said motion to dismiss, and that the "said records, data, and evidence were defendant's personal papers, in his possession and under his control in his status as manager and proprietor of his non-corporate business". The immunity was claimed under the 5th Amendment to the Constitution and Title 15, Section 13 U. S. C. (Act of February 25, 1903, C. 755, Sec. 1, 32 Stat. 904).

Findings

On October 11th, 1948, there was issued a subpoena to Morgan individually to appear before the grand jury at Monroe on the 18th of that month in the case of "U. S. v. Genally".

On October 8th, 1948, the District Attorney presented to this Court and there was granted an application for writs of subpoenas duces tecum addressed "to the president and/or official of the Consumers Ice Co., Shreveport, La."; "to the president and/or official of the Louisiana Ice Co., Shreveport, La."; "to the president and/or official of Morgan Ice Industries, Inc., Shreveport, La."; and "to the president and/or official of Morgan Ice Co., Shreveport, La.", commanding them all to produce "before the grand jury . . . on Monday, October 18th, 1948 . . . all documents described, listed and set forth" in Exhibits B to E, both inclusive. The descriptions in each instance were identical and were made part of the subpoenas addressed to the officers of the corporation as follows:

"Exhibit B" was attached to Consumers, "Exhibit C" to Louisiana, "Exhibit D" to Morgan Industries, Inc. and "Exhibit E" to the subpoena addressed to Morgan Ice Co.

Returns on the subpoena duces tecum, addressed to Louisiana, showed three attempts were made to serve the same upon Charles Elkins, "secretary-treasurer, both at its place of business, 2465 Texas Avenue and at his residence", twice on October 12th and again on the 14th without success, and it was finally returned unexecuted on October 18th, 1948, the date on which the documents were ordered to be produced before the grand jury.

No service was made upon Morgan Ice Industries, Inc., and according to testimony of defendant, Morgan, there was and is no such corporation.

Service upon Morgan Ice Co. was made "through S. R. Morgan, upon instructions from the United States Attorney". Again according to Morgan, there was also no corporation by this name, but he and his wife carried on the activities hereinafter mentioned, under this appellation as a registered trade name.

The following is the list of the papers and documents called for as attached to each subpoena addressed to the several corporations:

"1. All invoices, records of accounts, bills of lading from railroads and other public concerns, and records of transportation by privately owned trucks or by contract holders on all ice shipped or transported from your ice plant or plants to a destination outside the State in which said plant or plants are located during 1947 and 1948.

"2. All correspondence, office memoranda and all minutes of meetings of the board of directors, and all minutes of the meetings of the stockholders during the period from January 1, 1942 to October 1, 1948, which refer to the following subject matter:

"a. The ownership of the stock in the corporation;

"b. To the election of directors and officers of the corporation;

"c. To the designation of the managers of the business operations of the corporation;

"d. To the acquirement of any ownership interest in, or operating control of, the business of any person, company or corporation engaged in the manufacture or sale and distribution of ice in the territory in which you operated the manufacture, sale or distribution of ice on October 1, 1948.

"3. All price lists and records of prices of ice in effect by you during the years 1947 and 1948, including wholesale and retail prices at your plants or plant and on your distribution routes.

"4. All records of quantities of ice produced in each of your plants and the total sales from each of said plants during the years 1947 and 1948.

"EXHIBIT E."

Morgan appeared before the grand jury and the following is a transcription of what took place and his examination before that body:

"Testimony of Samuel Ross Morgan before Grand Jury Convened at Monroe, Louisiana, on October 18th, 1948

"By Mr. Flurry:

"Q. Mr. Morgan, will you state your full name so that the reporter may take it down?

"A. Samuel Ross Morgan.

"Q. Where do you live?

"A. Shreveport, Louisiana.

"Q. What is your street address?

"A. 775 Thora Boulevard.

"Q. Did you receive a subpoena from the United States District Court to produce certain documents before the Grand Jury?

"A. I did.

"Q. Have you brought with you these documents?

"A. As far as I know, yes, sir.

"Q. Did that subpoena which you received call for all invoices, records of accounts, bills of lading from railroads and other public transportation concerns, and records of transportation by privately owned trucks or by contract haulers on all ice shipped or transported from your ice plant or plants to a destination outside the State in which said plant or plants are located, during 1947 and 1948?

"A. I think so, yes, sir.

"Q. Have you produced those records?

"A. I have, as far as I have been able to locate them. I might add, if I may, I have not been active in this clerical department and two of my clerical help had an accident immediately after this subpoena—one fell and broke two or three ribs and I have been deprived of that help and still another is hospitalized and I have done the best I can. I have what you wish.

"Q. If you have any of those documents which have not been produced by you here this morning, where would those documents be located?

"A. They would be at 2465 Texas Avenue in Shreveport.

"Q. And who would be in charge of those clerical records?

"A. Well, I would. I am continuing with a young lady over there a further search for anything that would be further responsive. I think I have everything asked for.

"Q. Did you also bring all correspondence, office memoranda and all minutes of meetings of the Board of Directors, and all minutes of the meetings of the stockholders during the period from January 1, 1942 to October 1, 1948, which referred to the following subject matter: The ownership of the stock in the corporation?

"A. Well, I am sorry I have to tell you that those records are under subpoena duces tecum in the First Division, Circuit Court of Caddo Parish, but I can give it to you from memory.

"Q. What about the same documents relating to the election of directors and officers of the corporation?

"A. That is embodied in the minute book, of course, which is impounded.

"Q. The same documents with reference to the designation of the managers of the business operations of the corporation, would that also be incorporated?

"A. That would be in the corporate minutes.

"Q. And to the acquirement of any ownership interest in, or operating control of, the business of any person, company or corporation engaged in the manufacture or sale and distribution of ice in the territory in which you operated the manufacture, sale or distribution of ice on October 1, 1948?

"A. That is correspondence with reference to that?

"Q. Yes, correspondence, office memoranda and minutes of meetings.

"A. There has been nothing to that effect that I know of.

"Q. All price lists and records of prices of ice in effect by you during the years 1947 and 1948, including wholesale and retail prices at your plant or plants and on your distribution routes.

"A. Well, we only have two prices—

"Q. We are not asking you to testify, Mr. Morgan, unless you want to sign a waiver of immunity as to what transpired in your business. We are merely asking you for the corporation records.

"A. Well, I don't have any such records.

"Q. Do you have any records of quantities of ice produced in each of your plants and the total sales from each of said plants during the years 1947 and 1948?

"A. I do not have any plants.

"Q. Well, I meant the corporation, not you individually?

"A. Yes, those records are here.

"Q. The records which you have produced, Mr. Morgan, for the corporation, they are the records of the corporation made in the due course of business?

"A. That is correct.

"Q. That is all we wish to ask you, Mr. Morgan. We are not asking you to testify as to the operations, etc. We only want to identify the records.

"A. Does that mean I am excused?

"Q. Yes, but you may leave the records. Mr. Morgan, Mr. Plauche explained to me that your wife was over at the hotel and she was not feeling very well and we consented she remain over at her hotel room and in order to save her the embarrassment of service of a subpoena at the hotel Mr. Plauche said she would be glad to come over voluntarily.

"A. She is subject to your pleasure at any time.

"Q. I think we might as well let you bring her over and she can be excused when we are through with her.

"A. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Flurry: That is all. Thank you."

The documents produced before the grand jury are contained in a pasteboard box and consist of letter fileholders offered in the trial of this motion to dismiss and were numbered by defendant's counsel as mover's numbers 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 9, together with a more or less unintelligible memorandum book marked Mover 8.

Exhibit No. 1 embraces some several separate folders, bearing the labels, "Vivian Ice Company, Daily Reports", from April to October 1948, both inclusive. They purport to show the ice produced and the disposition made of it each day of the month with deposit slips in the name of the Vivian Ice Company, issued by the Bank of Vivian, La.

Mover No. 3 consists of some four folders labelled "Daily Reports, Morgan Ice Company, Longview, Texas", for the months of June to September, both inclusive, 1947, and are all of substantially the same character as those described as found in Mover No. 1.

Mover No. 4, labelled "Daily Reports—Morgan Ice Company, Dallas, Texas", for August and September, 1947 and consists of identical printed forms filled out as in the other two exhibits. However, there were no deposit slips attached to these forms as in the case of the Vivian Ice Co.

Mover No. 5 is a folder labelled "Independent Ice and Cold Storage Company, Mr. Walter B. Chandler, Shreveport" and contains carbon copies of two letters addressed to the said Chandler, dated respectively June 16th and July 16th, 1947, and samples of a letterhead labeled "Morgan Ice Companies, Shreveport, Louisiana", with "S. R. Morgan" on the left hand margin, and a similar blank envelope.

Mover No. 6 bears the label "Fair Colvin, Shreveport" and consists of carbon copies of letters dealing with proposals for handling the ice of several dealers of ice in the Shreveport area.

Mover No. 7 is labelled "City Ice Service, Inc.,—Mr. Moss, Shreveport" and contains carbon copies of letters addressed to Mr. W. S. Moss, manager City Ice Service, Inc., and signed variously "Louisiana Ice Co., Consumers Ice Co., by S. R. Morgan" and Consumers Ice Co., Louisiana Ice Co., Inc. by S. R. Morgan" and others also signed "S. R. Morgan."

Mover No. 9 contains a folder labelled "City Ice Service, Inc. . . . contract . . . Mr. Moss", another labelled "Texas and Pacific Rwy. Co.—Frt.—bills paid—1948", and a stock book marked "Consumers Ice Co., Shreveport", the latter indicating that three certificates were issued on October 31, 1947, as follows:

Certificate No. 1 to S. R. Morgan, Jr., "original issue", 126 shares, Certificate No. 2 to S. R. Morgan, Jr. for William Ellis Morgan IV, 123 shares, and Certificate No. 3, Mrs. Maude W. Morgan, for one share.

As stated above, there was also addressed to S. R. Morgan individually a subpoena to appear as a witness.

Conclusions

The transcript of Morgan's examination before the grand jury, as well as the subpoenas duces tecum addressed to the corporations, all show that the purpose was to inquire into the affairs of these corporations as the same bore upon the issue of whether there had been a violation of the anti-trust laws in the handling of ice in interstate commerce. No subpoena duces tecum was addressed to Morgan nor was his name as an officer in any of those directed to the corporations. Such papers as were brought before the grand jury were produced by Morgan, notwithstanding there was no effective service on the Louisiana Ice Co., Inc., and in response to a subpoena directed "to the president and/or official of Morgan's Ice Co., Shreveport, La. Morgan had made known to the server of the process that there was no corporation known as Morgan Ice Co., but under instructions from the U. S. Attorney service had been made upon Morgan in the manner stated, that is, upon "Morgan Ice Companies through S. R. Morgan".

If the statements of Morgan as a witness in the trial of this motion to dismiss are accepted, there were at least three corporations, to-wit: Louisiana Ice Co., Inc., Consumers Ice Co., Inc., and Morgan Vivian Ice Co., Inc., during the major portion of 1947 and all of 1948, a part of the period about which the grand jury was inquiring, and all their books and records were kept in the same office at 2465 Texas Avenue in the city of Shreveport, Louisiana. This defendant also testified that his son, S. R. Morgan, Jr., owned controlling interest in the Louisiana while this defendant's wife, Mrs. Maude W. Morgan, owned the major interest in the Consumers and Vivian, as well as one-half interest in all the earnings arising from a business carried on by Morgan individually in handling the output of the first of these corporations and in the operating of the other two under leases. In response to questions by the Court, however, Morgan admitted that, insofar as his wife was concerned, he actually made the decisions, operated and controlled all of these affairs of his wife in such manner as he saw fit. The files and documents produced show that he dealt indiscriminately with the affairs of the corporations in their or his name on all matters as he happened to choose at the particular instant. The result is that this and their affairs, if his testimony is to be accepted, are so badly mixed, it would be difficult to tell where his personal interests ended and corporate dealings began. Morgan claims to have leased each of the ice plants of Consumers and Morgan Vivian for the same price of $6,000 per year, notwithstanding the differences in their capacities; and their reports on employees for social security purposes, etc. were made in the names of the corporations. There is no question but that he and his family control all these three corporations, as well as operations of other plants at a number of smaller places both in Texas and Louisiana.

[Claim to Immunity Not Established]

It is significant, as Morgan admitted, that there were no written contracts of leases or of agreements to take the output of any plant and to handle matters in the manner he claims was done under the trade name of "Morgan Ice Companies". Much of his testimony, both before the grand jury and on the trial of this motion, is mixed up and conflicts, as will be seen by careful examinations. The summons to him as a witness did not command him to produce anything, and it was particularly obvious from the subpoena duces tecum that the Government was asking for corporate records. If Morgan saw fit to mix up his personal affairs with those of the corporations and to produce his own papers along with theirs, especially in view of the warning that was given him when he appeared before the grand jury, he has no one to blame but himself and it is not believed that he can now claim immunity in such circumstances. If this were permissible all that anyone would have to do in carrying on activities in violation of the anti-trust laws, would be to mix his personal affairs with those of the corporations, and when they were haled into court, voluntarily produce the whole in response to subpoenas addressed to them, and as to which he denies any official relationship, and thus plead the protection of the law, notwithstanding he might have been the one whose genius conceived and executed the entire scheme of law violation; and he would thus have the benefit of the corporate interests in all matters of responsibility for their illegal activities.

It is the view of this court that the motion to dismiss should be denied.

Proper decree should be presented.

California Unfair Practices Act

Price Cutting in Cigarette Business—Individual and State Remedies—Injunction Denied.—Injunctive relief was denied in an action brought by the Attorney General against jobbers and wholesalers of cigarettes for alleged price cutting in violation of the Unfair Practices Act. It was held that the Legislature could not have contemplated that injunctive relief would be granted to the State in addition to the private parties directly injured. Since it was well established at the time the Act was passed that equity would not enjoin violations of a criminal statute the Legislature, in the absence of express words to the contrary, could not have intended the rule to be circumvented. There was nothing in the language of the statute, the Court ruled, to support such intent. The state can not be interpreted so as to come within the term "person" as defined by the Act.

Section 3369 of the Civil Code authorizing state use of the injunction was held to be confined to the common law concept of unfair competition which was extended in its scope by judicial definition but not to the extent of the statutory definition found in the Unfair Practices Act.

See the California Unfair Practices Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8068.80.

Memorandum Ruling

[Issues Before the Court]

HANSON, CLARENCE M., Superior Judge: The decisive question presented by this and 29 other related cases, all instituted by the Attorney General against various jobbers and wholesalers of cigarettes, engaged in cutting prices in violation of the Unfair Trade Practices Act, is whether the State may enforce the Act through the injunctive process.

The Act is one of a series of four distinct acts enacted by the legislature, for the purpose—as stated by it—to preserve and regulate competition. One of the Acts deals with contracts in restraint of trade; a second with combinations in restraint of trade; a third with Fair Trade Contracts; and the other being the one before us, with Unfair Trade Practices. Only two of the Acts just mentioned prescribe remedies for their enforcement, i. e., the one with respect to Combinations in Restraint of Trade and the other the Unfair Trade Practices Act. The latter Act provides for both civil and criminal remedies. Any violation of the Act is made a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months or by both, for each single violation. In addition, the Act with respect to civil liability provides that "Any person or trade association may bring an action to enjoin and restrain any violation" of the Act "and, in addition thereto, for the recovery of damages."

The Act defines the word "person" as used in the preceding quotation as being "any person, firm, association, organization, partnership, business trust, company, corporation, or municipal or other public corporation." Accordingly, unless the State comes within the scope of the definition just quoted, it may not under the terms of that Act maintain this action for injunction unless other general statutes so provide.

[Nature of the Act]

At common law, selling below cost or price cutting was not unfair competition which alone at common law was actionable. Accordingly, the Unfair Trade Practices Act is not declaratory of the common law, but is strictly a statutory extension thereof. As the Act in question creates not only rights and liabilities but provides within the framework of the Act remedies along with the manner of their enforcement, it seems plain that no other remedies may be invoked unless they clearly embody a direct reference to the Act, expressly or by necessary implication.

The Act, it is clear, is primarily for the benefit of the vendors of merchandise and of benefit to the consuming public only so far as it preserves competition. Competition implies not monopoly prices, but low prices. Accordingly, it may not lightly be assumed that the legislature having provided a remedy in favor of all persons injured by a violation of the Act, either by way of double damages or injunction, or both—and additionally for fine and imprisonment for violators at the instance of the State—contemplated that the taxpayers' money should be spent by the State in an endeavor to enjoin violators, when that right was given to all persons directly injured. It would seem that if the legislature had desired to vest that power and duty in the State it would not have granted it to the persons directly injured, but would have limited their rights to double damages. As it was well established at the time the Unfair Trade Practices Act was enacted that equity would not enjoin violations of a criminal statute, the legislature could hardly have contemplated that the rule could or should be circumvented by legislation. To permit the State to enjoin a violation of the statute which prescribes criminal penalties is nothing more or less than to permit the State to enjoin violations that are made criminal by the express terms of the statute. There is nothing in the language of the statute to support any such intent by the legislature unless the word "person" as defined by the statute is interpreted as including the State. To be sure, it is true, as contended by the Attorney General, that the State in certain instances has been classed as a "person," "association," or "organization" or "public corporation"—all of which phrases are embodied in the statutory concept of a person. In that connection it is true, as contended by the Attorney-General, that a state is regarded as a "person" within the purview of the federal Sherman Anti-Trust Act, but it is equally true that the United States is not. The reason is that the United States alone and none of the individual states is parens patriae under that Act. In the Act before us the state is the parens patriae. Hence the same rule, it seems, should be applied. Without citing further examples or cases it is enough to say that if the legislature had contemplated that the Act was so decidedly important as a supposed public welfare act as to warrant vesting the injunctive process in and at the instance of the state, it would have said so by apt words. As was pointedly said by the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Cooper, 312 U. S. 600:

"The United States is a juristic person in the sense that it has the capacity to sue upon contracts made with it or in vindication of its property rights. The Sherman Act, however, created new rights and remedies which are available only to those on whom they are conferred by the Act. The precise question for decision, therefore, is whether, by the use of the phrase 'any person' Congress intended to confer upon the United States the right to maintain an action for treble damages against a violator of the Act.

"Since, in common usage, the term 'person' does not include the sovereign, statutes employing the phrase are ordinarily construed to exclude it. But there is no hard and fast rule of exclusion. The purpose, the subject matter, the context, the legislative history, and the executive interpretation of the statute are aids to construction which may indicate an intent, by the use of the term, to bring state or nation within the scope of the law."

In the instant case this court, using these aids of construction, is unable to find that the legislature intended by the use of the word "person" to include therein the State of California.

[Scope of Code Definition of Unfair Competition]

It is next argued that as the language of Civil Code § 3369 vests in the Attorney General the right to procure an injunction to enforce a penal law in cases, of nuisance or unfair competition, which latter phrase is defined as including "unfair or fraudulent business practices," the statute encompasses within that phraseology violations of the Unfair Trade Practices Act. If the legislature had intended by its expanded definition or "unfair competition" as that phrase is defined by the common law to include the statutory definition as set forth in the Unfair Practices Act, it seems it would have expressly said so. The phrase "unfair competition" as it was known to the common law has been extended in its scope by judicial definition, but in no instance to the extent of the statutory definition found in the Unfair Trade Practices Act. Hence it would seem that at best it was the expanded judicial definition and not the statutory definition which the legislature had in mind by the language it used in Civil Code § 3369. There is a definite support for that viewpoint in International etc. v. Landowitz, 20 Cal. (2d) 418. In that case the trial court denied an injunction to prohibit the continued violation of an ordinance even though the statute pursuant to which the ordinance was passed specifically granted the right to an injunction. The denial was based by the trial court on the claim that the statute was unconstitutional. . . . By the time the case reached the Supreme Court the statute had been repealed. The Supreme Court, however, in deciding the case, stated that even if the statute was not unconstitutional and even if it had not been repealed an injunction could only have been granted on the theory that Civil Code § 3369 was applicable. In holding that section could not be applied, the court said:

"Since 1933 it is true, section 3369 of the Civil Code has provided that any person performing an act of unfair competition may be enjoined. As used in that section, unfair competition means 'unfair or fraudulent business practice . . .' (Civil Code, Section 3369 (3)) . . . the statutory definition of 'unfair competition' thus incorporated in Civil Code Section 3369 is not essentially different from that which has historically furnished the basis for equity injunctions against unfair competition. Such injunctions were not directed against business practices like the ones involved here which, if unfair, are made so under special statute. Those actions ordinarily involved the fraudulent passing off of one person's goods as those of another. (American Philatelic Soc. v. Claiborne, 3 Cal. 2d 68, 697 (46 Pac. 2d 134); A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Co. v. United States, 295 U. S. 495, 531-532 (55 S. Ct. 837, 49 L. Ed. 1750, 97 A. L. R. 947); See Nims, Unfair Competition (2d ed. 1917) p. 547; Chaffee, Unfair Competition (1940), 53 Harv. L. Rev. 1289, 1301; 24 Cal. Jur. 6283 . . .

". . . Civil Code section 3369 contains no broader a definition of the term 'unfair competition' than existed at common law and in itself furnishes no basis for an injunction against the violation of the penal ordinance involved in this case."

Viewing that section of the Civil Code in the light it is viewed by the Supreme Court I have no occasion to determine whether the section is open to the challenge made to its constitutionality.

In passing it may be remarked that the identical question which is here presented has within the past few weeks been presented in two other superior courts of this state. In each instance, one a ruling by Superior Judge Buck, sitting in San Joaquin County and the other by Superior Judge Dehy sitting in the Riverside court, the decision was against the Attorney General.

For the reasons herein stated, I am of the view that the demurrer should be sustained without leave to amend; the restraining order discharged, and the request for a preliminary injunction denied. So ordered.

[¶ 62,421] Tag Manufacturers Institute et al. v. Federal Trade Commission.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit. October Term, 1948. No. 4287. May 12, 1949.

Petition to review an order of the Federal Trade Commission.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Order Set Aside—Agreement Provisions Unlawful.—A cease and desist order prohibiting manufacturers of tag products, pin tickets, and other pricing and marking devices from conspiring to fix prices, terms and conditions of sale for their products through use of a price reporting plan, has been set aside. It is not unlawful for tag manufacturers to participate in a tag industry agreement which (1) requires tag manufacturers to report prices, terms and conditions of sales to the administrator of the agreement, which information is disseminated to all tag manufacturers in a published price list, (2) allows tag manufacturers to make off-list transactions, (3) sets forth that tag manufacturers furnish copies of invoices to the administrator of the agreement which indicate quantity, grade, purchaser, and terms of sale, accompanied by a full statement of information covering samples, over-shipments, and free goods, which is disseminated to all tag manufacturers in tables showing the quantities sold and the sales value, (4) permits the institution of a proceeding for assessment of "liquidated damages" if an investigation indicates a violation of any reporting obligation of such a tag manufacturer, where incomplete dissemination of market information might cause pecuniary damage to the other manufacturers, and (5) requires that tag manufacturers render information compiled freely available to any person. Such an agreement is no more than a plan for the exchange of information as to past transactions, and cannot be considered a price-fixing scheme to restrain and suppress competition.

Setting aside the Federal Trade Commission's cease and desist order in Dkt. 4496.

Opinion of the Court

[Nature of Action]

MAGRUDER, Chief Judge: Petitioners in this case ask us, pursuant to the authority of § 5(c) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended (38 Stat. 719, 52 Stat. 112), to review and set aside or modify a cease and desist order of the Federal Trade Commission. The petition contains sufficient allegations of fact to establish this court as a proper forum for review.

[Facts]

On May 2, 1941, the Commission issued its complaint against the present petitioners, the Tag Manufacturers Institute (hereinafter called the Institute), an unincorporated trade association, Frank H. Baxter, trading under the name of Frank H. Baxter Associates, individually and as secretary-treasurer and executive director of the Institute, and twenty-nine corporations and two partnerships each engaged in the business of manufacturing tag products. The complaint alleged that beginning more than three years prior to May 2, 1941, and continuing to that date, petitioners "have entered into and carried out an understanding, agreement, combination, and conspiracy to restrict, restrain, suppress and eliminate price competition in the sale and distribution of said tag products" in interstate commerce; that pursuant to said agreement, petitioners "have fixed and maintained, and still fix and maintain, uniform prices, terms and conditions of sale for said tag products"; that the acts and practices of petitioners "have a dangerous tendency to and have actually hindered and prevented price competition" in the sale of tags in interstate commerce, have placed in petitioners the power to control and enhance prices on said products, have unreasonably restrained such commerce "and constitute unfair methods of competition in commerce within the intent and meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act."

There followed a protracted proceeding before the Commission, with a transcript of testimony of more than 2500 pages and exhibits numbering 1500 more or less. Finally, after a hearing on exceptions to the trial examiner's report, the Commission on May 19, 1947, issued its findings of fact and the cease and desist order now under review.

The manufacturing petitioners sell and distribute approximately 95 per cent of the tag products purchased and used in the United States, with 55 per cent of the business of the industry shared by the four largest manufacturers.

Certain standardized tags are made in advance of sale and sold out of stock, such as plain unprinted stock shipping tags. However, over 80 per cent of the business is in made-to-order tags, the varieties of which are almost unlimited, representing as they do selective combinations of materials and processes, or component elements, in various sizes and shapes. The much greater part of the products of the industry, particularly of made-to-order tags, is sold direct to consumers, but there is a considerable volume of sales to distributors and others for resale. To some extent, tag manufacturers buy from other manufacturers, for resale, types of tags which they do not themselves manufacture. Orders for tags are generally small in dollar value, averaging between $20 to $40, and a thousand or more orders are placed with manufacturers each business day.

In such an industry, it would evidently not be practicable for a manufacturer to give a price on each order, based upon an individual cost estimate of that order. Hence, early in the history of the industry, manufacturers began to issue price lists to their salesmen, distributors and customers. The simple stock tags were customarily listed at stated prices for the finished product. With respect to the more elaborate, and infinitely various made-to-order tags, the price lists would enumerate the prices of the various basic components, such as tag stock, strings, wires, punches, eyelets, stapling, gumming, printing, etc.—from which the price for any particular tag, made up from the desired combination of components, might be computed.[1]

A price list is normally not construed to be a general offer in the sense that a contract would be formed by a communication from an intending buyer stating that he agrees to take a specific quantity of the goods at the listed price; rather, the preferred construction is that the price list is merely an invitation to customers to make offers to buy on the basis of the list prices. 1 Williston on Contracts (rev. ed. 1936) § 27. The price list does serve to indicate to the trade the scale of prices which the seller hopes and expects to maintain in the generality of future transactions until further notice. If he should later wish to take advantage of changed market conditions warranting an increase in the price level, he would naturally put out a revised price list. If, on the other hand, the seller experiences difficulty in maintaining the scale of prices in his extant price list, and is increasingly obliged to make off-list sales at lower prices, the price list will eventually lose its significance and a revised one will be issued to the trade. In other words, from the nature of things it is reasonably to be expected that off-list sales would be the exception rather than the rule, and that the greater portion of sales would be at the prices stated in the seller's current price list. This is particularly true in an industry such as the tag industry, with its wide variety of products and tremendous number of sales transactions each of small dollar volume on the average.

The issuance of price lists by tag manufacturers had become established as a general practice in the industry prior to the formation of the Institute and prior to the execution of the various Tag Industry Agreements, later to be described, which formed the principal basis of the Commission's complaint against petitioners.

The Institute was organized in 1933, and has operated continuously since that time. All the manufacturing petitioners have become members of the Institute. At all times since its organization, the active management of the Institute has been in the hands of petitioner Frank H. Baxter, secretary-treasurer and executive director. The Institute has concerned itself with typical trade association activities, and among other things has fostered efforts at more refined standardization of tag products and components thereof.

While the National Industrial Recovery Act (48 Stat. 195) was in effect, a Code of Fair Competition for the Tag Industry was promulgated February 1, 1934. The Code Authority consisted of the Executive Committee of the Institute and such other persons as the Administrator for Industrial Recovery designated. Under the Code, a so-called "open-price plan of selling" was prescribed, under which each member of the industry was required to file a schedule of his prices and terms of sale; manufacturers who did not file such a schedule were "deemed to have filed a schedule conforming . . . with the schedule . . . on file which states the lowest price and the most favorable terms." It was provided that no filed sched-

"There are eight standard sizes of shipping tags and according to the T.M.I. Manual of Standard Specifications, these are commonly available in forty-nine different grades of stock. There are thirty-six varieties of printing in reasonably common use and any tag can be delivered in any of four forms, namely unstrung, strung, wired or with fasteners attached. Multiplying 8 by 49 by 36 by 4 gives 56,448 possible items based on the eight standard sizes of shipping tags.

That is, however, only the beginning. Shipping Tags can be furnished in other than standard sizes and in special qualities of stock, nor is the kind of printing necessarily limited to the thirty-six varieties above referred to. There are different qualities of strings and wires which can be attached in many different lengths and there are several styles of tag fasteners used every day of the week. Other special features available on Shipping Tags include serial numbers of which there may be from 1 to more than 100 on each tag, varnishing, paraffining, lacquering, special patches, punches and perforations, and various sizes and qualities of metal eyelet reinforcements.

Besides shipping tags the industry manufactures merchandise tags in considerable variety, subject, not only to the variations just discussed, but to considerably greater variety in sizes than is commonly among shipping tags."

ule "shall be such as to permit the sale of any product at less than the cost thereof" to the filing member, determined in a manner thereinafter prescribed. Further, it was provided that no member of the industry "shall sell such product for less than such price or upon terms or conditions more favorable" than stated in his filed price schedule. A revised schedule might be filed at any time, but such revision was not to become effective until seven days after the date of filing, "provided, however, that an increased price may become effective at such earlier date as the member filing the same shall fix." Petitioners concede that these price-fixing provisions of the Code would have been illegal except for the exemption from the anti-trust laws contained in the National Industrial Recovery Act.

[Scope of Tag Industry Agreements]

After the National Industrial Recovery Act was invalidated in A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U. S. 495 (1935), members of the industry adopted a succession of four Tag Industry Agreements, so-called, in 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1940. The 1940 agreement was in effect when the Commission's complaint was filed, and was still in effect at the time of the final hearing before the Commission. Four of the manufacturing petitioners were not subscribers to the first two agreements, but all of them were parties to the 1937 and 1940 agreements, and all tag manufacturers who were parties to a particular agreement were members of the Institute at the same time. One of the subscribers to the two later agreements, the Whitney Manufacturing Corporation, was not a tag manufacturer but a tag jobber, and hence a customer of tag manufacturers.

Each of the agreements provided that Baxter, in his business style Frank H. Baxter Associates, should undertake the administration of the terms of the agreement. Minimum wage provisions were contained in all four agreements, and industrial homework was outlawed by the 1937 and 1940 agreements. Otherwise the agreements were concerned chiefly with the reporting and dissemination of industry statistics. There was some variation in detail in the series of agreements, but these variations need not now be elaborately set forth. It is sufficient for present purposes to set forth with particularity only certain features of the 1940 agreement upon which the controversy chiefly turns.

The 1940 agreement is stated to be between certain manufacturers and distributors of tag products, thereinafter called the "Subscribers," and Frank H. Baxter Associates, thereinafter called the "Associates." The agreement recites the desire of the Subscribers "by voluntary action to foster fair competitive opportunities in the public interest, by gathering and disseminating information regarding the essential factors entering into their commercial transactions, and to preserve and maintain a free and open market for the sale and distribution of their products;" and the willingness of the Associates (Baxter) "to undertake and faithfully perform the duties essential to the effective and impartial administration of this Agreement."

Article I of the 1940 agreement defines the products embraced by the agreement by reference to a list contained in an appendix attached thereto. It further prescribes the monthly sum to be paid by each Subscriber to the Associates (Baxter) as compensation for the services to be rendered thereunder. In addition it is provided that each Subscriber shall at the outset deliver to the Associates (Baxter) a monetary deposit ($500 for the larger companies), to constitute a Revolving Fund out of which the Associates, as trustees, shall pay for the account of any Subscriber damages or assessments due under the terms of the agreement. All the parties "agree that the undertakings embraced by this contract shall at all times constitute the entire agreement between the parties, or any of them, relating to cooperative action in connection with transactions in the products"; that "any cooperative activities by and between the parties, or any of them, which may tend to extend these undertakings . . . shall constitute a breach thereof"; that the determination by a Board of Arbitration that there has been such a breach "shall have the effect of terminating the contract between that party or those parties found to have been in breach hereof and the other parties hereto."

Article II of the 1940 agreement requires the Subscribers to report to the Associates (Baxter) the prices, terms and conditions of each sale of or contract to sell any tag products covered by the agreement. Each such report shall be mailed to Baxter "not later than the close of the business day following that on which such sale or contract of sale was made"; and "shall include a full description of the transaction reported, including such specific items as the Associates may from time to time specify as necessary to a complete understanding of the prices, terms and conditions reported." Further, each Subscriber is required, at the effective date of the agreement, to send to Baxter "a complete statement of his published list price and terms, including his policies, for himself and his agents, regarding quantity differentials, trade classifications and discounts, credit terms, cash discounts, deferred and partial shipments, delivery terms, overruns and underruns, samples, overshipments, free goods, special services, and rebates or concessions of whatever nature; and complete specifications of his products." As often as a Subscriber's published list prices, terms or conditions of sale may be revised, "he shall report such revision to the Associates not later than the close of the business day following publication thereof." It is further provided that the reporting of published list prices and revisions thereof shall as to sales and contracts of sale "consummated on the basis of such published prices, terms and conditions," constitute the reporting of such transactions as required in the earlier portion of Article II. A further important provision of Article II is as follows:

"(5) The provisions of this Section are intended only to set forth the obligations of the Subscribers to report to the Associates all price-information affecting the products and every change in any element thereof, actually effective prior to such report. Nothing herein shall be construed as a limitation or restriction upon the right of each Subscriber independently to establish such prices, or such terms and conditions of sale, or policies of whatever nature affecting prices or sales as he may deem expedient. Nothing in any report made to the Associates by any Subscriber hereunder shall be construed as a representation or pledge as to prices, terms, conditions of sale, or policies in current or future transactions."

With reference to the use by Baxter of the foregoing information, it is provided:

"(6) The Associates shall disseminate information received pursuant to Article II hereof, to all Subscribers, in such form and to such extent as the Associates with the advice of the Subscribers may determine. Provided, however, that no price, term or condition of sale shall be publicized by the Associates until the same shall have appeared in a published price list or shall have been embodied in a closed transaction, whether a sale or contract of sale, or option or agreement to purchase.

All information relating to prices, terms and conditions of sale disseminated to the Subscribers pursuant hereto shall be freely and fully available to public agencies, distributors and consumers of the products, and to any other properly interested persons; and shall be disseminated in the same manner as to Subscribers, to such of them as may apply therefor and arrange for payment of the reasonable cost of such service.

Each Subscriber agrees that he will notify purchasers from him of the availability of this information."

Article III of the 1940 agreement requires each Subscriber throughout the life of the agreement to mail to Baxter "duplicates of every invoice or other memorandum of shipment or delivery of the products and of all credit memoranda applicable thereto. Such invoices and memoranda shall indicate quantity, grade or quality, price, destination, purchaser and terms of sale, and shall be accompanied by a full statement of all pertinent information covering samples, overshipments, free goods, special services, and rebates or concessions of whatever nature." All such duplicates must be mailed "not later than the close of the business day following that on which the originals thereof were mailed to their addressees." It is provided that the Associates (Baxter) "shall compile the information submitted to them pursuant to this Article in such a way as not to disclose the information of any one Subscriber or the names of any purchasers, and shall disseminate the same to all subscribers in tables showing the quantities of products sold and the sales value thereof; at such intervals and in such detail as the Associates, with the advice of the Subscribers, may from time to time determine."

Article IV of the 1940 agreement relates to the enforcement of the aforesaid reporting undertakings. It is recited that a breach of Article II or Article III by any Subscriber "resulting in the inaccurate, incomplete or tardy dissemination of market information which is the essential aim hereof will, it is agreed, cause pecuniary damage to every other Subscriber in proportion to the extent of his interest in the marketing of the products. And whereas the precise amount of actual damage in any given case would not be susceptible of accurate determination," the Subscribers agree to a scale of "liquidated damages" therein specified. Thus, for delay in transmitting a report of any price, term or condition of sale pursuant to Article II, the liquidated damages are stated to be $5 per day for the period of such delay, provided that no assessment of damages shall exceed 10 per cent of the value of the transaction in question. For failure to transmit copies of invoices or memoranda as described in Article III "within ten (10) days after the date of mailing of the original of each such invoice or memorandum," the "liquidated damages" are stated to be an amount equivalent to 10 per cent of the aggregate value of all the Subscriber's transactions proved to be affected by such failure, up to a maximum of $100 applicable to a single day's billing by one Subscriber. For refusal promptly to respond to inquiries by Baxter or to submit books or records to examination as provided in Article IV, the "liquidated damages" are stated to be $25 for each day of such default, after receipt from Baxter "of formal demand therefor, citing this Section." Liquidated damages in accordance with the foregoing provisions are to be assessed by Baxter, under a prescribed procedure, which includes the right of an accused Subscriber to a decision by a Board of Arbitration by way of appeal from a determination by Baxter. Liquidated damages collected from each Subscriber are to be distributed pro rata among all other Subscribers. The Article ends with the following: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed as requiring, authorizing or permitting the Associates to assess liquidated damages, if and whenever their counsel shall advise against such action on the grounds that such assessment might constitute an unlawful penalty or forfeiture; or if and whenever the facts found in any given case do not establish probable actual damages."

The final Article in the 1940 agreement, Article V, provides for termination of the entire agreement "by written agreement of a majority of the parties"; and permits any Subscriber to terminate his obligations thereunder by giving written notice to Baxter not less than 120 days prior to the desired termination date. It is further provided that any manufacturer of tag products "may become a Subscriber to this Agreement at any time by signing the same and making the payments provided in Article I hereof." An appendix contains additional agreements by the Subscribers relating to minimum wages and overtime rates for work in excess of forty hours per week, and forbidding the employment of homeworkers.

In administering the agreement, Baxter developed what the Commission found to be "a very ingenious system of compiling, correlating, and reporting, to each of the respondent members, the price information filed by them with him." The price lists forwarded to Baxter by the various tag manufacturers after they have been issued to salesmen, distributors and customers, are by him assembled, classified and reflected in a loose-leaf volume entitled "Compilation of Prices, Terms and Conditions of Sale in the Tax Industry," supplemented by letter bulletins from time to time. As above indicated, the manufacturers are required to send in to Baxter reports of their sales or contracts of sales made at off-list prices, that is, transactions consummated on terms varying from those specified in the particular manufacturer's filed price list; and these reports of off-list transactions must be mailed to Baxter not later than the close of the business day following that on which the sale was made. Baxter sends out to all Subscribers daily bulletins, or "pink sheets," recording thousands of these off-list transactions each month, showing the name of seller, description of the tag product, quantity, list price, actual price of the particular off-list transaction, and the state where the customer is located, but not disclosing the name of the buyer. In addition, Baxter periodically compiles and sends out statistical information showing aggregate quantities of tag products sold and aggregate sales value thereof, but not disclosing the figures of any individual manufacturer or the names of any purchasers. This information Baxter derives principally from the duplicate invoices which manufacturers are required to forward to him under Article III of the agreement.

Petitioners and the Commission are at odds in characterizing the information correlated by Baxter in the aforesaid loose-leaf volume or Compilation. The Commission found that the prices of each of the subscribing manufacturers as contained in the Compilation "constituted both the current and future prices" of said manufacturers. Petitioners, on the other hand, say that the Compilation "is a book of reference with respect to past market conditions only." This disagreement seems to us to resolve itself into a mere matter of nomenclature; the basic facts are clear. A new price list is reported to Baxter after it has been issued to the particular manufacturer's salesmen and customers. In that sense, it is a report of a past event. After the lapse of a few days, the information will be relayed by Baxter to the other Subscribers so that due correction of the Compilation may be made to conform to the revised price list. But the Tag Industry Agreement specifically recognizes that the manufacturers are free to make off-list sales; and in practice all of the subscribing manufacturers have freely done so. Therefore, the Commission is inaccurate in its finding that, when a price list is filed with Baxter, the prices so listed become and remain the prices for tag products of the Subscriber so filing until revised by notice to Baxter and the filing with him of a revised price list. Furthermore, a manufacturer making use of the Compilation at any given moment could not even be sure that the prices of a particular competitor listed therein were the prices contained in that competitor's currently effective price list; for the possibility could not be excluded that such competitor within the previous two or three days might have issued to the trade a revised price list, effective at once, which revision had not yet been relayed by Baxter in regular course.

On the other hand, it is obvious that the Compilation in the hands of the Subscribers is more than an object of academic historical interest and is designed for a practical business purpose. Manufacturers do not change their price lists every day. A price list may remain in effect for weeks, often for months, without change. While at any given moment it is possible that the most recently revised price list of one or two manufacturers might not yet have been reflected in the Compilation, there is every assurance that for the most part the Compilation discloses current price list information. Examination of the Compilation, together with the more recent "pink sheets" showing off-list sales, will give a quite accurate picture of the current price structure in the industry. Also, the "pink sheets" for several weeks past and recent revisions of price lists noted in the Compilation may disclose trends indicative of future market conditions. All this is true, even though each Subscriber remains free to change his price list at any time without prior notice, and though the Subscribers have made no commitment inter se, express or implied, to adhere to their published price lists. It is the contention of petitioners that the statistics thus made readily available under the Tag Industry Agreement are quite properly and lawfully disseminated in order that competition may be, not blind, but intelligent and informed.

[Commission's Findings]

Reference has previously been made to the NRA Code for the Tag Industry, under which it was unlawful for a tag manufacturer to make sales at prices or on terms more favorable to the buyer than those contained in his price schedule filed with the Code Authority; and under which a revised price schedule containing lower prices could not become effective until seven days after date of filing. The Commission found that the purpose of the Tag Industry Agreements "was to keep in force and effect the open price-reporting plan originally adopted under the National Industrial Recovery Act." We say without hesitation that this crucial finding is a pure assumption, not a rational inference from the evidence. Under the Tag Industry Agreement, a manufacturer may put into effect a new price list without prior notice to Baxter, and, though leaving unchanged his filed price list, he may make off-list sales also without prior notice to Baxter. The commitment is to report such transactions to Baxter after the event. Of course, a written agreement may be a sham to mask an actual understanding of the parties under the agreement negatives the possibility of an inference that the real agreement of the Subscribers was that they would adhere to their filed list prices. They all made off-list sales, and reported them to Baxter as required by the agreement. Off-list pricing has occurred without discernible territorial pattern, with no apparent correlation between the frequency of off-list sales and the size of the companies, or the types of tag products, or the size of the orders, or the classes of customers. There has been wide variation in the proportion of off-list business of individual manufacturers from week to week. The Commission found, as an over-all average, that approximately 25 per cent of the dollar value of the aggregate total sales of all the subscribing manufacturers has been at off-list prices. This figure the petitioners have accepted as correct.

The Commission further found as follows:

"A respondent member in filing an off-list or restricted offer with respondent

Frank H. Baxter for dissemination by him was in effect serving notice upon the respondent members competing with him that this was an unusual act and limited in nature and that he was not, in general, varying from his filed price list. Only to the extent that a respondent member repeated such off-list sales did such action affect the general price structure. Consequently, the publicity given to off-list sales among respondent members tended to restrain them from cutting prices and to cause them to maintain and adhere to their filed price lists as published in the general-offer price book [i. e., Baxter's "Compilation" above described]. Such publicity also informed all of the respondent members of the price activity of any particular members and placed the respondent members in a position to take retaliatory action if unsatisfactory pricing policies were followed by any particular respondent."

The foregoing is perhaps more in the nature of a priori argument than a finding of fact. In the many years of operation under the various Tag Industry Agreements, there have been untold hundreds of thousands of sales transactions. In the face of the finding that, on the average, 25 per cent of sales have been off list, an off-list sale certainly cannot be characterized as "an unusual act." We have already pointed out that from the nature of a price list, and the purpose it is designed to serve, one would expect that the greater proportion of sales would be at the prices stated in the seller's current price list; and it is certainly not surprising to find that 75 per cent of the sales of the subscribing manufacturers have been at list. Despite the fact that the Tag Industry Agreements have been in effect for a number of years, the Commission has produced no evidence indicating that the percentage of adherence to list prices has been on the increase, or indeed, that there is now a greater adherence to list prices than was the case prior to the promulgation of the NRA Code under which members of the industry were required to adhere to their filed price schedules. Nor is there evidence of "retaliatory action" by any Subscribers to coerce other Subscribers into adherence to list prices. They all engaged in off-list pricing to such an extent that it would be wholly irrational to infer that the essence of their agreement was that they would all adhere to their current price list on file with Baxter. The Commission argues in its brief that the requirement of disclosure of off-list sales "exposed the manufacturer who reduced his price to the odium of being a 'price cutter' or 'chiseler.'" Petitioners have aptly replied: "Someone has said that an odor which is common to all is offensive to none."

We quote now another important finding by the Commission:

"The effect of the operation of the open price-reporting plan under the agreements and in the manner hereinabove described has resulted in a substantial uniformity of prices for tags and tag products among the respondent members.

Such uniformity of prices is clearly indicated by examination of the prices, terms, and conditions of sale set out in the general-offer price books issued by the respondent Frank H. Baxter. In addition, a study was made by I. Chance Buchanan, who was called as a witness for the Commission in this proceeding. This witness studied and compared the offers of each of the respondent members for a selected test period and made a comparison of the prices reflected in the compilation set forth in the general-offer price books issued by the respondent Frank H. Baxter showing compilations of prices, terms, and conditions of sales as of May 12, 1939, and as of August 27, 1940. In making this study the witness prepared a series of tabulations showing the results of his investigation. Summarizing the results shown by these tabulations, it appears that at the beginning of the test period, May 12, 1939, the compilation reflected 96.8 percent uniformity and at the end of the period, August 27, 1940, the compilation reflected 97.5 percent uniformity of general-offer filed prices among the respondent members."

When the Commission finds that the operation of the price-reporting plan "has resulted in a substantial uniformity of prices," we take it the Commission is referring to uniformity of prices which buyers have been obliged to pay, though the finding is supported by reference to evidence relating to uniformity of price lists as reflected in the Compilation. In its brief, the Commission attributes to petitioners a "concession of a 75% uniformity in actual sales prices." It is clear that petitioners have made no such concession. They have conceded that approximately 75 per cent of their aggregate total dollar volume of sales has been at the prices in their respective price lists, which is quite a different thing. They have made no concession at all as to the percentage of uniformity of their filed price lists as reflected in the Compilation.

Petitioners make what has impressed us as a strong attack upon the statistical validity of the price list study by the Commission expert Buchanan referred to in the above quotation. The study was selective, and did not purport to embrace all types of tag products. The trial examiner described the tags covered by the study as "a representative variety of tags." Petitioners point out, however, among other objections, that types of tags representing only 13 per cent of total business were given 71.69 per cent weighting in the study, whereas types of tags representing 87 per cent of total business were given 28.31 per cent weighting; that the types of tags thus over-weighted were stock tags, list prices of which are usually substantially uniform when market conditions are stable, whereas the types of tags thus under-weighted were made-to-order tags, the list prices for components of which usually have a greater degree of non-uniformity. Petitioners also point out that the study excluded sales to wholesalers and sales to government agencies, although wholesalers' discounts and discounts to government agencies, as shown on price lists, were characteristically non-uniform. It is also noted that the Buchanan study reflected a percentage of price list uniformity of the selected types of tags on two dates only, May 12, 1939, and August 27, 1940. Even in the case of stock tags, list prices of which are usually substantially uniform when market conditions are not changing, as petitioners concede, there are from time to time unsettled periods during which Subscribers are successively filing revisions of their price lists, which periods may extend over weeks or months, when there must obviously be non-uniformity in the filed list prices. Petitioners' statistical challenge to the conclusions of the Buchanan study are really not answered in the Commission's brief, except with the suggestion that it is "impracticable" for an appellate court to weigh "petitioners' complicated and labored objections without retrying the case."

[Conclusion]

We think the evidence does warrant a finding that during the life of the Tag Industry Agreements there has from time to time been considerable list price uniformity with respect to types of tags constituting a large portion of the industry's business. Such a finding, in conjunction with the unchallenged finding that on the average 75 per cent of the industry's business is done at list, would warrant the inference that during the years in which the Tag Industry Agreements have been in effect there has been a considerable uniformity of actual selling prices. The evidence does not, however, warrant the Commission's finding that the effect of the operation of the Tag Industry Agreements "has resulted in a substantial uniformity of prices for tags and tag products among the respondent members." In the first place, this implies that the instances of departure from uniformity are insignificant and unsubstantial—which certainly cannot be said. In the second place, there is no evidence that such uniformity as has existed is a result of the operation of the Tag Industry Agreements, for it does not appear whether there has been an increase or decrease of uniformity either in list prices or in actual selling prices since the agreements have been in operation.

The only evidence in the record giving a glimpse of actual competition between manufacturers for the same piece of business is Commission's Exhibit 1022. This exhibit was compiled by a Commission witness from "pink sheets" in Baxter's office covering a period during which the Tax Industry Agreement of 1937 was in effect, which agreement, unlike that of 1940, required the subscribing manufacturers to report to Baxter their off-list quotations as well as consummated sales. The exhibit covered a wide variety of tag products with respect to which the "pink sheets" disclosed a complete uniformity of list prices for the tag or its component parts. It showed over 400 instances in which two or more manufacturers quoted off-list prices to the same customer at the same time on the same piece of business. In 95 per cent of all the given instances, there was non-uniformity in the quoted prices. In every one of the instances where more than three manufacturers were bidding for the same order, the customer had a choice of different quoted prices. Counsel for the Commission was embarrassed when petitioners' counsel proceeded to point out to the trial examiner what the exhibit showed, and sought unsuccessfully to withdraw the exhibit from evidence on the ground that it had been introduced for another purpose. Thus, the only evidence in the record showing actual "shopping around" by tag buyers before placing an order indicated that in 95 per cent of the instances there was competition among the rival manufacturers on the basis of price differentials. Not a single buyer was called by the Commission as a witness to testify that he tried shopping around on a price basis among two or more manufacturers and was met by uniformity of price quotations. Under the circumstances it is not reasonable to assume that the competitive picture etched by Commission's Exhibit 1022 is a distorted one.

In support of its conclusion, the Commission refers to the provisions in the Tag Industry Agreements designed to insure compliance with the reporting commitments of the Subscribers. Baxter was given access to the books and records of the Subscribers in the investigation of complaints of violations and in routine periodic checkups. The Commission found that Baxter "caused periodic checks to be made of the books and records of the various respondent members by a representative of his office to determine if they were adhering to the published prices and reporting all deviations therefrom." As phrased, this finding contains an ambiguous overtone which seems to imply that there was an agreement to adhere to list prices, and that Baxter examined the books to see if this agreement was being fulfilled. As previously indicated, there was no such agreement. The evidence is uncontradicted that Baxter's only concern with off-list transactions was to find out if they had been reported, after the event, as the agreement required. If the investigation indicated a violation of any reporting obligation of a Subscriber, Baxter would institute proceedings for assessment of "liquidated damages" as specified in the agreement. Total assessments for acts of non-compliance amounted to less than $10,000 for the period 1935-1941. The record contains not a single instance of an assessment for failure to adhere to a list price.

The provisions of the Tag Industry Agreement of 1940, above quoted, are carefully drawn on the theory that these assessments are in the nature of "liquidated damages," which are not to be imposed in the absence of a finding of "probable actual damages." Cf. Sun Printing and Publishing Assn. v. Moore, 183 U. S. 642 (1902). In fact there is evidence in the record of instances where the Board vacated assessments on the ground of lack of probable actual damages. The Commission consistently describes these assessments as "penalties." Whether they are "liquidated damages," as they purport to be, or "penalties," as the Commission calls them, is hardly decisive. If the reporting commitments they are designed to buttress are otherwise lawful, the agreement does not become a violation of the anti-trust laws or the Federal Trade Commission Act merely because the reporting plan is accompanied by a penalty provision which would not be legally enforceable.

Nor is the conclusion of the Commission strengthened by its finding that the administration of the reporting agreements "was materially assisted by the standardization of the component parts of tags and tag products developed and adopted under the auspices of the respondent Institute." As a matter of fact the foundation work in the direction of standardization was done many years before the Institute was organized. A simplified practice recommendation for paper shipping tags was developed by a general conference of producers, distributors and users of such tags under the auspices and with the active assistance of the Division of Simplified Practice, National Bureau of Standards, and was promulgated by the United States Department of Commerce. A revision was approved in 1939, and has been generally accepted by a large number of producers, distributors and users, and by various agencies of the government, including the Federal Trade Commission. These standardizations are deemed to be to the advantage of all concerned, including the consumer who, among other benefits, is thereby better enabled to know what he is buying and to make intelligent price comparisons. Of course, the detailed standardization of tags and components which the Institute has assisted in developing tends to make more serviceable, the information reported to Baxter under the Tag Industry Agreement and by him collated and disseminated among the Subscribers. But if the reporting agreement is otherwise lawful, such enhanced usefulness of the agreement as results from standardization would hardly infect it with illegality. See Maple Flooring Manufacturers Assn. v. United States, 268 U. S. 563, 566 (1925).

There has been some tendency to look askance at reporting agreements between competitors, where the information exchanged is reserved exclusively to themselves and withheld from buyers or the public generally. Presumably this is because such secrecy more readily suggests the inference that the agreement is inspired by some unlawful purpose and precludes the argument that the information thus secretly exchanged serves a function similar to that of market information made available through the activities of commodity exchanges, trade journals, etc. See American Column & Lumber Co. v. United States, 257 U. S. 377, 411 (1921); Sugar Institute, Inc. v. United States, 297 U. S. 553, 596-7 (1936); with which cf. Maple Flooring Manufacturers Assn. v. United States, supra, 268 U. S. at 573-4. The Commission has therefore been at pains to discredit the provision of the Tag Industry Agreements which purport to render the information compiled by Baxter freely available to any interested person. It found that in practice "the respondent members gave only lip service to this provision and never adopted any practical plan whereby this information might be made available to buyers generally." As above stated, one of the Subscribers to the agreements was the Whitney Manufacturing Corporation, a tag jobber and a buyer from tax manufacturers. The 1940 agreement provided that the information "shall be freely and fully available to public agencies, distributors and consumers of the products, and to any other properly interested persons." It was further provided that the information should be disseminated, in the same manner as to Subscribers, to any persons who might apply therefor and arrange for paying the reasonable cost of the service. Subscribers agreed that they would notify their customers of the availability of this information. Under the 1937 agreement, copies of the Compilation were made available for general inspection at the various regional offices of Dun & Bradstreet. In 1940 this practice was discontinued and instead the subscribing manufacturers thereafter printed a statement on their respective invoices reading as follows: "In common with most tag manufacturers, we file up-to-date records of tag prices with Frank H. Baxter Associates, 370 Lexington Ave., New York City, where they are open for inspection." Baxter kept a Compilation available in his office at New York City for examination by any interested party. However, the Commission found: "While the record indicates that this compilation may have been occasionally examined by purchasers, this plan served no useful purposes for purchasers and consumers located outside the New York area and could not be considered as making this price information available to buyers generally."

We are clearly of opinion that if the reporting agreement is otherwise unobjectionable, it cannot be said to have become illegal for failure of the Subscribers to make the information generally available. Customers are notified on each invoice that "up-to-date records of tag prices" are open for inspection at Baxter's New York office. If a customer living outside New York City has any curiosity in the matter, he can use the mails; and there is no reason to assume that Baxter would not furnish the information requested. Nor is there any reason to assume that Baxter would not inform the inquiring customer of his right under the Tag Industry Agreement to subscribe to the service regularly. It is noteworthy that the Commission has failed to produce a single tag buyer to testify that he was unaware of the existence of this information service, or that he sought information from Baxter and could not get it, or that he sought to subscribe to the service and was refused. See United States v. United States Steel Corp., 251 U. S. 417, 448 (1920). We agree with petitioners that availability "does not mean that the information must be crammed down the throats of buyers who are not interested in seeing it." None of the cases has gone that far.

We have come to the conclusion that the reporting agreements herein, and the practices of petitioners thereunder, are lawful under the controlling authorities. In the sense indicated earlier in this opinion, the issuance of a price list may be said to be an "announcement of future prices." The nature of price lists has not changed under the Tag Industry Agreements from what it has historically been in the industry. The price list is subject to change without notice, and may be freely revised at any time. Even while a particular price list is extant, the manufacturer is free to make sales at off-list prices. This has always been so (except under the NRA Code), and still remains so under the Tag Industry Agreement. When a new price list is issued, the agreement requires the manufacturer, after the event, to report such revised price list to Baxter. In effect the manufacturer thus says to Baxter: "Enclosed is a copy of the new price list which I put in effect yesterday by issuance to my salesmen, distributors and customers." Once a price list has been issued to the trade it necessarily becomes pretty much public property. There is certainly nothing secret about it. It would be no great feat for a manufacturer to obtain copies of his competitors' price lists. The Tag Industry Agreement merely facilitates the assembling of such data. As to the obligation of Subscribers to report off-list sales and to furnish copies of all invoices, that is no more than the reporting of past transactions. The Commission has endeavored to show that the agreement was something more than this, that it was a price-fixing agreement having the purpose and actual effect of restraining and preventing price competition. We believe that such findings are unsupported by the evidence or by any reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom. We say this with full recognition of our limited scope of review of findings of fact by the Commission. Federal Trade Commission v. Algoma Lumber Co., 291 U. S. 67, 73 (1934).

The Commission's reliance upon American Column & Lumber Co. v. United States, 257 U. S. 377 (1921), and United States v. American Linseed Oil Co., 262 U. S. 371 (1923), is misplaced. Neither of these cases suggests that it is per se unlawful for competitors to agree to an exchange of trade data through reports to a central agency. In Maple Flooring Manufacturers Assn. v. United States, 268 U. S. 563, 580 (1925), the Court explains that its opinion in the American Column & Lumber Co. case "rests squarely on the ground that there was a combination on the part of the members to secure concerted action in curtailment of production and increase of price, which actually resulted in a restraint of commerce, producing increase of price." At a later point in the Maple Flooring case (p. 585), the Court, in referring collectively to the American Column & Lumber Co. and American Linseed Oil Co. cases, said: "The unlawfulness of the combination arose not from the fact that the defendants had effected a combination to gather and disseminate information, but from the fact that the court inferred from the peculiar circumstances of each case that concerted action had resulted, or would necessarily result, in tending arbitrarily to lessen production or increase prices." The Court decided in the Maple Flooring case (p. 586) that trade associations "which openly and fairly gather and disseminate information as to the cost of their product, the volume of production, the actual price which the product has brought in past transactions, stocks of merchandise on hand, approximate cost of transportation from the principal point of shipment to the points of consumption, as did these defendants, and who, as they did, meet and discuss such information and statistics without however reaching or attempting to reach any agreement or any concerted action with respect to prices or production or restraining competition, do not thereby engage in unlawful restraint of commerce." We think the following observations of the Court in that case are also relevant to the case at bar (268 U. S. 582-3):

"It is not, we think, open to question that the dissemination of pertinent information concerning any trade or business tends to stabilize that trade or business and to produce uniformity of price and trade practice. Exhange of price quotations of market commodities tends to produce uniformity of prices in the markets of the world. Knowledge of the supplies of available merchandise tends to prevent over-production and to avoid the economic disturbances produced by business crises resulting from over-production. But the natural effect of the acquisition of wider and more scientific knowledge of business conditions, on the minds of the individuals engaged in commerce, and its consequent effect in stabilizing production and price, can hardly be deemed a restraint of commerce or if so it cannot, we think, be said to be an unreasonable restraint, or in any respect unlawful. [Italics added.]

"It is the consensus of opinion of economists and of many of the most important agencies of Government that the public interest is served by the gathering and dissemination, in the widest possible manner, of information with respect to the production and distribution, cost and prices in actual sales, of market commodities, because the making available of such information tends to stabilize trade and industry, to produce fairer price levels and to avoid the waste which inevitably attends the unintelligent conduct of economic enterprise. Free competition means a free and open market among both buyers and sellers for the sale and distribution of commodities. Competition does not become less free merely because the conduct of commercial operations becomes more intelligent through the free distribution of knowledge of all the essential factors entering into the commercial transaction. General knowledge that there is an accumulation of surplus of any market commodity would undoubtedly tend to diminish production, but the dissemination of that information cannot in itself be said to be restraint upon commerce in any legal sense. The manufacturer is free to produce, but prudence and business foresight based on that knowledge influence free choice in favor of more limited production. Restraint upon free competition begins when improper use is made of that information through any concerted action which operates to restrain the freedom of action of those who buy and sell."[2]

In Cement Manufacturers Protective Assn. v. United States, 268 U. S. 588, 606 (1925), the Court said:

"We realize also that uniformity of price may be the result of agreement or understanding, and that an artificial price level not related to the supply and demand of a given commodity may be evidence from which such agreement or understanding, or some concerted action of sellers operating to restrain commerce, may be inferred. But here the Government does not rely upon agreement or understanding, and this record wholly fails to establish, either directly or by inference, any concerted action other than that involved in the gathering and dissemination of pertinent information with respect to the sale and distribution of cement to which we have referred; and it fails to show any effect on price and production except such as would naturally flow from the dissemination of that information in the trade and its natural influence on individual action."

Upon the authority of the Maple Flooring case, the Court held that "such activities are not in themselves unlawful restraints upon commerce and are not prohibited by the Sherman Act."

In Sugar Institute, Inc. v. United States, 297 U. S. 553 (1936), the Court struck down an agreement which included a reporting feature with "a requirement of adherence, without deviation, to the prices and terms publicly announced." (P. 582; see also pp. 577-9, 585, 601.) Explaining the holdings in American Column & Lumber and the Linseed Oil cases, supra, the Court said (pp. 599-600): "And while the collection and dissemination of trade statistics are in themselves permissible and may be a useful adjunct of fair commerce, a combination to gather and supply information as a part of a plan to impose unwarrantable restrictions, as, for example, to curtail production and raise prices, has been condemned." Chief Justice Hughes, speaking for a unanimous Court, also had this to say (p. 598):

"Further, the dissemination of information is normally an aid to commerce. As free competition means a free and open market among both buyers and sellers, competition does not become less free merely because of the distribution of knowledge of the essential factors entering into commercial transactions. The natural effect of the acquisition of the wider and more scientific knowledge of business conditions on the minds of those engaged in commerce, and the consequent stabilizing of production and price, cannot be said to be an unreasonable restraint or in any respect unlawful." [Italics added.]

Obviously the Sugar Institute case is distinguishable from the case at bar for here, as we have seen, the parties have made no agreement to adhere to their filed list prices and, in fact, have departed therefrom whenever they saw fit. The distinction is sharply defined by a further extract from the Sugar Institute case (297 U. S. at 601):

"The vice in that agreement was not in the mere open announcement of prices and terms in accordance with the custom of the trade. That practice which had grown out of the special character of the industry did not restrain competition. The trial court did not hold that practice to be illegal and we see no reason for condemning it. The unreasonable restraints which the defendants imposed lay not in advance announcements, but in the steps taken to secure adherence, without deviation, to prices and terms thus announced. It was that concerted undertaking which cut off opportunities for variation in the course of competition however fair and appropriate they might be."

It is true that the above cases all came under the Sherman Act rather than under the Federal Trade Commission Act. In Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U. S. 683, 694, 708 (1948), it was pointed out that whereas all conduct condemned by the Sherman Act may likewise be an "unfair method of competition" in violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act, the converse is not necessarily true; that individual or concerted conduct which falls short of being a Sherman Act violation may nevertheless constitute an unfair method of competition under the Federal Trade Commission Act. But in the case at bar the gravamen of the Commission's case against petitioners was that the agreement was more than a plan for the exchange of information as to past transactions, and was in fact a price-fixing scheme which in purpose and effect unduly restrained and suppressed competition. The Commission has not held, and would not be warranted in holding, that in the absence of these assumed features of Sherman Act violations (which we think are not supported by the evidence), the reporting agreement as such is nevertheless an "unfair method of competition" within the meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

[Order Set Aside]

Since, in our view of the case, the cease and desist order will have to be set aside, it becomes unnecessary for us to consider certain seriously pressed objections by petitioners to the breadth of the order.

A judgment will be entered setting aside the order of the Commission.

[¶ 62,422] United States v. Morton Salt Co. United States v. International Salt Co.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. No. 9753—9754. May 20, 1949.

Appeals from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Power of Commission to Enforce Compliance Report.—After a Court of Appeals has modified a cease and desist order of the Commission, under Section 5, prohibiting a price fixing conspiracy in the sale of salt, the Commission does not have the power to require "additional reports of compliance." The Court of Appeals retains exclusive jurisdiction to enter into such further orders as may become necessary effectively to enforce compliance.

See the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212.5336, 2212.5355, 2212.545, and Federal Trade Commission Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 6125.493.

Compliance Reports Under Section 6 of Act.—Section 6 (a) and 6 (b) of the Act cannot be utilized as an aid to a proceeding in which the Commission seeks to require salt manufacturers to make additional reports of compliance with a cease and desist order issued under Section 5. Not only does the language fail to reveal any interdependence of the two sections, but the opposite is indicated. Section 6 is directed solely to a "corporation," while Section 5 refers to any person, partnership, or "corporation." Section 6 is concerned with annual and special reports, while Section 5 makes no mention of reports but leaves it to the court to "issue its own order commanding obedience to the terms of such order of the Commission." The term "special report," as used in Section 6, means something entirely different from "an additional or supplemental report showing the manner and form of compliance."

See the Federal Trade Commission Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 6126.

Penalties Under Section 10 of Act.—The Commission cannot, under Section 10, recover forfeitures for failure of respondent salt manufacturers to comply with an order requiring reports of compliance with a cease and desist order issued under Section 5. Section 10 provides for recovery for failure to file "any annual or special report . . . within the time fixed by the Commission." No forfeiture is provided for failure to file "an additional and supplemental report showing the manner of compliance," with a cease and desist order.

See the Federal Trade Commission Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 6130.

Affirming the judgment of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, reported at ¶ 62,296, concerning FTC Dkt. 4319.

Before Major, Chief Judge, Minton and Duffy, Circuit Judges.

MAJOR, Chief Judge: This action was commenced by the United States against numerous defendants, including International Salt Company and Morton Salt Company. From an adverse judgment entered August 20, 1948, the government separately appealed as to these two defendants. Only issues of law are involved in each appeal, and, being identical, they may appropriately be considered and disposed of in a single opinion.

The action, according to the complaint, was instituted by the Attorney General upon request of the Federal Trade Commission (hereinafter called the Commission) for the enforcement of a Commission order "requiring additional reports of compliance," and to recover forfeitures for failure of defendants to comply with such order. The action is predicated upon Title 15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 49,[1] which vests the several District Courts of the United States with jurisdiction to direct a corporation to comply with an order issued by the Commission, and Sec. 50, which vests any District Court with jurisdiction of suits by the United States for the recovery of forfeitures if a corporation fails to file any report so required within the time fixed by the Commission.

The order sought to be enforced was issued by the Commission on September 2, 1947, under the authority asserted to reside in Rule XXVI, promulgated by the Commission, and Sec. 46 (a) and (b) of the Act. The complaint sets forth verbatim the order relied upon and the notice of default served on the defendants. There are attached to the complaint numerous exhibits, including a copy of Rule XXVI.

[Previous Opinions]

The court below in a well reasoned opinion held that it was without jurisdiction to entertain the cause of action. United States v. Morton Salt Co. and International Salt Co. v. United States, 80 F. Sup. 419. This holding was predicated upon the conclusion that the Commission's order of September 2, 1947 was invalid because issued without authority. It is obvious, so we think, that the right to maintain the instant action is dependent upon the validity of the order.

[Facts]

The issue thus presented calls for a further statement of the factual situation. On September 18, 1940, the Commission issued its complaint under Sec. 45, charging defendants and others with engaging in an unlawful conspiracy to fix prices on and to control the production of salt in connection with the sale and distribution of that commodity in interstate commerce. On November 10, 1941, the Commission issued its order to cease and desist, requiring the defendants to discontinue the conspiracy alleged in the complaint. A petition for review of the Commission's order was filed by the defendants in this court which rendered its opinion March 8, 1943. Salt Producers Association v. Federal Trade Commission, 134 F. 2d 354. On April 20, 1943, this court entered its decree modifying the Commission's order in certain respects, affirming it as modified and directing compliance therewith. In effect, this court by its decree enforced the modified cease and desist order under Sec. 45 and commanded these defendants (as well as the others) to obey said decree, without prejudice to the right of the Commission to initiate contempt proceedings or penalty proceedings under Sec. 45 (1), and it required the defendants to file a compliance report within ninety days and reserved to this court "jurisdiction of this cause to enter such further orders herein from time to time as may become necessary effectively to enforce compliance in every respect with this decree and to prevent evasion thereof . . . ." Within the time thus designated in the decree of this court, each of the defendants filed a report with the Commission showing the manner and form in which they were complying with the court's decree. In the interim, during a period of more than five years, no question has been raised by the Commission as to the form or content of such compliance reports, and during said period the defendants have not been charged with a violation of the decree of this court and no request has been made by the Commission that this court order or direct an investigation into defendants' conduct.

The government apparently senses the insecurity of its position if it be held that the order sought to be enforced was in aid of or for the purpose of enforcement either of the decree of this court or the Commission's cease and desist order modified to conform therewith. And so any such purpose on the part of the Commission is disclaimed. There was no attempt, so it is asserted, to enforce either the court's decree or the Commission's order, but "the sole purpose of the order requiring the reports was to inquire as to the manner of compliance by defendants with the Commission's modified order to cease and desist . . . and this Court's decree enforcing that order." We have some difficulty in following a theory that the purpose was merely to obtain information as to whether defendants have been violating the decree of this court and at the same time denying that such purpose bears any relation to its enforcement. We are informed that if the defendants are shown to have violated the order of the Commission modified in conformity with the decree of this court, two courses are open, (1) it can certify the facts to the Attorney General under Sec. 56 of the Act, requesting that he file a civil suit seeking civil penalties under the provisions of Sec. 45 (1), or (2) it can petition this court for a rule requiring defendants to show cause why they are not in contempt of court.

[Action Based on Previous Proceeding]

We, as the court below, do not agree with the government's contention that the Commission initiated a new investigation. The record plainly discloses that the controverted order was issued in connection with and as a part of the proceeding theretofore had under Sec. 45; in fact, the order itself calls for "an additional and supplemental report showing the manner and form of compliance with the modified order to cease and desist entered by the Commission on August 10, 1943, and with the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit entered on April 22, 1943." "Additional and supplemental" to what? The answer must be that such reference was to the report of compliance required by the decree of this court and that the order was only a further step in the proceeding of which this court retained jurisdiction. Any doubt in this respect is dispelled by the fact that the order of September 2, 1947 is given the same title and docket number as the Commission's original order dated November 10, 1941.

[Exclusive Jurisdiction of Court]

As already noted, this court retained jurisdiction "to enter such further orders . . . as may become necessary effectively to enforce compliance in every respect with this decree and to prevent evasion thereof." The jurisdictional reservation thus provided was in conformity with Sec. 45 of the Act; in fact, a reading of this section discloses in unmistakable fashion that every vestige of jurisdiction over a proceeding such as that under discussion was definitely lodged with the Court of Appeals. The court is given the power to enter a decree "affirming, modifying, or setting aside the order of the Commission, and enforcing the same to the extent that such order is affirmed," and "the court shall thereupon issue its own order commanding obedience to the terms of such order of the Commission." It is also provided, "The judgment and decree of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court upon certiorari." Not only was the court endowed with jurisdictional power, but by subsection (d) it was provided that such jurisdiction "shall be exclusive."

Thus, with enforcement jurisdiction so firmly and exclusively lodged in a Court of Appeals both by the statute and decree of the court, it would seem that one who asserts such jurisdiction to reside elsewhere is confronted with a heavy burden which can be met only by a rule or statutory provision, which makes clear a legislative purpose to impair or divide the jurisdictional responsibility provided in Sec. 45. Language which only confuses the situation or raises a doubt should not be accepted as sufficient.

An analysis of Sec. 46 furnishes no sound basis for the contention either that it can be utilized as an aid to a proceeding under Sec. 45 or that it was intended to impair or detract from the unambiguous and exclusive jurisdictional provision of that section.

Sec. 46, so far as relevant, empowers the Commission in paragraph (a) "To gather and compile information concerning, and to investigate . . . the organization, business, conduct, practices, and management of any corporation . . . and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships," and in paragraph (b) "To require, by general or special orders, corporations, . . . or any class of them, or any of them . . . to file with the commission . . . annual or special, or both annual and special, reports or answers in writing to specific questions . . .," which will inform the Commission regarding the business affairs of those corporations, and the "relation" thereof "to other corporations, partnerships, and individuals . . . ."

Not only does the language fail to reveal any interdependence of the two sections, but the opposite is indicated. Sec. 46 is directed solely to a "corporation," while Sec. 45 refers to any "person, partnership, or corporation." Also, Sec. 46 is concerned with "annual or special, or both annual and special, reports," while Sec. 45 makes no mention of reports but leaves it to the court to "issue its own order commanding obedience to the terms of such order of the Commission."

Both sides have set forth, particularly with reference to Secs. 45 and 46, a large amount of legislative history, a discussion of which would serve no useful purpose. It can be safely said, however, that such history discloses that Secs. 45 and 46 were not intended as complementary but were designed as separate and distinct, each directed to different situations. The dual purposes embodied in the two sections were recognized in F. T. C. v. Millers' National Federation, 47 F. 2d 428, 429, wherein the court stated: "The power of investigation conferred upon the Commission by section 6 is different in character from the jurisdiction conferred by section 5. Section 6 contemplates an investigation for the collection of facts for the information of Congress in aid of the exercise of its legislative function, or for the President in aid of recommending necessary legislation." See also F. T. C., et al. v. Claire Furnace Co., et al., 274 U. S. 160, 170.

The report required by the controverted order, as already noted, calls for "an additional or supplemental report showing the manner and form of compliance," while Sec. 46 is limited to "annual or special reports." In order to bridge this gap we are urged to hold that there is no difference between "an additional or supplemental report" and a "special report." We are not impressed with this reasoning. It seems reasonably plain to us that the term "special report," as used in Sec. 46, means something entirely different and distinct from "an additional or supplemental report showing the manner and form of compliance." This view is strengthened from the fact that Sec. 50, upon which the instant forfeiture action is predicated, provides for recovery for failure to file "any annual or special report . . . within the time fixed by the Commission." It is of significance that this forfeiture section and Sec. 46 characterize the report precisely in the same manner. No forfeiture is provided for failure to file "an additional or supplemental report," as called for by the Commission's order in the instant matter. In fact, reports so designated are not, so far as we are aware, referred to any place in the Act.

Admittedly, the report required by the Commission's order in the instant matter is not an "annual report," and we think it equally plain that it is not a "special report." This view finds support in the House Committee's report on interstate and foreign commerce (Report No. 533, 63rd Congress, 2nd Session), wherein annual and special reports are discussed. The congressional committee stated the purpose in authorizing the Commission to require special reports as follows: "The Commission under this section may also require such special reports as it may deem advisable. By this means, if the ordinary data furnished by a corporation in its annual report does not adequately disclose its organization, financial condition, business practices, or relation to other corporations, there can be obtained by special report such additional information as the Commission may deem necessary." It thus appears that the purpose of the "special report" was to enable the Commission to obtain information which had not been furnished in the "annual report." In other words, the "special report" was intended as additional or supplemental to the "annual report" but not as additional or supplemental to an order of compliance under Sec. 45.

[Substance of Rule XXVI]

Irrespective, however, of Sec. 46, the Commission argues that its order is authorized by Rule XXVI. The substance of this rule is contained in two unnumbered paragraphs. The first paragraph requires that a report of compliance be made to the Commission within sixty days (1) after a cease and desist order has been issued by the Commission, or (2) where the parties stipulate to cease and desist. This paragraph contains a proviso as follows: ". . . provided, however, that if within the said sixty (60) day period respondent shall file petition for review in a circuit court of appeals, the time for filing report of compliance will begin to run de novo from the final judicial determination . . . ." We do not understand the government to contend that this paragraph is of any aid to its contention in the instant situation. Obviously, it is not because reports of compliance were made by the defendants within the time fixed by the court. It is interesting to note, however, that this court in its decree fixed ninety days within which the defendants were required to comply rather than the sixty days provided in the rule. It would seem either that the rule was not called to the court's attention or that it was ignored. And we have no doubt that the sixty-day limitation contained in this proviso was not binding upon the court, which had the authority to fix such time for compliance as it saw fit.

The Commission relies upon the second paragraph of the rule, which provides:

> "Within its sound discretion, the Commission may require any respondent upon whom such order has been served and any party entering into such stipulation, to file with the Commission, from time to time thereafter, further reports in writing, setting forth in detail the manner and form in which they are complying with said order or with said stipulation."

The scope of this rule appears to depend upon what is meant by "such order . . . and any party entering into such stipulation." Does it refer only to an order entered by the Commission and a party entering into a stipulation as provided for in the first paragraph of the rule, or does it include a court decree or an order of the Commission merged therein, as the plaintiff here contends?

The Commission, in support of its authority, relies upon Sec. 46 (g), which provides:

> "From time to time to classify corporations and to make rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act."

Thus, two powers are conferred upon the Commission, (1) to classify corporations and (2) to make rules and regulations, and such powers are joined by the conjunction "and," which would indicate that the latter power is related to the former. As already noted, it is only Sec. 46 which is limited to corporations, while Sec. 45 includes any "person, partnership, or corporation." If the plaintiff's contention be accepted that the Commission is authorized by this provision to promulgate a rule directed to the enforcement of Sec. 45, then the exclusive jurisdiction which that section confers upon courts becomes little more than an empty gesture. We need not labor this point, however, because what we have said concerning Sec. 46 as it relates to Sec. 45 is also pertinent to Rule XXVI. In our view, the authority contained in Sec. 46 (g) must be limited to Sec. 46. Use of language which indicates a broader scope is not difficult to understand because at the time of the insertion of Sec. 46 (g) there was no Sec. 45, and when the latter section was added there was a failure to remove or modify Sec. 46 (g). If the latter section be given the scope urged by the plaintiff, the Commission would have the authority by rule to impair or share the "exclusive jurisdiction" which is expressly conferred upon the courts by Sec. 45.

And it appears that the plaintiff in the lower court placed no such reliance upon this rule as it does here. At any rate, that court (80 F. Sup. 419, 425) stated: "The Commission also insists that Rule XXVI has nothing to do with Section 5 compliance reports, but is only in aid of economic survey reports under Section 6 (b)." The plaintiff here insists that its position was misinterpreted and quotes from its brief in that court. We note, however, the following statement from its quotation: "This rule was promulgated under subsection (g) of Sec. 6 and implements the authority granted the Commission by subsection (b) thereof." In our view, that was the purpose of the rule and the extent of its intendment. We are of the view that it furnishes no support for the controverted order before us.

[Judgment Affirmed]

Plaintiff also argues that the Commission has the inherent power to require reports of compliance with its orders to cease and desist. We need not explore the validity of this argument as it is beside the point. We are not here concerned with the power of the Commission, inherent or otherwise, to enforce its own orders, but with its power to enforce or aid in enforcement of a decree of this court or an order of the Commission which has become merged in a decree of this court. This we think it had on its own initiative no power or authority to do

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion

MINTON, Circuit Judge, dissenting. A cease and desist order of the Federal Trade Commission that has become final without review or after review by this Court and is not complied with, may result in a judgment by a District Court for a civil penalty under 15 U. S. C. Sec. 45 (1) or enforcement proceedings before the reviewing Court of Appeals, 15 U. S. C. Sec. 45 (d). Noncompliance may result in dual action—one, for a penalty before the District Court; two, for enforcement by contempt proceedings by the Court of Appeals; or a choice between the two remedies. Punishment for past delinquencies would seem to lie with the District Court. Enforcement looking to the future would seem to lie with the Court of Appeals. Whether to proceed for punishment or enforcement, or both, would require someone to produce the facts. This is the Commission's job. As I understand the instant proceeding, it is not an attempt at enforcement of this Court's decree by the proceeding here instituted in the District Court, and is therefore by no stretch of imagination an interference with the exclusive jurisdiction of this Court to enforce its orders. The instant proceeding is an attempt by the Commission to get the facts upon which to base a judgment as to whether there has been compliance, which, if present, results in no further proceedings; or noncompliance, which, if present, may lead to action for penalty or enforcement, or possibly both.

Does the Act authorize the Commission to use the procedure it has adopted here to get the facts? We must assume that the Commission is unable to tell from the data furnished whether there has been compliance. Public officers are presumed to act in good faith until the contrary has been made to appear. The Commission finds the authority for the present procedure to obtain the facts under 15 U. S. C. Sec. 46 (a) and (b) and under Rule 26 [1] promulgated by the Commission. It is the position of the Commission that either the rule or the statute is sufficient to justify its action.

It seems to me that when Congress enacted the Federal Trade Commission Act, it was providing an integrated act and not a compartmentalized act, as the majority of this Court seems to think. In view of the case, it is unnecessary to deal with Sec. 46 (a) and (b) and the narrow, restricted construction thereof, as indulged in by the majority of this Court. I find ample support for the procedure of the Commission contained in its rules, read in conjunction with the provisions of the statute. Sec. 46 (g) of the statute provides:

> "Sec. 46. Additional powers of the commission.
> "The commission shall also have power—
> ". . .
> "(g) From time to time to classify corporations and to make rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of sections 41-46 and 47-58 of this title."

This, it will be noted, is a part of Sec. 46 which the majority of this Court holds applies only to corporations. The section just quoted specifically refers to Secs. 41-46. Sec. 45, which is within this reference, deals with persons, partnerships, and corporations, and the cease and desist order here involved arose out of a Sec. 45 proceeding. It seems clear to me that Congress by Sec. 46 (g) gave a broad power to make rules for the carrying out of the provisions of the whole Act. Under this power, the Commission promulgated Rule 26, the pertinent provisions of which read as follows:

> "In ever case where an order to cease and desist is issued by the Commission for the purpose of preventing violations of law and in every instance where the Commission approves and accepts a stipulation in which a party agrees to cease and desist from the unlawful methods, acts or practices involved, the respondents named in such orders and the parties so stipulating shall file with the Commission, within sixty days of the service of such order and within sixty days of the approval of such stipulation, a report, in writing, setting forth in detail the manner and form in which they have complied with said order or with said stipulation; provided, however, that if within the said sixty (60) day period respondent shall file petition for review in a circuit court of appeals, the time for filing report of compliance will begin to run de novo from the final judicial determination;
> ". . .
> "Within its sound discretion, the Commission may require any respondent upon whom such order has been served and any party entering into such stipulation, to file with the Commission, from time to time thereafter, further reports in writing, setting forth in detail the manner and form in which they are complying with said order or with said stipulation."

We are dealing here with a cease and desist order that has been reviewed by this Court. The rules of the Commission provide that in such a case, the time for filing a report of compliance begins to run from the final judicial determination. Nothing is said as to how long after the time commences to run the report of compliance shall be filed with the Commission. Apparently the reviewing court's order fixes that time and in the instant case, this Court fixed it at ninety days. Obviously, this rule in no manner interferes with the jurisdiction of this Court to make or enforce its order. Under this rule, whose validity is not challenged here, and which rule has the effect of law, the Commission may require a party to such cease and desist order "to file with the Commission, from time to time thereafter, further reports in writing, setting forth in detail the manner and form in which they are complying with said order."

What the Commission did on September 2, 1947, in the instant case was to require the defendants to file within thirty days after the service of notice additional reports showing in detail the manner and form in which the defendants had been and were complying with the cease and desist order and the decree of this Court, together with some supporting data. On September 22, 1947, the Commission, at the request of one of the respondents in the cease and desist order, but not one of the defendants here, extended the time for filing the additional reports and data to November 1, 1947. The other eighteen respondents in the order complied. Apparently the Commission's procedure did not impress them as unusual. The defendants refused to comply and, being in default for more than thirty days after November 1, 1947, the Commission on February 27, 1948, served notice of default upon the defendants, and, upon their further failure to comply within thirty days, instituted the instant proceeding, pursuant to 15 U. S. C. Sec. 50, which provides:

"If any corporation required by said sections to file any annual or special report shall fail so to do within the time fixed by the commission for filing the same, and such failure shall continue for thirty days after notice of such default, the corporation shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day . . . ."

This Sec. 50 refers to "special reports" required by "said sections," that is, Secs. 41-46 and 47-58 which are the essential provisions of the Act. True, the Commission's proceedings refer not to "special reports" but to "additional," "further" and "supplemental" reports. It seems to me to say the latter are not special reports is to indulge in a refinement in language that would not be countenanced even in a criminal proceeding. I think "additional," "further" and "supplemental" are the equivalent of "special," since they are all reports not required in the usual course.

The majority have stressed what it sees as an interference with this Court's jurisdiction to enforce its decree. This is a bit unsubstantial, it seems to me. If the facts obtained justify proceedings, the Commission might proceed only for the penalty under Sec. 45 (1). In that instance, the Commission would not have to consult this Court at all. If it sought enforcement it could only be in this Court in full recognition of its jurisdiction.

What this case adds up to is this: That the defendants have refused deliberately, and with full consciousness of the consequences, to comply with an order of the Commission made pursuant to lawful authority, and such deliberate refusal comes squarely within the punitive provisions of Sec. 50. The Commission's rules have been published in the Code[2] as a part thereof, following 15 U. S. C. Sec. 45 (1946 Edition). Since the regulations, which are authorized by the statute, together with the statute authorized the procedure which the Commission has followed, the defendants have certainly not been misled. I would reverse the judgment of the District Court.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. No. 46 C 783. May 3, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Act

Exclusive Dealing Contracts—Restraint of Trade Not Established—Welding Process Patent.—In a civil proceeding the Government failed to establish its allegations that a corporation holding the patent for the composition and method of an electric welding process had violated Section 2 of the Sherman Act when it sold welding rod upon the condition that purchasers contract for their entire requirements. Exclusive dealing contracts are not intrinsically illegal, the court ruled, and in this case they cannot be deemed a factor in restricting the opportunities of competitors to market their product. Unique services such as development by research were responsible for bringing customers to the vendor initially and retaining them over the years. The stipulation in the contract as to time was held to be no more than a normal and reasonable business plan by which both parties' operations for one year could be projected more efficiently.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2023.49.

Discount from Non-Contract Price—Concurrent Use of Entire Requirement Contracts —Lessening of Competition.—Injunctive relief was awarded to the Government in a civil proceeding when it was held that a corporation holding a patent for the composition and method of an electric welding process had violated Section 3 of the Clayton Act by offering a half cent per pound discount from non-contract price to those customers purchasing rod under entire requirements contracts. It was a fair assumption that the discount rendered such a price lower than that of competitors. The combination of the discount and the requirements contracts clearly tended to lessen competition to a substantial degree and to create a monopoly.

Memorandum, Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, and Judgment

[Pleading]

CAMPBELL, District Judge.: This is a civil proceeding, brought by the Government, for alleged violations of Section 2 of the Sherman Act and Section 3 of the Clayton Act. The pertinent portions of those sections are:

> Section 2 of the Sherman Act: "Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. . . ." (15 U. S. C. A. 2.)
> Section 3 of the Clayton Act: "It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to . . . make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption or resale within the United States . . . or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon, such price, on the condition, agreement or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery supplies or other commodities of a competitor of the lessor or seller, where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." (15 U. S. C. A. 14.)

The complaint charges that "Beginning in or about May 1938 and continuing to and including the date of the filing of this complaint, defendant Linde, in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act, has attempted to monopolize, and has monopolized, sales in interstate trade and commerce of welding rods used in the Unionmelt Welding Process by entering into contracts with about 80 per cent of the users of the Unionmelt Welding Process for the sale of welding rods for use in the process within the United States, each contract being on the condition agreement, or understanding that the purchaser shall not use welding rods of a competitor of Linde in the Unionmelt Welding Process. Said contracts and each of said contracts substantially lessen competition in, and tend to create a monopoly of, the sale of welding rods used in the Unionmelt Welding Process in violation of Section 3 of the Clayton Act."

The Unionmelt Welding Process is the subject of United States Patent No. 2,043,960 issued June 9, 1936 to defendant as assignee of the inventors Lloyd Jones, Harry Kennedy and Maynard Rotermund, who filed the patent application on October 9, 1935. The patent relates both to a process or method of electric welding, and to compositions for use therein. Litigation as to the validity of the claims of the patent developed subsequently, as a result of which, judicial determination has been made of validity. The United States Supreme Court in a recent decision, Graver Tank v. Linde Air Products, 335 U. S. 810, upheld the validity of flux claims 18, 20, 22 and 23. The Court held to be invalid flux claims 24, 26 and 27, and all process claims. Flux claims 19, 21, 25, 28 and 29 were not in issue.

[History and Role of the Invention]

There is no dispute between the parties as to the outstanding nature of the Unionmelt invention. It represented a remarkable improvement in the field of electric welding, and apparently caused a tremendous impact upon the manufacturing world. For example, the performance capabilities of the Unionmelt Process included:

(1) Welding steel plate 2½ inches thick in a single pass (one traverse along the seam to be welded) as compared with a maximum of ½ inch with any prior process.

(2) For the first time, welds of the highest quality—usable in high pressure boilers and other dangerous instrumentalities—could be produced automatically using a bare rod.

(3) Welding speeds and currents were multiplied many times over pre-existing maxima.

Installation of the process on a production basis generally involved considerable equipment and expense—a further testimonial to its industrial worth.

The foregoing discussion of the Unionmelt Process is, of course, undeterminative directly of the issues presented in this cause of action, but the Court deems it a necessary prelude in order that the subsequent activities of Linde might be considered against their proper background. It is entirely possible that defendant's operations could become distorted if viewed in the normal business perspective, rather than in the abnormal setting resulting from the introduction of a revolutionary industrial process.

The first public announcement of the Unionmelt process was made in October, 1938. Since that time, Linde has offered to license this process on standard terms to all applicants. In the early phases of the licensing program, Linde was the sole source of supply for rod suitable for use in the process. Linde has never manufactured its own welding rod, but purchases it from other concerns and, in turn, resells it to its licensees. Originally, nearly 100% of the rod used in the process was a patented rod—"Oxweld 29," patent to which was held by Linde and which expired in 1940. Except for special applications, apparently practically any steel rod may be used in the process, and there are now many concerns selling rod and wire which are suitable. Licensees are obliged to pay royalties on the basis of the amount of metal deposited in the welding operation. Therefore, if no metal is deposited, no royalty is due; and the royalty is due whether the licensee uses defendant's rod or not.

From the commencement of its licensing program, defendant attempted to sell all its welding rod under the following form of contract:

"The seller (Linde) agrees to sell and deliver, and the buyer agrees to purchase and take delivery of . . . the Buyer's entire requirements of bare rod electrodes for use in a process of electric welding known as the Unionmelt Welding Process . . . for the period of one (1) year beginning on the — day of 19— and continuing after said period from year to year until cancelled at the end of any then current contract year by notice in writing to that effect given by either party hereto to the other not less than 60 days prior to the end of such then current contract year."

Substantially, this was the form of contract signed by all contracting licensees. Approximately 528, or 81%, of the 651 licensees were also parties to these entire requirements contracts. About 95% of all rod deposited by licensees, is so deposited under this type of contract. Purchasers under the entire requirements contracts receive a ½¢ per pound discount from the non-contract price. However, shortly after the commencement of this action, defendant cancelled all outstanding requirements contracts, having discovered them to be more of a burden than a blessing. This was due to cost increases in the post-war period which had not been anticipated or provided for at the time the contracts were executed.

[Exclusive Dealing Not Intrinsically Illegal]

The Government has advanced the proposition that the requirements contracts sponsored by defendant are illegal per se. However, its theory does not conform to the recent view of the Supreme Court as expressed in the case of United States v. Columbia Steel Co., 334 U. S. 495:

> "Where a complaint charges such an unreasonable restraint as the facts of the Yellow Cab case show, the amount of interstate trade affected is immaterial in determining whether a violation of the Sherman Act has been charged. A restraint may be unreasonable either because a restraint otherwise reasonable is accompanied with a specific intent to accomplish a forbidden restraint or because it falls within the class of restraints that are illegal per se. For example, where a complaint charges that the defendants have engaged in price fixing, or have concertedly refused to deal with non-members of an association, or have licensed a non-patented device on condition that unpatented materials be employed in conjunction with the patented device, then the amount of commerce involved is immaterial because such restraints are illegal per se. Nothing in the Yellow Cab case supports the theory that all exclusive dealing arrangements are illegal per se. * * *
> "The legality of the acquisition by United States Steel of a market outlet for its rolled steel through the purchase of the manufacturing facilities of Consolidated depends not merely upon the fact of that acquired control but also upon many other factors. Exclusive dealings for rolled steel between Consolidated and United States Steel, brought about by vertical integration or otherwise are not illegal, at any rate until the effect of such control is to unreasonably restrict the opportunities of competitors to market their product."

Having, therefore, concluded that the contracts are not illegal per se, it remains for the Court to determine whether they otherwise constitute an unreasonable restraint. In other words, it must be shown by the Government that the restraint accomplished by Linde in this case was accompanied by an intent to achieve a forbidden restraint. One of the factors to be considered in determining the legality of defendant's operations is the character of the market to be served, and the leverage on that market which this particular activity created or made possible. A second important test is the intent or purpose with which the operation was conceived. When a plan, through its actual operation, results in an unreasonable restraint, intent or purpose may be inferred; and, even though no unreasonable restraint may be achieved, nevertheless a finding of specific intent to accomplish such an unreasonable restraint may render the actor liable under the Sherman and Clayton Acts.

In attempting to meet the above tests, the Government introduced considerable statistical evidence which was intended to prove that, since approximately 95% of all rod deposited by licensees had been purchased from defendant under requirements contracts, defendant actually did, and so intended to, unreasonably restrain trade and restrict the opportunities of competitors to market their product. However, this conclusion may merely be legitimately inferred, and is not the inevitable end-point of syllogistic reasoning. It is not inconceivable that competitors of an alleged monopolist find it impossible to sell their products simply for the reason that the prospective customers are too well satisfied with the good salesmanship and excellent service of said monopolist. It must be remembered that, in the case at bar, defendant was the sole company to make welding rod stocks available in proper quantities, condition and analyses for a considerable length of time after the Unionmelt Process was introduced to the public. Furthermore, throughout the years the process has been in existence, defendant has devoted itself constantly to research in order to develop the ideal rod to be used on any particular production job. It may be true, generally, that any type of wire may be employed in the process, but such fact does not mean that satisfactory results could be achieved. These services, rendered by defendant, I am convinced are what brought customers to Linde initially and what retained them over the years. Admittedly, the requirements contracts bound the customers to defendant during the course of one year, but can that period of time be construed as being unreasonable? A requirements contract which would bind a purchaser for ten or twenty years would undoubtedly be contrary to the public interest and, therefore, unreasonable; but a one-year contract should not be relegated to the same category. It would appear to be no more than a normal and reasonable business plan, by which both parties' operations for the year could be projected more efficiently and accurately. In any event, defendant's customers were under no compunction to execute the contracts in the first instance, nor to continue them for a longer period than the one year stipulated therein. True, the agreement contained a provision for automatic renewal; but there was nothing surreptitious about it, nor was the process of cancellation at the end of the contract year burdensome to the purchaser.

The Government attached considerable importance to the following typical statements made by officers of defendant corporation, as indicating a purpose and a plan to exclude competitors from the welding rod field:

(a) Government's Exhibit # 18

". . . Although we want and expect to obtain the rod business. . . . If a Unionmelt licensee should mention the possibility of some other source of rod, we must admit there is no obligation in the Unionmelt welding process license agreement to buy our rod. However, besides the obvious advantage of a rod contract to us in assuring us the business, making possible quantity purchases and giving some basis for warehouse stock control, there are several advantages to using our rod."

(b) Cornwell Cross-examination — R. 286, 287

"Q.—As a matter of fact, didn't you always, prior to the time of the filing of this complaint, urge your subordinates to secure from licensees entire requirements contracts, if it was at all possible?

"A.—We were anxious to sell all the rod we could, and if that was a means of getting the rod business, that was the proper channel to follow, yes."

(c) Government's Exhibit #25—

"Rod for Unionmelt welding is invariably furnished by us."

(d) Government's Exhibit # 30—

"If you have any thoughts or suggestions in handling this matter they would be appreciated although we definitely left the idea with Mr. Ebersole that our agreement, because cancellation privilege had not been exercised, was in effect for at least another year."

However, it must be remembered that, to a limited degree, any sale of goods by a vendor necessarily involves the exclusion of a competitor, at least temporarily. The Court would not classify these statements as more than normal expressions of concern for sales that might well come from the lips of any businessman in the country, who intended to maintain his business as a going concern.

[Effect of Discount]

Had defendant extended itself no further in its attempts to secure the welding rod business to itself by means of the entire requirements contracts alone, the Court would be constrained to hold that no violation of the Anti-trust Acts had occurred. Defendant, however, introduced the additional element of a ½¢ per pound discount for all rod purchased under requirements contracts. In view of the fact that some purchasers bought in quantities of several hundred housand pounds at one time, a discount of this size would certainly not be "de minimis."

[Authorities Examined]

This discount, used, as it was, in conjunction with the entire requirements contracts in my opinion constituted a violation of Section 3 of the Clayton Act at least insofar as that Statutes states: ". . . where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." Admittedly the Government failed to introduce any evidence as to what prices had been established by competitors of defendant; but it seems a fair assumption that the discount rendered defendant's price lower than that of its competitors. The combination of the discount and the requirements contracts clearly tended to lessen competition to a substantial degree and to create a monopoly. The case of Lipson v. Socony Vacuum Corp., 87 F. 2nd 265, although not cited by either party herein, seems to express the view most favorable to defendant's present position.

"The question is, where the requirements that a sale of gasoline in tank cars and at a less price than in case of delivery in smaller quantities by tank trucks will only be made in case the retailer agrees to sell only the defendant's products, results in a lessening of competition in interstate transactions between the plaintiff and stations operated by the Standard Companies and by others in the same competitive territory, to the damage of the plaintiff?

"It is obvious from his declarations that the defendants' policy does not affect the amount of sales by the plaintiff of the defendants' products, but only his profits, since the inference is clear that he has supplied all demands of his customers for 'Socony' gasoline, though at a less profit than if he could buy on the tank car market. He does not allege, however, that he is equipped to accept gasoline at his filling station in tank cars, or that his profits are so small that he must give up supplying his customers with 'Socony' products. The inference is also clear that he buys and sells the products of other integrated or independent companies on the same terms as those of the defendants. There is obviously no discrimination in terms or price between him and other retail customers of the defendants. He is offered the same terms by the defendants as any other retail customer; and since it is alleged that all retailers sell at the same price, which is posted on their pumps at their retail outlets, and that the selling price of all gasoline is the same, at least throughout Massachusetts, competition in price, therefore, cannot result as between him and other retailers, though they deal exclusively in 'Socony' products.

" 'Competition' is defined as: 'The effort of two or more parties, acting independently, to secure the custom of a third party by the offer of the most favorable terms.' Webster's Dict. 'The struggle between rivals for the same trade at the same time; the act of seeking or endeavoring to gain what another is endeavoring to gain at the same time.' 12 C. J. 237. This, according to the planitiff's declaration, his competitors are not seeking to do by offering more favorable terms of sale of Socony products to purchasers.

"While we think it is alleged with substantial certainty that the defendants have fixed lower prices for their products in case of the importation of gasoline in tank car lots direct to their customers, provided the customer agrees to deal only in their products, yet it does not appear, owing to there being no competition in price between the plaintiff and other retailers of gasoline, that the result of defendants' policy is to substantially lessen competition in gasoline and other petroleum products between the plaintiff and stations operated by the Standard Companies, or those dealing exclusively in defendants' products, in the same competitive territory. If the plaintiff chooses to sell petroleum products of other competing companies of the defendants rather than to deal in the defendants' products exclusively, it does not follow, as a matter of law, that a refusal by the defendants to sell gasoline to the plaintiff at tank car prices constitutes a violation of the Clayton Act."

Concededly, the Lipson case might well be authority for the proposition that no right of action under the Anti-trust Acts accrues to an individual purchaser who, in order to receive a discount, must buy his entire requirements from a particular supplier. However, the same rule does not apply where the offense charged is a substantial lessening of competition between the particular supplier and other suppliers, similarly situated. Under the facts existing in the Lipson case, competition was not destroyed between retailers of gasoline, but rather since they all charged the same price, certain retailers suffered a reduction of margin of product to a limited degree. In the case at bar, however, it is not inconceivable that competitors of defendant might be eliminated from the field entirely by means of the combination of the discount and requirements contracts. Defendant's practices have been essentially the same as those condemned in Carter Carburetor Corp. v. Federal Trade Comm., 112 F. 2nd 725, wherein it was stated:

"The petitioner thus has established within its own control a complete system of retail price maintenance, effective as to all sales to both contract and general cabinet service stations.

"The purpose and effect of General Bulletin No. 134 must therefore be considered in the light of that situation. The Bulletin advised that the preferential discount would be discontinued if a new carburetor line (defined as a carburetor made after June 23, 1934) was taken on without petitioner's written approval. Petitioner gave instructions that if the service stations 'should elect to keep the other line * * * the standard trade discount of 25% would then apply.' Petitioner's telegram to its field representatives stated that 'until they make up their minds twenty-five per cent will be their discount.' The policy was enforced by increasing prices to some service stations which refused compliance and by threats of reduction of discounts made to others and by cancellation of contracts. It was made perfectly clear that their preferential discount would be available only on condition that they did not carry or take on a new competing line. Under these circumstances it is immaterial that those who handled petitioner's products were not obliged to affirmatively promise in express terms not to handle goods of Carter's competitors. The condition against handling the goods of competitors was made as fully effective as though it had been written in and affirmatively agreed to in express terms in the contracts. Of course it was necessary that petitioner's distributors should cooperate to effectuate the purpose because the distributors were the immediate source from which the service stations obtained their stocks directly. But there is, and was, no doubt that such cooperation was complete, both in actual practice and according to the terms of the contracts between petitioner and distributors. The arguments presented as to the right of an individual to contract or refuse to contract with whom he pleases must be related to the provisions of Section 3 of the Act intended to and did impose a condition that the purchaser should not deal in the goods of a competitor of petitioner within the prohibition of Section 3."

Similarly, in the case at bar, no affirmative promise was exacted from the various licensee-purchasers that they would not use a product competitive to that of defendant, but the discount, used in conjunction with the requirements contracts, patently imposed the condition, although indirectly, that such purchasers would not use the products of competitors. So employed, the practice is violative of Section 3 of the Clayton Act.

Defendant contends strongly that, in any event, the question is now moot and an injunction should not issue, even though its prior activities may have been violative of the Anti-trust Acts. In support of this theory, defendant states in its brief:

"Earlier in this brief the facts have been set forth as to the origin of Linde's use of requirements contracts for the sale of welding rod, the practical nullification of the operation of these contracts during the wartime period and the final abandonment of the contracts under post-war conditions of steel supply and prices. It has further been shown that the conditions which gave rise to the contracts no longer exist, and that instability of steel prices and shortness of supply may be expected to continue. Therefore there is no basis for belief that Linde will desire, or will be able, to use such contracts in the foreseeable future."

In regard to this assertion of mootness, it should be noted that the illegal practices were abandoned by the defendant of its own volition, as a result of economic expediency. Presumably, then, if advantageous economic factors were present in the future, defendant might voluntarily resume the practices which gave rise to the present action. Indeed, that defendant would contemplate such a move may be inferred legitimately from the testimony of Mr. Cornwell, a vice-president of Linde (R. 177-8). The rule as to whether a particular question has become moot was clearly stated in U. S. v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U. S. 290:

". . . If the mere dissolution of the association worked an abatement of the suit as to all the defendants, as is the claim on their part, it is plain that they have thus discovered an effectual means to prevent the judgment of this court being given given upon the question really involved in the case. The defendants having succeeded in the court below, it would only be necessary thereafter to dissolve their association and instantly form another of a similar kind, and the fact of the dissolution would prevent an appeal to this court or procure its dismissal if taken. The result does not and ought not to follow. * * *

"Private parties may settle their controversies at any time, and the rights which a plaintiff may have had at the time of the commencement of the action may terminate before judgment is obtained or while the case is on appeal, and in any such case the court, being informed of the facts, will proceed no further in the action. Here, however, there has been no extinguishment of the rights (whatever they are) of the public, the enforcement of which the government has endeavored to procure by a judgment of a court under the provisions of the act of congress above cited. The defendants cannot foreclose those rights, nor prevent the assertion thereof by the government as a substantial trustee for the public under the act of congress, by any such action as has been taken in this case. . . ."

Nothing contained in the language of U. S. v. Hamburg-American Co., 239 U. S. 466, serves to strengthen the position assumed by defendant on this question. That case is merely authority for the proposition that the subject is rendered moot by the intervention of a power beyond the control of either party, but does not purport to establish the rule that a defendant can make it moot by interjecting its own voluntary act.

[Injunctive Relief Granted]

For the reasons expressed above, I conclude that the combination of the entire requirements contracts and the discount granted in connection therewith, constitutes a violation of Section 3 of the Clayton Anti-Trust Act; and that the question of such violation is not now moot. The Government is, therefore, entitled to the injunctive relief prayed for in the complaint.

Counsel for the plaintiff may prepare and file with the Court, in writing, within thirty days from the date hereof, proposed findings of fact, conclusions of law, and a draft of a proposed decree, consistent with the views herein expressed, delivering copies thereof to counsel for the defendant. Within thirty days of the receipt of such copies, counsel for the defendant may prepare and file with the Court, in writing, his observations with reference thereto and suggestions for the modification thereof, delivering a copy of such observations and suggestions to counsel for the plaintiff. Within ten days thereafter counsel for the plaintiff may present to the Court, in writing, his reply to such observations and suggestions. Whereupon, the matter of making findings of fact, conclusions of law and a decree herein will be taken by the Court without further argument.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil 49-267. May 13, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Act

Threats of Legal Action—Existence of Antitrust Claim Undecided—Transfer to Proper Venue.—A manufacturer's complaint, which alleged that a company incorporated and doing business in Minnesota and its treasurer had conspired to monopolize the suspender and elastic attachment trade by threatening to sue for patent infringements with the result that customers withdrew their trade in favor of the alleged conspirators, set forth sufficient facts to base a claim of unfair competition and for a declaratory judgment. The Court lacked jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the claim based on unfair competition since the summons was not served within its jurisdiction. As to the claim for a declaratory judgment the Court ruled that the action should have been in the judicial district in which the company was incorporated. On the assumption that the pleadings also stated a claim under the antitrust laws it was found that venue had been laid in the wrong district since the corporation cited was not an inhabitant of the judical district, was not found there and did not transact business there. The cause was therefore transferred to the district in which the process was served.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2032.

For the plaintiff: Harry Price, New York, New York.

For the defendant: Irving Fox, (Joseph Stern, of counsel) New York, New York.

LEIBELL, D. J., District Judge: Plaintiff filed a complaint in this action on February 25, 1949. The summons and complaint were served on the defendant, Mit-Clip Company, Inc., by the United States Marshal in Minnesota "by handing to and leaving a true and correct copy thereof with Wilfred Woolfson, Treasurer, personally at Minneapolis, Minnesota, on the 30th day of March, 1949". The return of the Marshal on the service of the summons and complaint was filed in this Court on April 4, 1949. The individual defendant, J. M. Podoloff, has not been served with process. The complaint alleges:—

"1. Jurisdiction arises under Title 28, Section 1337. Jurisdiction may also arise under Title 28, Section 1332 (a) (1) and 1338.

"2. Plaintiff is a manufacturer and seller of suspenders and elastic attachments of various types, including those for attaching gloves of children to other garments, and is located and is doing business at 709 Broadway, City, County and State of New York.

"3. Upon information and belief, Defendants are competitors and are in the same line of business as Plaintiff, Defendant J. M. Podoloff being a resident of 109 East 42nd Street, City, County and State of New York, but is a citizen of Minneapolis, Minnesota, and Defendant, Mit-Clip Company, Inc. is located in Minneapolis, Minnesota, and is a citizen of Minnesota, and both defendants are doing business in the City, County and State of New York.

"4. Defendants have been and still are in the City, County and State of New York and elsewhere in the United States in Conspiracy with each other, threatening suit against Plaintiff and its customers upon alleged patent rights, with the result of which said customers have failed to buy, or refuse to buy, various glove elastic attachments from Plaintiff and instead have bought them from Defendants, and these threats are false, fraudulent and malicious and without basis or foundation.

"5. Defendants in conspiracy have been and are attempting to set up a monopoly in said glove elastic attachments in violation of the Sherman and Clayton Acts by intimidating and inducing the trade and public, under threat of litigation, to purchase said glove elastic attachments from Defendants and to exclude and prevent Plaintiff from doing business in this field.

"6. Plaintiff's business has been severely damaged and injured to an amount not now known and he has no adequate remedy at law."

The prayer for relief is as follows:—

"7. WHEREFORE, Plaintiff prays judgment:

(a) enjoining Defendants and each of them and their agents from violations of Sherman and Clayton Acts for making threats of infringement;

(b) declaring that Defendants have no patent rights or other monopoly in elastic gloves attachments and declaring any patent that Defendants may have as void and invalid.

(c) awarding an accounting together with costs, counsel fees and other relief to Plaintiff."

On April 19, 1949 by a notice of notion based on an affidavit of an attorney and one of its officers (Pololoff) the defendant corporation moved this Court under Rule 12 (b) F. B. C. P. for an order:—

"1. To dismiss the action on the ground

"a. That the defendant, MIT-CLIP COMPANY, INC., is a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Minnesota and was not and is not subject to service of process within the Southern District of New York.

"b. That the defendant, MIT-CLIP COMPANY, INC., has not been properly served with process in this action, all of which more clearly appears in the affidavits of JOSEPH STERN and JOSEPH M. PODOLOFF hereunto annexed as Exhibit A and Exhibit B respectively.

"2. To dismiss the action on the ground that it is in the wrong district because:—

"a. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked among others on the ground that the action arises under the Constitution and Laws of the United States.

"b. The defendant, MIT-CLIP COMPANY, INC. is a corporation incorporated under the Laws of the State of Minnesota and is an inhabitant thereof.

"3. For such other and further relief as to this Court may be just and proper in the premises."

The affidavit of Joseph M. Podoloff states:—

"Affiant further says that plaintiff alleges that this affiant is a resident of 109 East 42nd Street, City, County and State of New York. Affiant states that he is not now nor has he ever been a resident of the City of New York, nor has he ever resided there even temporarily. Affiant further states that prior to World War II, he resided in the City of Minneapolis for a period of 12 years; that at the time of World War II he enlisted in the U. S. Navy and was active therein and was not discharged therefrom until January, 1946; that when he was released from the Navy, he took up his residence in San Francisco, California; that from October 15, 1946 to January 19, 1948, this affiant resided in Berkeley, California, and maintained his home there together with his wife and family; that on June 19, 1948 he moved his wife and family to the City of Minneapolis, Minnesota, and since said date has resided at 4824 12th Avenue South in the City of Minneapolis, Minnesota; that this affiant has no other place of residence and has had no other place of residence since June 19, 1948, other than Minneapolis, Minnesota.

Affiant further says that sometime in February, 1948, the exact date of which he is not certain, he went to the City of New York and registered at the Commodore Hotel; that this affiant does not know whether or not the address set out in the plaintiff's complaint is the address of the Commodore Hotel, but believes that such hotel is on East 42nd Street. Affiant further says that he stayed at the Commodore Hotel one night, consummated his business and left the city, and that he did not at any time take up residence in the City of New York and that he is still living in Minneapolis, Minnesota.

Affiant further says that he is the Treasurer of the Mit-Clip Company, Inc., a Minnesota corporation, with its principal place of business in Minneapolis, Minnesota; that the Mit-Clip Company, Inc. is engaged in Minneapolis, Minnesota in the manufacture of a clip which is fastened on one end to a child's mittens and on the other to the child's coat; that the entire process of manufacture is located in Minneapolis, Minnesota and all of the offices are in Minneapolis, Minnesota; that the product is sold through agents or representatives in states other than Minnesota, but that the Mit-Clip Company, Inc. has no offices in any city of any state other than Minneapolis, Minnesota, and that the company is doing business only within the State of Minnesota."

A further affidavit of Mr. Podoloff, sworn to April 26, 1949, also states:—

"* * * that he is the Treasurer of Mit-Clip Company, Inc.; that the Mit-Clip Company, Inc. was organized under the laws of the State of Minnesota on April 26, 1948; that all of the stockholders and officers of said corporation are residents of the City of Minneapolis, State of Minnesota; that the registered office of the corporation is 1940 Rand Tower, Minneapolis, Minnesota; that the sole business of the corporation consists of the manufacture or assembly of a device for saving or protecting children's mittens; that it consists solely of a web fabric or elastic band with clips which are attached to the coat of the child and to the mittens; that the clips are metal and are purchased from manufacturers of clips, said manufacturers located in the New England states. Fabric or elastic is purchased from manufacturers or jobbers. It is cut and assembled in Minneapolis. The corporation employs less than ten employees, who cut the elastic or fabric to short lengths and attach the clips to such cut fabric or elastic and box the same. This is the complete operation of the manufacture or assembly of the 'Mit-Clip' and is performed solely and wholly in the City of Minneapolis, Minnesota; that the product is sold mostly in the Middle West, with about 50% of the business being done in the State of Minnesota; that the gross sales for the winter season of 1948-1949 was $35,000.00.

That sometime in February, 1949, this affiant went to the City of New York, State of New York for the purpose of contacting prospective customers; that this affiant called on four prospective customers; that the entire time consumed in doing this required approximately a day and a half. This affiant arrived in the City of New York in the morning, called on three prospective customers, spent the night at the Commodore Hotel, called on a prospective customer the next day, and then left the City of New York and the State of New York; that his contact with the prospective customers consisting of showing them the 'Mit-Clip' item; that none of the customers purchased the item at that time, but in each case stated that they would discuss it with their buying departments, and if they were satisfied, would mail in an order to the Minneapolis office; that any other contact with any of such customers has been entirely through the U. S. Mail.

That aside from this affiant having been in New York City for approximately a day and a half in February, 1949, no officer or other representative of the corporation has been in the City of New York or State of New York; that the Mit-Klip Company, Inc. has no resident representative or any other type of representative in the State of New York, nor has it any dealers or jobbers located in the State of New York; that the corporation does not have nor does it maintain any branch plant, branch office or sales room in the State of New York; that it does not as a matter of fact have any sales office anywhere in the United States other than in Minneapolis, Minnesota. Affiant further states that the corporation's sole and only address is Minneapolis, Minnesota; that it has no address or telephone number in the State of New York, and that Mit-Klip Company, Inc. can be reached only at its office in Minneapolis, Minnesota. Affiant further states that at the present time the corporation has no agents or any other type of employee or any independent contractor representing it in the sale of its merchandise in the State of New York."

In a supplemental affidavit by plaintiff, sworn to May 4, 1949, he alleges:—

"Upon information and belief, although the Defendant corporation is located in Minneapolis, Minnesota, it is doing business in the Southern District of New York and it has built up a monoply in the subject matter in question in the Southern District of New York by correspondence and by visits of its officers to various customers of Plaintiff in the Southern District of New York."

That affidavit also alleges that defendant corporation is claiming certain patent rights and is making oral and other threats and has sent out a letter to the trade by its patent attorneys in Minneapolis. The concluding paragraph of plaintiff's supplemental affidavit alleges:—

"Upon information and belief, the [patent] applications filed by the Defendant corporation, if any, were not filed in good faith but were filed solely to give the Defendant a chance to circularize and threaten and intimidate the trade and build up a monopoly in these items, as it has now done. These threats, warnings and intimidations have been repeated again and again through the latter part of 1948 and the early part of 1949, and Defendant corporation at no time has made any bona fide attempt to bring suit or adjudicate its patent or other rights relating to its merchandise. During this period Plaintiff has been severely damaged and has lost considerable business, and finds itself unable to sell the subject matter of Exhibit A to many of its customers because of the activities of Defendant corporation."

On April 21, 1949 plaintiff's attorney served a notice of motion dated April 18th and based on an affidavit of plaintiff sworn to April 19th for an order—

"* * * during the pendency of this trial to enjoin Defendants singly and jointly from threatening suit, litigation or patent infringement against the customers or prospective customers of Plaintiff who purchase or desire to purchase fastening devices as set forth upon Exhibit A attached to these papers and for such other relief as may seem proper in the premises."

Plaintiff's affidavit of April 19th alleges:

"Among the products which have been sold by Plaintiff is a device for the retention of children's gloves having a short band of webbed fabric or elastic with clips to be attached to the sleeve and to the children's glove or mitten. The device as sold by Plaintiff is identified as Exhibit A while the device as sold by Defendants is identified as Exhibit B.

Defendants by written and oral malicious and unwarranted misrepresentations in the City of New York and elsewhere have terrorized and intimidated customers and prospective csutomers of Plaintiff as well as of others in the line and have made such customers fearful of buying these devices of the type of Exhibits A and B from anyone else other than Defendants, with the result that Defendants have built up a substantial monopoly in the manufacture and sale of these devices to the exclusion of Plaintiff and others in intra and interstate commerce."

There are also allegations in said affidavit that defendant's device could not be patentable because of the prior art and that defendant's claim to certain rights are under a patent which does not cover plaintiff's device.

There may be some question as to whether plaintiff has pleaded sufficient facts for the basis of a claim under either § 15 or § 26 of Title 15, U. S. C. (part of the antitrust laws). The complaint does allege the basis for a claim of unfair competition, and for a declaratory judgment that defendant's alleged patent is invalid and for an injunction. There is nothing to show that any violations of the trade-mark statute [15 U. S. C. 1051 et seq.] or the copyright law [17 U. S. C.] are in any way involved in plaintiff's claim.

Assuming this to be a suit under the anti-trust laws plaintiff has not met the specific and detailed allegations of Podoloff's affidavit, which show conclusively that the defendant corporation is not an inhabitant of this judicial district (the Southern District of New York), that it is not "found" here, and does not transact business here. Title 15 U. S. C. § 22.[1] Eastman Kodak Co. v. Southern Photo-Engravers, 273 U. S. 359; United States v. Scophony Corp., 333 U. S. 795, 804-810. Hence the defendant corporation cannot be sued in this judicial district.

Assuming that this is a suit for unfair competition, this court would lack jurisdiction because the summons was not served on the defendant corporation within the State of New York as required by Rule 4(f) F. R. C. P.[2] If jurisdiction of the person of the defendant had been obtained by service

[1] "§ 22. District in which to sue corporation. Any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found. Oct. 15, 1914, c. 323, § 12, 38 Stat. 736."

[2] "4. (f) TERRITORIAL LIMITS OF EFFECTIVE SERVICE. All process other than a subpoena may be served anywhere within the territorial limits of the state in which the district court is held and when a statute of the United States so provides, beyond the territorial limits of that state. A subpoena may be served within the territorial limits provided in Rule 45."

within the State of New York, the Southern District would have been a proper venue under § 1391(a) of Title 28 U. S. C.[3] relating to jurisdiction founded only on diversity of citizenship.

Assuming this is a suit under T. 28 U. S. C. § 2201[4] for a declaratory judgment to have the patent, under which defendant claims certain rights, declared invalid and to enjoin any further claims of defendant corporation thereunder, then the corporation may be sued in the judicial district in which it is incorporated or licensed to do business or is doing business. The defendant corporation is incorporated under the laws of Minnesota, has its office in Minneapolis, is not licensed to do business in New York, and is not "doing business in New York".

Assuming this to be a suit under the anti-trust laws, and as to that the complaint may be open to attack on a proper motion[5], venue has been laid in the wrong district. The defendant has interposed timely and sufficient objection to the venue. Pursuant to § 1406 of Title 28 U. S. C.[6] the case will be transferred to the district in which defendant has its principal office and in which process herein was served, to the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, Fourth Division, for which court is held at Minneapolis. Title 28 U. S. C. A. § 103.

Plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction will not be considered by this Court and is denied without prejudice.

Settle orders accordingly.

In a case of actual controversy within its jurisdiction, except with respect to Federal taxes, any court of the United States, upon the filing of an appropriate pleading, may declare the rights and other legal relations of any interested party seeking such declaration, whether or not further relief is or could be sought. Any such declaration shall have the force and effect of a final judgment or decree and shall be reviewable as such."

[5] The following quotation from Bell v. Hood, 327 U. S. 678 at p. 681 is apposite:

"Jurisdiction, therefore, is not defeated as respondents seem to contend, by the possibility that the averments might fail to state a cause of action on which petitioners could actually recover. For it is well settled that the failure to state a proper cause of action calls for a judgment on the merits and not for a dismissal for want of jurisdiction. Whether the complaint states a cause of action on which relief could be granted is a question of law and just as issues of fact it must be decided after and not before the court has assumed jurisdiction over the controversy. If the court does later exercise its jurisdiction to determine that the allegations in the complaint do not state a ground for relief, then dismissal of the case would be on the merits, not for want of jurisdiction. Swafford v. Templeton, 185 U. S. 487, 493, 494; Binderup v. Pathe Exchange, 263 U. S. 291, 305-308. The previously carved out exceptions are that a suit may sometimes be dismissed for want of jurisdiction where the alleged claim under the Constitution or federal statutes clearly appears to be immaterial and made solely for the purpose of obtaining jurisdiction or where such a claim is wholly insubstantial and frivolous. The accuracy of calling these dismissals jurisdictional has been questioned. The Fair v. Kohler Die Co., supra, 228 U. S. at 25. But cf. Swafford v. Templeton, supra."

(a) The district court of a district in which is filed a case laying venue in the wrong division or district shall transfer such case to any district or division in which it could have been brought.

For the plaintiff: Morley, Cant, Taylor and Haverstock, Minneapolis, Minnesota.

For the defendant: Edward J. Callahan, Allen T. Rorem and Kaplan, Edelman and Kaplan, Minneapolis, Minnesota.

[Syllabus]

HALL, LEVI M., Judge: The above entitled matter came on for hearing before the undersigned, one of the judges of the above-named court on the 5th and 8th days of November, 1948, upon a demurrer to the complaint herein by the defendant Rose Lang, doing business as Tower Liquor Store, upon the ground that the facts stated in plaintiff's complaint do not constitute a cause of action against said defendant.

Edward J. Callahan and Allen T. Rorem, and Kaplan, Edelman and Kaplan appeared as attorneys for the said defendant, and Morley, Cant, Taylor and Haverstock appeared as attorneys for the plaintiff. At the oral argument of the demurrer, the attorneys for the plaintiff conceded in open court that the plaintiff, which according to the allegations of its complaint signed the contracts relied on by the plaintiff and established the minimum prices sought to be enforced herein, is not licensed as a distributor of liquor in the State of Minnesota, as provided for in M. S. A. Section 340.11, Subd. 1, cannot therefore lawfully sell liquor in Minnesota, and by reason of the national scope of its stock ownership is not legally eligible to apply for or receive such a license in Minnesota.

The matter having been duly heard and considered.

IT IS ORDERED, That said demurrer be and the same is hereby sustained upon the ground that the facts stated in the complaint do not constitute a cause of action.

MEMO

A demurrer has been interposed by defendant to plaintiff's complaint upon the ground that the facts stated therein do not constitute a cause of action against defendant.

[Nature of the Action]

The action is one for injunctive relief enjoining and restraining defendant, a retail liquor dealer, from advertising, offering for sale or selling Seagram's Seven Crown Blended Whiskey at less than the minimum retail price specified in certain contracts referred to in the complaint.

Defendant is not a party to the contracts relied on by plaintiff, all such contracts having been entered into with other retail liquor dealers in the State of Minnesota. Nevertheless, plaintiff asserts that such contracts are obligatory on the defendant by reason of M. S. A. Section 325.12.

The other party signatory to the contracts relied on is the plaintiff. But the plaintiff is neither the manufacturer of the product involved nor the distributor thereof in the State of Minnesota. The manufacturer and owner of the brand name is Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc., an Indiana corporation, which is neither a party to the contracts nor a party to this action. This manufacturer in turn sells the product to the plaintiff corporation "as the exclusive distributor thereof in the United States of America". But it was conceded by plaintiff's attorneys in open court at the argument of the demurrer that the plaintiff is not licensed as a distributor of liquor in the State of Minnesota, as provided for in M. S. A. Section 340.11, Subd. 1, cannot therefore lawfully sell liquor in Minnesota, and, moreover, by reason of the national scope of its stock ownership is not legally eligible to apply for or receive such a license in Minnesota. The complaint alleges, accordingly, no selling by plaintiff in Minnesota and no distributions by plaintiff to retail dealers in Minnesota, but instead that the plaintiff sells the product to still a third entity, Distiller Distributing Company, "as exclusive wholesale distributor thereof in the State of Minnesota". Distillers Distributing Company in turn sells the product to retail dealers in the State of Minnesota, including the defendant. Distillers Distributing Company, the exclusive Minnesota distributor, like Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc., the manufacturer, is neither a party to the contracts relied on nor a party to this action.

[Argument on Demurrer]

The defendant argues in support of the demurrer, among other arguments, that the contracts relied on by the plaintiff for enforcement are insufficient as a matter of law because: (a) the plaintiff signing the same and stipulating the re-selling prices was neither (1) a "distributor" within the meaning of M. S. A. Section 325.10, nor (2) a "seller" within the meaning of clause (1) of M. S. A. Section 325.08, nor (3) in a seller-buyer relationship with the retailers who signed the contracts as required by clause (1) of M. S. A. Section 325.08; and (b) because the type of contract contemplated in the case of a wholesaler who sells to wholesalers for resale to retailers, which is specified in clause (2) of M. S. A. Section 325.08, was not utilized in this case.

[Definition of Distributor]

To be authorized by the trade mark owner to establish a minimum resale price, one must be a "distributor". M. S. A. Section 325.10. Lawfully to be a distributor of liquor in the State of Minnesota, one must be licensed as such. M. S. A. Section 340.11. It is conceded, however, that the plaintiff-signatory of the contracts relied on is not and cannot legally be licensed as such. The only authorized contracts with retailers establishing minimum resale prices are those between "buyer" and "seller" wherein the minimum prices are "stipulated by the seller". M. S. A. Sec. 325.08, Clause (1). But the plaintiff who signed the contracts relied on and stipulated the minimum price for resale is not a seller of liquor to any signatory retailer in Minnesota, nor to any nonsignatory retailer in Minnesota, including the defendant, and admittedly cannot legally be or become such a seller. Whatever else the Fair Trade Act (M. S. A. Sections 325.08 to 325.14) authorizes, it does not authorize the particular control here attempted of prices in Minnesota by persons who are legally prohibited from engaging in this state in the commerce sought to be controlled.

Special statutory provision exists for the case of a wholesaler who sells to another wholesaler for resale to retailers for resale to consumers. M. S. A. Section 325.08, Clause (2). That provision, however, even if available to the plaintiff, requires a wholly different type of contract from those pleaded and relied on in the complaint.

[Demurrer Sustained]

For the foregoing reasons the Court concludes that it is necessary to sustain the defendant's demurrer. Since the basic facts are such that these reasons cannot be overcome by amendment of the complaint no useful purpose would be served by ruling on the several other reasons urged by defendant in support of the demurrer, or by granting leave to amend the complaint, the defect not being remediable by amendment.

In the New York Supreme Court, New York County. Special Term, Part IV. 121 N. Y. L. J. 1888, May 26, 1949.

New York Fair Trade Act

Trade-Marked Cosmetics—Cash Register Receipts—Injunction To Protect Goods Will and Minimum Prices.—An injunction was granted at the instance of a drug and cosmetic manufacturer restraining a retailer from granting cash register receipts redeemable for cash at 2½ per cent of the total purchase price in the sale of the manufacturer's brand name products, the prices of which were established by fair trade agreements. The Court was of the opinion that the practice was a device to enable the retailer to sell trade-marked articles at a discount, or cash rebate, on minimum contract prices while giving the appearance of nominal compliance therewith.

See the New York Fair Trade Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.15, 8604.45.

[Issue Defined]

Mr. Justice Pecora: This case squarely presents the problem of whether the use by defendants of so-called "cash register receipts" violates the provisions of the Fair Trade Law (secs. 369a and 369-b, General Business Law). This law permits the making of contracts fixing the minimum prices at which branded or trade marked commodities may be resold by the buyer; and forbids the sale of any such commodities at less than such stipulated prices.

There is no substantial dispute as to the facts. This entire controversy revolves around the aforestated issue of law. Although the question has received the attention of Special Terms of this court there is not, in my opinion, any decisive authority thereon in the reviewing courts of this state.

[Rulings Urged Upon the Court]

Certain determinations have been made by appellate tribunals in other jurisdictions. They are strongly relied upon by defendants to defeat this action by plaintiff for a permanent injunction to restrain defendants from issuing cash register receipts to customers purchasing plaintiff's products. The principal cases in which those rulings were made are: Weco Products Co. v. Mid-City Cut Rate Drug Stores (131 Pac., 2d) and Bristol-Myers Co. v. Lit Bros., Inc. (6 Atl., 2d 843, Supreme Court, Pa., 1939). Those cases involved the use of trading stamps instead of cash register receipts. Their reasoning was avowedly followed by the Special Terms of this court in the cases of Nechamkin v. Picker (Nassau County, 197 Misc., 61) and Palmer v. Angert (Kings County, 86 N. Y. S., 2d, 529).

I have closely studied these interesting cases, as well as the others which have been cited by the learned counsel for defendants. I am constrained to say, however, that they fail to impress me, with the soundness of their rationale. Therefore, I deem it necessary to consider anew the question here posed.

[Facts]

The plaintiff manufactures and markets various drug and cosmetic articles bearing brand or trade-marks for which it has, over a period of many years, established a valuable good will. The two defendants, as copartners, own and operate a retail drug store in Lynnbrook, Long Island. There they sell to the general public many kinds of drugs and cosmetics, including the trade-marked products of plaintiff.

Seeking to avail itself of the permission of the Fair Trade Law (General Business Law, sec. 369-a), the plaintiff has fixed minimum retail prices for its products, by contracts made with their distributors. These contracts provide that the "Retailer will not, directly or indirectly, by any means, device, combination sale, trading stamp, free goods, discount, rebate, or other allowance, or otherwise whatsoever, advertise, offer for sale or sell * * * any of Manufacturer's products * * * from whomsoever obtained, and wheresoever purchased by Retailer, at prices less than those set opposite the names of said commodities respectively." It is conceded that the defendants had knowledge of these contract provisions when they dealt, as hereinafter detailed, in the plaintiff's branded and trade-marked products.

[Dividend Club]

The defendants are members of an organization composed of fifteen retail merchants in Lynbrook, named "Lynbrook Dividend Club, Inc."—hereinafter called "Dividend Club." It was formed upon the initiative of one of the defendants. Each member is a retail dealer in goods which do not compete with those of any other member. Any new members who may be admitted must also deal in non-competitive goods. The merchandise retailed by its present members includes such articles as children's wear, curtains and draperies, drugs, fruits and vegetables, furniture and lamps, gifts, hardware, jewelry, ladies dresses and specialties, meats, men's haberdashery, rugs and linoleums, stockings and sports wear. Thus, under this plan of restricted membership the defendants are the only dealers in drugs and cosmetics in Lynbrook who belong to the Dividend Club, and who may receive the benefits thereof, although there are several other druggists in that community.

All of the members of the Dividend Club—including the defendants—give cash register receipts to their respective purchasing customers. These receipts are tokens which represent 2½ per cent of the amount of each purchase. A customer who has purchased $10 worth of merchandise from a member, may redeem them for 25 cents worth of merchandise at the store of any dealer-member of the Dividend Club.

A typical form of printed descriptive advertising matter circulated by the Dividend Club reads as follows: "2½% Is Your Dividend. All you have to do is to save the cash purchase receipts you receive from any member of the Lynbrook Dividend Club, Inc. They are worth 2½% of your purchases. Bring them to any member of the Club and they will redeem them in merchandise. (25¢ merchandise for every $10.00 receipts) * * * Remember! The more you spend the more you save." On the reverse side the names and store addresses of all the members of the Dividend Club are printed together with a statement of the kind of merchandise dealt in by them respectively.

These cash register receipts—also sometimes referred to as cash purchase receipts—are accepted as cash at the rate of 2½ per cent of the amount of the purchases which are registered on them; but they can be redeemed only when they represent purchases aggregating $10 or a multiple thereof. Thus, as already stated, one purchasing drugs and cosmetics from the defendants upon accumulating cash register receipts of a total amount of $10 may obtain 25 cents worth of merchandise from defendants or from any other member of the Dividend Club upon the presentation of the receipts. In due course, each member pays every other member in cash for the full amount of merchandise given by such other member to customers of the first member in redemption of the cash register receipts issued by him.

[Cash Register Receipts Used as a Subterfuge]

By the foregoing plan the defendants sell the plaintiff's trade-marked products nominally at the minimum prices fixed in the plaintiff's fair-trade contracts. In that way they render lip service to the terms of the contracts, and to the statutory provisions which authorize such contracts. At the same time, however, it is obvious that defendants actually give to their purchasers a 2½ per cent discount or rebate from the minimum contract prices of such products. Any realistic view of the circumstances under which the cash register receipts are issued and redeemed, in my opinion, leads irresistibly to the conclusion that their use constitutes a scheme, device or subterfuge whereby defendants, willfully and knowingly, deal in plaintiff's trade-marked articles at prices which are 2½ per cent less than their minimum fair-trade contract prices.

As already noted, the basic authorities upon which defendants claim validity for their scheme are Weco Products Co. v. Mid-City Cut Rate Drug Stores (supra), and Bristol-Myers Co. v. Lit Bros., Inc. (supra), both of which were decided in other jurisdictions. The fact that those cases involved the use of trading stamps instead of cash register receipts does not, in my opinion, distinguish them in principle from the instant case.

[Other Free Services Distinguished]

I find it impossible to accept as persuasive the grounds advanced in those two cases for the conclusions arrived at therein. There, for instance, the issuance of trading stamps was held to be a proper means of attracting customers to the issuer's store, comparable to such methods as the giving of free concerts in the store; or the furnishing of free parking space; or the facility of free nursing service for the tending of babies brought to the store by shoppers; or the providing of free bus service to patrons to and from the store. None of those means, however, affects the prices paid by a customer, except perhaps remotely and indirectly. Those free services are offered to the public generally, and are not contingent upon the making of any purchase whatsoever by the shopper or customer obtaining their benefits.

They do not affect the prices paid by customers for trade-marked wares; nor can they impair in any way the value of the good will which the producer of such articles has created.

[Direct Effect on Price]

The scheme in the case at bar, on the other hand, relates directly to the prices actually paid by a customer, as well as to the amount of his purchases. Under it, when the purchases are of trademarked goods covered by fair trade minimum price contracts, the customer is deliberately and intentionally given a 2½ per cent discount from the purchase price, through the issuance of the cash register receipts, just as effectively as if he received a rebate of 2½ per cent in cash. No other inference is consistent with the factual elements in the situation.

So far as concerns ordinary articles—those not branded or trade-marked—the method here employed may not give rise to any valid legal objection. The competitors in such commodities may meet that form of competition in any way they see fit. They own that species of property without qualification, and may, if they desire, retaliate by reducing prices still more. This may, of course, precipitate a "price war." But the consequences of such cut-throat competition in articles which are neither branded nor trade-marked will generally fall principally, if not entirely, upon the competitors.

That is not, however, the result where branded or trade-marked goods are the subject of such competition. In those cases it may well work injury to the manufacturer or the owner of the brand or trade mark, who is thus frequently made the innocent victim of price wars waged by retailers of his products. The good will which he has built up in the brand or trade mark may be seriously affected by such a price war. It was to prevent that kind of injury, among other things, that led our Legislature to permit the owner of a trade mark to fix the minimum prices at which retailers could sell the wares which are branded with it. That indubitably was the legislative intent in enacting our Fair Trade Law. That law may not, in my opinion, be evaded by any method or device which effectuates a diminution of the minimum contract price. The plan used by the defendants here directly accomplishes that result. Indeed, that fact is recognized by the authors of the plan; the advertising slogan which they use for it emphasizes that "the more you spend the more you save."

I cannot sympathize with the view that small discounts may be disregarded under the maxim de minimis non curat lex. Nothing in our statute gives any sanction to that view, and courts should not write any such exception into the statute. The Legislature itself has seen fit to enumerate several exceptions from the prohibition of the statute, but it has not included any such exception among them. If it had intended to condone discounts or rebates from fixed prices of 2, 3, 5 or any other per cent, small or large, the Legislature would undoubtedly have said so. Instead, it condemned as "unfair competition" and made "actionable" any sale "at less than the price stipulated" in the fair trade contract.

Neither can I look with favor upon the proposition that the use of these cash register receipts is a legal substitute for the extension of credit to a retail purchaser of trade-marked articles. Again, the answer is that the Legislature has failed to provide that as an exception to the statutory ban.

[Practice Termed Price-Cutting]

The same decent respect for the law as it is written serves also to dispel the contention of defendants that the cash register receipts are not objectionable, because the motive asserted for their use is to induce or attract customers to defendants' store. What could do that more effectively than direct price cuts? Doubtless many more customers would be drawn to their store if defendants sold plaintiff's trade-marked goods for half of their fixed contract price. But no one in such a case would seriously heed the plea that the purpose thereof was merely to attract the public to defendants' store. Many things may legitimately be done to that end, such as advertising, elaborate store spectacles or displays, Thanksgiving Day parades, Christmas pageants, musical entertainments, etc. But palpable price-cutting —whether or not done openly or by subterfuge—may not be resorted to in dealing with trade-marked merchandise covered by fixed price contracts. Such a practice would offend against the primary intent of the statute.

[Constitutionality Not Ruled Upon]

I do not deem it necessary to discuss in detail the argument of the defendants that the Fair Trade Law, construed as aforesaid, is unconstitutional. In my opinion no substance remains in that contention under the decisions in Old Dearborn Distributing Co. v. Seagram-Distillers Corp'n (299 U. S. 183), and Bourjois Sales Corp'n v. Dorfman (273 N. Y. 167).

[Finding and Conclusion]

It is my finding and conclusion (1) that the defendants are not entitled to issue the cash register receipts in the sale of the plaintiff's branded and trade-marked products unless they sell them at such prices as shall be at least 2½ per cent above the fixed minimum contract prices; and (2) that the defendants are free to sell other merchandise as they please in this regard. An injunction is awarded accordingly; and if the plaintiff desires to recover its damages, a referee will be appointed to assess the same. The plaintiff is granted costs.

The foregoing will constitute the decision of the court (sec. 440, C. P. A.).

Settle judgment.

New York Fair Trade Act

Violations Admitted—Failure to Prove Damage—Temporary Injunction Denied.—A motion for a temporary injunction to enjoin price cutting was denied in the absence of clear proof of damage.

See the New York Fair Trade Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.73.

MR. JUSTICE WALSH: Plaintiffs move to restrain the defendants who are selling at prices below those stipulated in Fair Trade contracts in violation of General Business Law, sections 369A and 369B. Defendants, in substance, admit, for the purposes of this motion, that they are violating the law but contend that the plaintiffs herein do not show damage, that the defendant Cohen is engaged in similar practices, and, further, that the violation of the Fair Trade contracts is the rule rather than the exception in the vicinity. It is not possible to pass upon the disputed facts on this motion. Upon the admission of the defendant, the plaintiffs would appear to be entitled to a remedy but in the absence of clear proof of damage and the alleged conduct of one of the plaintiffs, the motion for a temporary injunction is denied. The parties should be interested in removing the undesirable trade conditions and should stipulate to try this case as soon as possible. Submit order.

In the Supreme Court of North Carolina, Spring Term, 1949, No. 669. May 18, 1949.

Appeal by plaintiff from GWYN, J., in chambers at Greensboro, 10 February, 1949, from Davidson.

Civil action to restrain sale of petroleum products, other than "Atlantic", from demised premises as per covenant in lease.

North Carolina General Statutory Provisions

Restraint of Trade Illegal—Covenants Not to Deal in Competitor's Products—Permissible Restriction in Lease.—A covenant not to handle or sell any petroleum products, other than those of the lessee, from the demised premises or other premises within a radius of 2000 feet is held to be a permissible restriction in a lease rather than a forbidden condition in a sales contract. The covenant therefore did not violate the statute making it unlawful to sell wares upon the condition that the purchaser refrain from dealing in the goods of a competitor.

See the North Carolina General Statutes annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8635.20.

For appellant: D. L. Pickard and Charles W. Mauze.

For appellees: Don A. Walser, all of Lexington, North Carolina.

[Statement of Facts]

The complaint alleges:

1. That on 6 December, 1941, the plaintiff leased from Wade and Pearl Tysinger a filling station on Highway 64 in Davidson County for a period of seven years and thereafter from year to year for a period not exceeding seven years at a rental of one cent per gallon of lessee's gasoline or motor fuel sold from said premises. Among other things, the lease provides:

"10. Lessor covenants and agrees that he will not, at any time during the continuance hereof, engage directly or indirectly in the business of handling and/or selling from the demised premises, or any other premises within a radius of 2000 feet therefrom, any petroleum products other than the products of Lessee, * * * ."

2. That two days later, on 8 December, 1941, Wade Tysinger agreed with the plaintiff, "In order not to complicate in any way the rental, since the service station has been sublet to me, it is agreeable and I prefer that 1¢ per gallon on all gasoline purchased by me not be added to the purchase price", this in full satisfaction of the stipulated rent.

3. That on 27 March, 1945, Wade and Pearl Tysinger sold and conveyed the filling station to Ralph and Margie Garner, and shortly thereafter, Ralph Garner executed the following endorsement on the bottom of agreement of 8 December, 1941, set out in paragraph next above: "I purchased the above described property from Wade Tysinger and agreed to a payment of rent as set out in above letter. I agree to assume the lease between Grubb Oil Co. and Wade and Pearl Tysinger and to comply with all its terms and conditions as if I had executed it."

4. That on 20 December, 1948, Ralph and Margie Garner entered into an agreement with B. C. and Isobel Young, t/a Buck Young Oil Company, purporting to lease to them the premises in question, from year to year for a term of ten years, and agreeing that only petroleum products of "Sinclair" should be sold on said premises. That notwithstanding notice from the plaintiff, the defendants have entered upon the premises, taken possession of plaintiff's equipment, and are undertaking to sell "Sinclair" products through plaintiff's pumps, etc., in violation of their agreement.

Wherefore plaintiff asks for injunctive relief.

A temporary restraining order was issued in the cause, and upon the return thereof, the same was dissolved and demurrer interposed by the defendant sustained on the ground that the covenant set out in paragraph 10 of the lease violates G. S. 75-5, sub. sec. 2, being in restraint of trade.

From judgment dissolving the injunction and sustaining the demurrer, the plaintiff appeals, assigning error. The defendants have renewed their demurrer here.

[Decision]

STACY, C. J.: The question for decision is whether the covenant in suit runs counter to the anti-monopoly or anti-trust laws.

It is not surprising that the parties are in disagreement as to their rights under the instruments in suit. A lessor who has nothing but a filling station to lease covenants, in medias res, with his lessee not to handle or sell from the demised premises, or other premises within a radius of 2000 feet, any petroleum products other than those of the lessee. It is quite understandable that the lessee might not want the lessor to handle competing products within a radius of 2000 feet, and such a covenant seems legally permissible, Sea Food Co. v. Way, 169 N. C. 679, 86 S. E. 603, but why the lessor should be asked to stipulate and agree in his lease not to handle competing products "from the demised premises" is not so readily perceived. He apparently has no right to handle anything from the premises while under demise.

However this may be, there is no allegation that the lessor has agreed to purchase petroleum products from anyone—a necessary averment to attract the provisions of G. S. 75-5, sub. sec. 2. This statute makes it unlawful, inter alia, to sell any goods, wares, merchandise, or things of value upon condition that the purchaser will not deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, articles or things of value of a competitor or rival in business. Shoe Co. v. Dept. Store, 212 N. C. 75, 193 S. E. 9; Fashion Co. v. Grant, 165 N. C. 453, 81 S. E. 606.

It is true there is here in a letter written by the lessor to the lessee, two days after the lease was signed, the statement, "since the service station has been sublet to me", but this is all that appears on the subject of a sublease. It falls short of an allegation that the lessor agreed to purchase petroleum products from the lessee on the condition denounced by the statute. Lewis v. Archbell, 199 N. C. 205, 154 S. E. 11; Wooten v. Harris, 153 N. C. 43, 68 S. E. 898. The only challenged agreement appearing on the face of the complaint is the lessor's covenant not to handle or sell from the demised premises, or other premises within a radius of 2000 feet, any petroleum products other than the products of the lessee. This agreement apparently runs afoul of no statute, Hill v. Davenport, 195 N. C. 271, 141 S. E. 752, and hence it is not subject to successful challenge in the manner and form here presented. A demurrer admits the truth of factual averments and relevant inferences for the purpose of testing the sufficiency of a pleading. Leonard v. Maxwell, Comr., 216 N. C. 89, 3 S. E. (2d) 316.

It would seem, therefore, that as presently presented, the plaintiff is seeking to enforce

Of course, if it should appear on the hearing that the demise of the premises to the lessee and its immediate subletting to the lessor, for purposes of operation, were but parts of a single transaction, though separately stated, a different situation might arise from what is presently alleged. Nevertheless, on demurrer, we must take the pleading at its face value. Anno. 83 A L R 1418.

The demurrer was improvidently sustained. In the present state of the record, the injunction should have been continued to the hearing.

Error and reversed.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Act

Suit Alleging Transportation Monopoly—Balance of Conveniences in Antitrust Suits —Order Transferring Cause Upheld.—In denying a motion for leave to file a petition for certiorari, the Supreme Court refused to alter an order of the District Court of California which, upon a consideration of the balance of the conveniences, transferred the cause to the District Court of Illinois. The 1948 revision of the Judicial Code enabling a district court to transfer any civil action to another district to further the convenience of the parties and the interests of justice was held to apply to antitrust suits.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.101, and the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2032.10.

Motion for leave to file a petition for certiorari to the District Court for the Southern District of California denied.

For petitioner: George T. Washington, Acting Solicitor General; Herbert A. Bergson, Assistant Attorney General; Charles H. Weston, Philip Elman, Special Assistants to the Attorney General.

For the respondent: C. Frank Reavis, Martin D. Jacobs, Marland Gale.

VINSON, Ch. J.: The issue here is whether the 1948 revision of the Judicial Code (Title 28, United States Code) extends the doctrine of forum non conveniens to antitrust suits. The Government's complaint in this civil suit alleged that respondent corporations have conspired to obtain control of local transportation companies in at least 44 cities in 16 states in different sections of the country, in order to restrain and monopolize interstate commerce in busses and the petroleum and other supplies incident thereto, in violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 26 Stat. 209, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2.

This is the second time that an order of the court below, the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, attempting to effectuate a transfer of the case from Los Angeles to Chicago, has been before this Court. When respondents' motion was first granted, the District Court dismissed the action, 7 F. R. D. 456 (1947), inasmuch as the federal courts then lacked statutory power to transfer cases. We reversed, holding that forum non conveniens was not applicable in antitrust suits. United States v National City Lines, 334 U. S. 537 (June 7, 1948). After September 1, 1948, the effective date of the present Judicial Code,[1] respondents filed a new motion

There has been apparently but one other reported case dealing with the instant issue. It is in accord with the holding below. United States v. E. I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co., 83 F. Supp. 233 (1949).

See, generally, Note, Venue in Antitrust Cases: Applicability of the New Discretionary Transfer Provision, 58 Yale L. J. 482 (1949).

under the doctrine of forum non conveniens, citing § 1404 (a), which reads as follows: "For the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice, a district court may transfer any civil action to any other district or division where it might have been brought." Again the District Court below granted the motion. It ordered the case transferred. 80 F. Supp. 734 (1948). The Government thereupon submitted in this Court a motion for leave to file petition for writ of certiorari. We assigned the case for hearing on this motion. 335 U. S. 897 (1948).

In taking the position that the District Court lacked authority to enter its order of transfer, the Government has advanced many of the arguments which we have already considered today—and rejected—in Ex parte Collet, ante, p. —, and Kilpatrick v. Texas and Pacific R. Co., ante, p. —, in which we held that actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act were now subject to the doctrine of forum non conveniens. The Government contends, for example, that Congress intended § 1404 (a) to apply only to actions the venue provisions of which were formerly contained in Title 28, rather than to "any civil action" (the venue requirements in antitrust cases are defined in 15 U. S. C. § 22; in Liability Act cases, 45 U. S. C. § 56); and that the legislative history establishes very clearly that Congress had no desire substantially to change the law—indeed, the Government urges us to disregard to reviser's notes which were printed in the House Reports.[2] We cannot accept this position for the reasons discussed in our previous decisions today. The reviser's notes are so obviously authoritative in perceiving the meaning of the Code that the Government itself, in discussing a section other than § 1404 (a), refers to them in its brief in this case. And we have already had occasion to look to the reviser's notes. Stainback v. Mo. Hock Ke Lok Po, 336 U. S. 368, 376, n. 12 (1949).

It is true that the reviser's notes to § 1404 (a), although citing a Federal Employers' Liability Act decision, make no reference to the antitrust laws or to our previous decision in this litigation. The Government therefore urges that our disposition of the Liability Act cases is not conclusive. We disagree. The notes cite the Liability Act decision "As an example of the need of such a provision." Obviously, an example is not a complete catalogue. The use of an example implies no purpose to restrict the meaning of the statutory phrase "any civil action" precisely to the illustration selected. Quite the contrary, the particular example noted demonstrates that Congress intended to effectuate changes in the law, in order to expand the transferability of cases. And the change in antitrust practice seems no more radical than the change in Federal Employers' Liability Act practice; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Kepner, 314 U. S. 44 (1941), cited in the reviser's note, was decided over six years before our initial decision in this case, 334 U. S. 573 (1948), which was the first ruling by this Court that forum non conveniens was inapplicable in antitrust suits.

Although no explanation is needed for the lack of Congressional reference to our former decision, simple chronology may be consulted. The reviser's notes appeared in House Report No. 308, 80th Congress, 1st Sess., which was published in April, 1947. The Code revision was initially passed by the House in July, 1947.[3] With amendments, the revision was passed by the Senate on June 12, 1948,[4] and by the House on June 16, 1948.[5] Our decision in the first National City Lines case, 334 U. S. 573, was handed down on June 7, 1948. Clearly, the failure of Congress expressly to consider this decision proves nothing.

Nor was there anything in our decision which required unique Congressional discussion, in the face of the unmistakable statutory language and reviser's notes. We expressly held that "Congress' mandate regarding venue and the exercise of jurisdiction is binding on the federal courts," 334 U. S. at 588-89, and that decision in this field must rest on "the legislative purposes and the effect of the language used . . .," supra, at 597. Nothing in our previous opinion intimates that we could fail to respect whatever modification of the law Congress might enact.

[2] The note to § 1404 (a) appears at H. R. Rep. No. 308, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. A. 132 (1947) and H. R. Rep. No. 2646, 79th Cong., 2d Sess. A. 127 (1946). It reads as follows: "Section (a) was drafted in accordance with the doctrine of forum non conveniens, permitting transfer to a more convenient forum, even though venue is proper. As an example of the need of such a provision, see Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. Kepner, 1941, 62 S. Ct. 6, 314 U. S. 44, 86 L. Ed. 28, which was prosecuted under the Federal Employer's Liability Act in New York, although the accident occurred and the employee resided in Ohio. The new subsection requires the court to determine that the transfer is necessary for convenience of the parties and witnesses, and further, that it is in the interest of justice to do so."

Moreover, this change in the law must have been known to the Government in time for it to have addressed the protests which we have heard to the Congress. This was admitted on the oral argument; it could not possibly have been denied. When this litigation was previously before us, National City's brief, at pp. 25-26 and 45, expressly called attention to the imminent probability that § 1404 (a) would be enacted and would be held applicable to antitrust suits. This brief was filed here on April 26, 1948. Not until June 7, 1948, was the final hearing on the Judicial Code revision held before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee. Furthermore, the Code proposals were extensively publicized. See Ex parte Collet, ante, at p. —. The Department of Justice in particular was informed: each United States Attorney received a copy of the drafts;[6] a Department spokesman testified at the House hearing;[7] the Attorney General was asked for an opinion by the Congressional Committee.[8] The plain inference is either that the Government took no action with respect to the forthcoming alteration of the rule that forum non conveniens was inapplicable to antitrust suits, or that a protest was made which Congress disregarded. Neither alternative would offer the slightest justification for overriding the unequivocal words of § 1404 (a) and the legislative history which establishes that Congress indeed meant what it said.

For these reasons, we can find no distinction between this case and the others decided today. We hold that § 1404 (a) is applicable here. The motion is Denied.

[Dissenting Opinion]

DOUGLAS. J.: There are difficulties for me however the case is decided. But I have concluded that the fairer result is reached if the ambiguities and doubts, fully canvassed and disclosed in the Court's opinions in this case and in Ex parte Collett, decided this day, are resolved by reading § 1404 (a) as making the doctrine of forum non conveniens applicable to any civil action as to which the venue provisions are codified in revised Title 28. That gives full effect to the words "any civil action" in the field in which Congress was legislating. And it authorizes, as respects that group of cases, a transfer to another district in lieu of outright dismissal as had previously obtained. That construction saves § 1404 (a), the venue provisions of the Clayton Act and our decision in United States v. National City Lines, Inc., 334 U. S. 573, from mutilation. I am reluctant to conclude that Congress took the more drastic course in a mere revision of the code. So to hold would make a basic change not only in the two statutes involved in these cases but in the Sherman Act, 15 U. S. C. §§ 4, 5; the Jones Act, 46 U. S. C. § 688; the Suits in Admiralty Act, 46 U. S. C. § 782; Merchant Marine Act of 1936, 46 U. S. C. § 1128d; the Securities Act, 15 U. S. C. §§ 77a, 77v; the Securities Exchange Act, 15 U. S. C. §§ 78a, 78aa; the Public Utility Holding Company Act, 15 U. S. C. §§ 79, 79y; The Investment Company Act, 15 U. S. C. §§ 80a, 80a-43; and perhaps in other statutes too.

Mr. Justice BLACK concurs.

[Concurring Opinion]

RUTLEDGE, J. [concurring in No. 206, Misc. Ex Parte Joseph Collett, No. 233, Misc. Jessie A. Kilpatrick v. The Texas and Pacific Railway Co. as well as No. 269, Misc. The United States of America v. National City Lines, Inc., et al.]: I concur in the result. But in doing so I feel impelled to say two things.

One is that in my view § 1404 (a), taken broadly to include "any civil action," does effect a partial repeal of § 6 of the Federal Employers' Liability Act and of the other statutes mentioned by Mr. Justice Douglas, including the venue provisions (§ 12) of the Clayton Act involved in our decision in United States v. National City Lines, 334 U. S. 573.

The legislative history, for example, of the Clayton Act venue provisions demonstrates that the change § 1404 (a) is said to have made was more than the mere removal of a judicial gloss. I think we should not now impugn the validity of our decisions in National City Lines, supra, and in Kepner and Miles [1] by characterizing each as a mere "judicial gloss" upon the pertinent statute. Those decisions in my opinion were true reflections of congressional intent as stated in the respective statutes and, accordingly, the changes made in them by § 1404 (a) were in the nature of repeals, to the extent that the plaintiffs were deprived of their rights under the pre-existing statutes to have their causes of action tried in the forums where they were properly brought.

In the second place, those changes, although entirely within Congress' power to make, were neither insubstantial nor noncontroversial, in view of the legislative history of the original provisions, for example, the venue provisions of the Clayton Act. Nor do I think the legislative history of § 1404 (a) demonstrates either the insubstantial or the noncontroversial nature of the changes in § 1404 (a), although they seem to have been so treated by those in charge of the bill.[2] It is to be noted, moreover, that specific attention was drawn to the effect of § 1404 (a) upon § 6 of the Employers' Liability Act through reference to the Kepner and Miles decisions, but no like specific reference was made to the venue provisions of the Clayton Act and the National City Lines decision.

These matters make it impossible for me to concur in the view that Congress was in fact "fully informed as to the significance of § 1404 (a)." This, however, is a matter affecting congressional procedure and the manner of conducting legislative business. Accordingly, notwithstanding my doubts that Congress intended to go so far, I acquiesce in the Court's decisions.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civ. 26-187. May 17, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Treble Damage Action—Guild Conspiracy—Future Interference Enjoined.—In an action taken by a producer against authors of a musical play and the guild to which they belonged claiming treble damages for antitrust violations, it was held that, although he had not suffered any measurable damage as a result of the conspiracy of guild members and illegal conditions in contracts and agreements having a restraining effect on the production of the play, his right to freedom from unlawful interference with his commerce can be protected by enjoining authors and the guild from conspiring to interfere with his acquisition of any and all rights in the play.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. ¶ 1640.253, 1640.351, 1640.634, 1650.175.

For the plaintiff: Alfred S. Julien, New York, New York.

For the defendants Spina, Heyman and Pauker: Wittenberg, Carrington & Farnsworth (Philip Wittenberg of counsel), all of New York, New York.

For the defendant Dramatists Guild of Authors League of America, Inc.: Greenbaum, Wolff & Ernst (Edward S. Greenbaum, Alexander Lindey, Milton Ross, Mervin Roseman of counsel), all of New York, New York.

RIFKIND, District Judge: The plaintiff brought this action against the defendants Spina, Heyman and Hannan and the Dramatists' Guild of the Authors' League of America, Inc., (hereinafter, Guild) for treble damages and equitable relief under the anti-trust laws. 15 U. S. C. A. §§ 15, 26. A temporary injunction was granted by the Court of Appeals at the instance of the plaintiff.

Ring v. Spina, C. C. A. 2, 1945, 148 F. 2d 647. Its terms are set out hereafter. Pursuant to the direction of the Court of Appeals, 166 F. 2d 546, the claim for damages was tried to a jury. The jury found a special verdict that the defendants had violated the anti-trust laws but had not thereby damaged the plaintiff. Plaintiff's claims for equitable relief were tried to the court and are now to be determined. In addition, the reasons for my withdrawal of one certain claim for damages from the jury should be stated. But first the facts, as revealed by the evidence, deserve brief recitation.

Defendants Spina, Heyman and Hannan are the authors of "Stovepipe Hat", a musical play. One Gaumont, a producer, contracted with them on February 7, 1944, to produce "Stovepipe Hat". Defendant authors were and are members of the defendant Guild. Gaumont was a signatory of the Minimum Basic Agreement (hereinafter, M. B. A.) promulgated by the Guild. The M. B. A. is a comprehensive private "statute" governing the production of plays in the United States and elsewhere, the disposition of motion picture and other rights to reproduction, and the rights and duties of authors and producers. Among other things, it establishes the author's and producer's right to veto any proposed changes in the play, the minimum royalties to be paid by producers, and compulsory arbitration of any disputes arising between authors and producers. Substantially all authors of repute are members of the Guild, and substantially all producers of note are signatories of the M. B. A. The M. B. A. forbids members and signatories to deal with non-members and non-signatories.

The Spina-Gaumont production contract for "Stovepipe Hat" (Spina acted throughout as agent for the other author-defendants) specifically encorporated the M. B. A. in its entirety, spelled out in detail the royalties to be awarded with respect to stage and film rights here and abroad, and obligated Gaumont to produce the play on or before May 7, 1944 or to pay $1500 to the Guild, for the authors' account, for the privilege of postponing the opening to October 7, 1944. This contract was made on the standard form supplied by the Guild and was countersigned by the Guild, as required by the M. B. A. Simultaneously were executed two letters by which Gaumont contracted to hire Spina as General Supervisor of the artistic and musical phases of the production. By the terms of these letter-agreements, Spina had a veto over the selection of cast, production staff, theaters, changes in the play, lighting and sets.

The plaintiff, Ring, had become a partner of Gaumont and had invested about $50,000 in the proposed production of "Stovepipe Hat" when, on May 4, 1944, Gaumont appeared to be unable to complete the necessary financing. Ring, not yet a signatory to the M. B. A., then attempted to negotiate an arrangement with Spina whereby Spina would cooperate with Ring in terminating Gaumont's participation in the venture and Ring might replace Gaumont as producer on the same terms an conditions as existed under the Spina-Gaumont production and supervision contracts, except that one Samrock was to be the sole arbitrator of differences which might arise between them, instead of the arbitrators provided for under the Spina-Gaumont contracts. Spina's attorney disapproved the proposed arrangement, thereupon Ring signed the M. B. A., making him eligible to deal with Guild authors, and promptly brought an action against Gaumont in this court which was settled on May 12, 1944 by a stipulation whereunder Gaumont assigned to Ring all his rights of every kind against all persons in connection with the play.

The play was produced by Ring in New Haven on May 18, 1944, and subsequently in Boston. Disputes developed between Ring and Spina concerning changes in the play. Spina refused to consent to changes desired by Ring, and Ring, who by that time had invested over $100,000, closed the play on May 27, 1944. On June 7, 1944, Spina demanded that arbitration be had pursuant to the M. B. A. On June 14, 1944 Ring instituted this suit against the authors and the Guild, alleging violation of the anti-trust laws and asking treble damages, temporary and permanent injunctions against arbitration under the M. B. A. and against the enforcement of M. B. A., a declaratory judgment of plaintiff's rights in the play, an injunction prohibiting defendant authors from enforcing their copyrights (in fact only a small portion of the play is copyrighted), and an injunction prohibiting defendant authors from interfering with plaintiff's production of the play. The vacation by the district court of a temporary restraining order was reversed by the court of appeals, which issued a temporary injunction restraining arbitration, restraining defendants from enforcing the M. B. A., and restraining defendant authors from selling or claiming the right to sell the play.

That the M. B. A. constitutes an illegal agreement in restraint of interstate trade and commerce was held by the Court of Appeals in Ring v. Spina, C. C. A. 2, 1945, 138 F. 2d 647, based upon an analysis of alleged facts there set forth. Since those allegations have been amply established it follows that the M. B. A. is illegal. And so I charged the jury, leaving it to them, however, to decide whether the Guild was a labor organization exempt from the anti-trust laws under 15 U. S. C. A. § 17. They decided that the Guild was not a labor organization and I see no reason for rejecting their finding.

Plaintiff's demands for equitable relief are interpreted by him to mean that defendants be enjoined from attempting to enforce any rights under the M. B. A. or contracts subsidiary thereto, and from interfering in any way with plaintiff's production of "Stovepipe Hat" for a reasonable time after the final disposition of this suit. Plaintiff disavows any desire for a final adjudication of the parties' rights to the play, the scale of royalties, or reproduction rights. He prefers to leave those questions to be determined when and if defendant authors should seek to enforce any rights they assert. Such a disposition of this case cannot be tolerated. It amounts to an open invitation to litigation and seriously and adversely affects the marketability of the play and any subsidiary rights therein. The rights and duties of the parties should be set forth with sufficient precision to afford them guidance, and the controversy should, if possible, be finally disposed of so as to secure an end to litigation.

Plaintiff is entitled to injunctive relief which would protect him agaist prospective damage. 15 U. S. C. A. § 26. Such damage arises when there is danger of interference with rights or privileges he now enjoys, not merely as a member of the general public, but as one engaging in the commerce which is being restrained. See Minnesota v. Northern Securities Co., 1904, 194 U. S. 48, 70-1; Cf. Ketchum v. Denver & Rio Grande R. Co., C. C. A. 8, 1917, 248 Fed. 106. The United States is the proper party to protect the interests of the general public under the anti-trust laws. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Frank, C. C. A. 8, 1915, 226 Fed. 906.

The rights Ring asserts are rights with respect to the play "Stovepipe Hat", for that is his only present or prospective connection with play production. What those rights are it is difficult to determine. Whether by virtue of the stipulation entered into by Ring and Gaumont or by subsequent implicit agreement between Ring and Spina, the relations of Ring and Spina were at least tacitly assumed by both to be governed by the Spina-Gaumont contracts. The Spina-Gaumont production contract embodied the M. B. A. The latter is illegal and the former, inseparable as it is from the latter, is also illegal. It would seem to follow that there is no production contract between Ring and Spina, and therefore that Ring has no contractual rights in the play. The Spina-Gaumont supervision contracts then become meaningless and fall with the principal contract. It can hardly be said that Ring is entitled to unlimited rights to the play simply because it has become an article of commerce under the provisions of an agreement responsive to the forces generated by an unlawful combination. Cf. Bruce's Juices v. Am. Can Co., 1947, 330 U. S. 743; See Alden-Rochelle, Inc. v. American Soc. of C., A. and P., S. D. N. Y., 1948, 80 F. Supp. 888, 899. Nor is the situation analogous to Morton Salt Co. v. G. S. Suppiger Co., 1942, 314 U. S. 488, as it might conceivably be were this a suit by defendant authors to enforce a copyright in the play. The Court of Appeals suggested, however, that it might be possible for the trial court "to separate the rights and duties under the specific production contract assigned to plaintiff from the more farreaching provisions of the Basic Agreement incorporated therein by a general reference." 148 F. 2d 647, 653.

If all references to the M. B. A. are excised, then what remains of the production contract gives the producer the sole and exclusive right to produce the play on the speaking stage of the United States and Canada, fixes the total and advance royalties to be paid the authors, provides for the authors' agents' commissions and their appointment as agents for the disposition of subsidiary rights (but refers to the M. B. A. for the producer's interests in such rights), provides for arbitration of disputes among authors as to the disposition of subsidiary rights, and requires the producer to produce the play on or before May 7, 1944 or, if he pays $1500 for the privilege, to postpone production until October 7, 1944. The production contract does not, except by reference to the M. B. A., provide for the consequences of failure to produce on time; interruption of the run of the play; the producer's interest in foreign production, foreign rights, or subsidiary rights; rights and duties with regard to changes in the play, cast, or production; authorship credit; and other items too numerous to detail. To determine the entire contract between the parties from the production contract alone, is impossible. What is left is a truncated fragment of the understanding of the parties.

Moreover, apart from the M. B. A., the production contract is itself an agreement imposed by the force of the illegal conspiracy. Agreements molded by the forces generated by an unlawful combination are invalid whether they are multilateral like the M. B. A. or trilateral, like the production contract. Thus, no matter how viewed, the production contract can hardly survive.

It does not follow that the plaintiff is entitled to no relief. The M. B. A. is an agreement, illegal under the anti-trust laws, which restrains commerce in dramatic productions generally, and which imposed retraints on commerce in connection with the production of "Stovepipe Hat". The defendant authors are members of the Guild, which is a conspiracy in restraint of trade, and they have applied the force of that conspiracy in connection with "Stovepipe Hat".

That the plaintiff has not yet suffered measurable damage therefrom does not establish that he is unlikely to do so in the future. There is nothing to indicate that in the absence of an injunction the defendants will not continue to enforce the M. B. A. and to employ the power of the conspiracy with respect to "Stovepipe Hat".

I can not write a contract for the parties, but the plaintiff's statutory right to freedom from unlawful interference with his commerce can be protected by declaring the M. B. A. to be illegal, the production contract between plaintiff and individual defendants subsidiary thereto to be illegal, and the enforcement of either to be illegal and prohibited. Arbitration should be enjoined. Although this leaves plaintiff without contractual rights to "Stovepipe Hat", his right to freedom from illegal restraint can be protected by enjoining the defendant authors on the one hand, and the defendant Guild on the other, from conspiring to interfere or jointly interfering with plaintiff's acquisition of any and all rights in plays, including "Stovepipe Hat". The defendant authors are not thereby to be compelled to sell or license "Stovepipe Hat" to the plaintiff, or enjoined from agreeing among themselves on the terms under which they may choose to sell or license the play; but they may not offer the plaintiff terms less favorable than those offered any other producer; nor require him to subscribe to the M. B. A.; nor associate the Guild in any illegal way with the transaction; nor conspire or agree with the Guild or with any other members of the Guild to exact particular terms or conditions from him.

The claim for damages which I withdrew from the jury concerned a $1500 check which Gaumont delivered to the Guild for the account of the authors in order to procure a postponement of the production date to October 7, 1944 under the Spina-Gaumont production contract. When Gaumont assigned his rights thereunder to the plaintiff in consideration of $6659 it was stipulated that "[I]t is understood that the balance of $1500 will be paid by the defendant [Gaumont] obtaining the return of said check or stopping payment thereof, all of which has been agreed to by the author". Spina had notice of this stipulation and consented thereto,. Spina executed a letter dated May 16, 1944 which was delivered to the Guild, requesting the Guild to return the $1500 to Gaumont. By letter of May 12, 1944 to Gaumont's attorney, Ring agreed to pay the $1500 to Gaumont if the Guild did not repay it. On May 29, 1944 the Guild wrote to Spina, enclosing for his and Ring's signatures a form of proposed agreement whereby "The Dramatist's Guild is hereby instructed to refund said $1500 to Irving Gaumont". The record is bare of any evidence of further action in this connection. Neither Gaumont nor Ring made demand upon the Guild for this money.

Ring claims that the Guild refused to return the $1500 to Gaumont because its M. B. A. provided that "No part of such advances shall in any event be returnable by the Author to the Manager"; that the M. B. A. is an agreement illegal under the anti-trust laws; that the Guild refused to pay by reason of that illegal agreement; and that, therefore, plaintiff was damaged to the extent of the $1500 by the defendant Guild's violation of the anti-trust laws, for which he is entitled to treble damages, amounting to $4500.

Patently the Guild was under no duty to give Ring the money before it had notice of the stipulation between Ring and Gaumont concerning the money. Even after it had notice that Ring had supplanted

Gaumont as producer, it would not have been justified, much less under any duty, to pay Ring, since both the stipulation and Spina's letter envisaged payment (or cancellation of the check) to Gaumont, not to Ring. Whatever the Guild's duty to pay Gaumont upon demand, or to surrender the check, the evidence is uncontroverted that it was quite prepared to do so upon receipt of formal authorization from all interested parties, including Ring and Spina. That it never got. To find that Ring was damaged by virtue of the above-quoted provision of the M. B. A. would be incorrect as a matter of law, for there is no evidence that the Guild refused to pay over the $1500 to either Gaumont or Ring. Not having refused, there can arise no question of fact whether its (non-existent) refusal was motivated by anything in the M. B. A. or any other illegal agreement.

I did not leave to the jury the question whether plaintiff may be entitled to a judgment for $1500 on an ordinary claim for money had and received and do not now decide, because, at the beginning of this trial, it was expressly stipulated that every aspect of this case was withdrawn except the claim for treble damages for violation of the anti-trust laws, and for equitable relief against continued violation. Under the circumstances a claim for money had and received was expressly excluded.

Neither damages nor attorney's fees are recoverable as an incident to equitable relief under the anti-trust laws, Decorative Stone Co. v. Building Trades Council, C. C. A. 2, 1928, 23 F. 2d 426; Alden-Rochelle, Inc. v. American Soc. of C., A. and P., S. D. N. Y., 1948, 80 F. Supp. 888, but costs may, and in this case should, be awarded plaintiff where his action is both at law for treble damages and in equity for an injunction, and he obtains equitable, though not legal, relief. Midwest Theatres Co. v. Co-operative Theaters, E. D. Mich. 1941, 43 F. Supp. 216.

Submit findings, conclusions and decree in accordance with this opinion.

Federal Trade Commission Act

False Advertising—Coverage Under General Law.—The Court has affirmed the Commission's order prohibiting a company engaged in the sale of a patented exhaust pipe attachment from falsely advertising that its device, when attached to the exhaust mechanism of automobiles, saved gasoline and oil, increased the power of the motor, caused it to give better performance, drew carbon, oil and moisture from the muffler, eliminated or reduced back pressure, reduced vibration of the motor, gave the motor greater acceleration, caused the motor to run more smoothly, and saved tires. Such representations, although included in the patent application, do not come within the limited coverage of the patent grant. They fall under the prohibitions of general law, applicable to all who put their products for sale into the channels of commerce and trade. When they do so they can claim no immunity by reason of a patent. It cannot be made a cover for violation of law.

Affirming the Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order in Dkt. 5097.

Harry S. Hall, with whom Josephus C. Trimble, was on the brief, for petitioners.

Donovan R. Divet, Special Attorney, Federal Trade Commission, with whom William T. Kelley, General Counsel, Walter B. Wooden, Associate General Counsel and James W. Cassedy, Assistant General Counsel, Federal Trade Commission, were on the brief, for respondent.

Before Stephens, C. J., and Wilbur K. Miller and Proctor, JJ.

[Nature of Action]

Proctor, J.: This case is here for review of a proceeding before the Federal Trade Commission, resulting in a cease and desist order against petitioners, who were charged with unfair and deceptive acts and practices in commerce, in violation of Section 45 of Title 15, United States Code.

[Advertising Representations]

Petitioners hold a patent to a device bearing the trade name Vacudex, which they were selling in interstate commerce. In their advertising they represented that Vacudex, when attached to the exhaust mechanism of automobiles, saved gasoline and oil; increased the power of the motor; caused it to give better performance; drew carbon, oil and moisture from the muffler; eliminated or reduced back pressure; reduced vibration of the motor; gave the motor greater acceleration; caused the motor to run more smoothly, and saved tires. These representations, with others, formed the basis of the detailed charges against petitioners in the complaint before the Commission, and are similar to those proscribed by the order to cease and desist. They are also substantially like statements included in the patent application, a copy of which was carried into the letters-patent. Petitioners here renew the several contentions made before the Commission.

[Petitioners' Contention]

The jurisdiction of the Commission is attacked upon the broad ground that the proceedings were, in effect, an attack upon the patent itself, only tenable in appropriate proceedings before a federal district court (Title 28, United States Code, Section 41). Their contention is that the peculiar facts of this case exclude it from the Commission's powers. They point out that representations in their advertising of the beneficial effects of Vacudex, charged as unfair and deceptive in the complaint, are similar in nature to representations in the letters-patent. Hence, they say that their advertising came within the "scope of the patent."

From this premise they argue that issuance of the patent imported findings by the Patent Office that the invention possessed the useful advantages stated in the application. Therefore they contend that the effect of the proceedings before the Commission is to challenge the utility of the invention and thus the validity of the patent. This, they insist, is beyond the lawful powers of the Commission. We cannot agree with these contentions. They are predicated upon a misconception of the nature and extent of the patent grant, as we shall point out.

[Scope of Patent Limited]

In speaking of their advertising as within the "scope of the patent," petitioners mean, as we understand, that the advertising of the useful benefits of Vacudex stems from statements contained in the patent application which were carried into the letters-patent. But, they are mistaken in assuming that this circumstance brings the advertising within the scope of the patent. In legal contemplation the scope of a patent is limited to the invention described in the claims of the patent, read in the light of the specification. Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Universal Film Manufacturing Co., 243 U. S. 502, 510, 61 L. Ed. 871 (1917). While the claim may be illustrated it cannot be enlarged by language used in other parts of the letters-patent than the claim itself. Yale Lock Manufacturing Co. v. Greenleaf, 117 U. S. 554, 559, 29 L. Ed. 952 (1886). Otherwise stated, the scope of letters-patent is limited to the invention covered by the claim, and though the claim may be illustrated, it cannot be enlarged by the language of the specification. Railroad Co. v. Mellon, 104 U. S. 112, 118, 26 L. Ed. 639 (1881); McClain v. Ortmayer, 141 U. S. 419, 424, 35 L. Ed. 800 (1891).

A claim, in the patent law, has a technical meaning, derived from the statutory provision that a patent applicant "shall particularly point out and distinctly claim the part, improvement, or combination which he claims as his invention or discovery. . . ." (Title 35, United States Code, Section 33.) It seems clear, therefore, that the scope of a patent is limited to the device particularly pointed out in the specification and distinctly claimed by the applicant, as set forth in the letters-patent. The device, made in accordance with the specification and claims, visually illustrates the scope of a patent. So we conclude that the patent covered the device alone. It cannot be understood to embrace the methods employed in advertising or selling the patented product.

[Validity of Patent Grant Disregarded]

It has long been settled that a patentee receives nothing from the law he did not have before, and that the only effect of his patent is to restrain others from manufacturing, using or selling that which he has invented. Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Universal Film Manufacturing Co., supra, and cases cited. Before the patent grant the inventor had the right to sell the product of his invention, and to advertise the same, but not the right to misrepresent it. Now, after the patent grant, petitioners, the present owners of the patent, have the right to sell the article and to advertise it, but not the right to misrepresent it. In short, the letters-patent do not cover advertising. The proceedings before the Federal Trade Commission related only to advertising. They did not draw into question the validity of the patent grant. Hence the case is not one arising under the patent laws, cognizable only in a federal district court.

We think petitioners also make a mistake in assuming that their patent covers the functions of the invention as set forth in the letters-patent. The law is settled that the patent does not cover functions, i. e., the operative effects or results of a patented process or device. Westinghouse v. Boyden Power Brake Co., 170 U. S. 537, 556, 557, 42 L. Ed. 1136 (1898); General Electric Co. v. Wabash Appliance Corp., 304 U. S. 364, 371, 82 L. Ed. 1402 (1938). Indeed a patent claim stated solely in terms of function is void, Expanded Metal Co. v. Bradford, 214 U. S. 366, 384, 53 L. Ed. 1034 (1909), for the obvious reason that if functions or results are patentable the patent monopoly would be extended beyond the discovery and discourage rather than promote invention. The Incandescent Lamp Patent, 159 U. S. 465, 476, 40 L. Ed. 221 (1895); Holland Furniture Co. v. Perkins Glue Co., 277 U. S. 245, 257, 72 L. Ed. 868 (1928).

[Advertising Representations Covered by General Law]

Applying the foregoing rule to the facts of this case, we observe that the complaint before the Commission and the order to cease and desist relate only to statements concerning the functioning of Vacudex. It follows that such representations, which in one form or another found their way into the advertising of petitioners, do not come within the limited coverage of the patent grant. Rather do they fall under the prohibitions of general law, applicable to all who put their products for sale into the channels of commerce and trade. When they do so they can claim no immunity by reason of a patent. It cannot be made a cover for violation of law. Standard Sanitary Mfg. Co. v. U. S., 226 U. S. 20, 49, 57 L. Ed. 107 (1912); Virtue v. Creamery Package Co., 227 U. S. 8, 32, 57 L. Ed. 393 (1913). "Beyond the limited monopoly which is granted, the arrangements by which the patent is utilized are subject to general law." U. S. v. Masonite Corporation, 316 U. S. 265, 277, 86 L. Ed. 1461 (1942). Nor does the grant "limit the right of Congress to enact legislation not interfering with the legitimate rights secured by the patent." United Shoe Machinery Corp. v. U. S., 258 U. S. 451, 464, 66 L. Ed. 708 (1922). Likewise, patent rights are subject to the prohibitions and controls imposed by the states in the legitimate exercise of their powers over purely domestic affairs, whether of internal commerce or of police. Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501, 503, 24 L. Ed. 1115 (1878); Allen v. Riley, 203 U. S. 347, 356, 51 L. Ed. 216 (1906).

[Utility of Invention Discussed]

Next, petitioners contend that the Commission's proceedings attack the utility of the invention. It is true, as they argue, that a patent does raise a presumption that the invention possesses utility. Remington Cash Register Co. v. National Cash Register Co., 6 F. 2d 585, 629 (D. C., D. Conn., 1925). However, the presumption is not conclusive, but only prima facie. Cleveland Automatic Mach. Co. v. National Acme Co., 52 F. 2d 769, 770 (C. C. A. 6th 1931); Callison v. Dean, 70 F. 2d 55, 58 (C. C. A. 10th 1934). It is also important to note than an invention need not be capable of performing all the functions declared by the inventor. The statutory requirement of utility is met if it can accomplish one. Scovill Mfg. Co. v. Satler, 21 F. 2d 630, 634 (D. C., D. Conn., 1927); In re Oberweger, 115 F. 2d 826, 828 (C. C. P. A. 1940); Walker on Patents, Deller's Edition, Vol. 1, page 312, section 65. So, although we must assume that the Patent Office did find that Vacudex had some utility, it does not follow that it possessed all the useful qualities asserted for it by the inventor. With this in mind we point out that in the cease and desist order the Commission omitted two specifications laid in the complaint, those relating to saving of the muffler and tail pipe of an automobile by retarding them from rusting. In addition, the patent application reveals several other statements as to the utility of the invention not referred to in proceedings before the Commission. These useful qualities, if found to exist, would, without more, have sufficed to justify the granting of the patent. Therefore, proscription by the Commission of certain representations of utility does not constitute an attack upon the finding of the Patent Office that the invention did possess some utility. That finding can be accepted without rejecting the findings of the Federal Trade Commission that in certain particulars the advertising of petitions did misrepresent the beneficial qualities of Vacudex.

[Representations Not Within Scope of Patent]

In view of the foregoing considerations we are convinced that the representations concerning Vacudex forming the bases of the proceedings before the Federal Trade Commission did not come within the scope of the patent, and that said proceedings and the order to cease and desist did not constitute an attack upon the validity of the patent.

[Order Affirmed]

Several objections to the manner in which the hearings were conducted by the Commission have been raised. They are directed chiefly to the admission of evidence; the reopening of the case for additional testimony, and the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and order. In our opinion the objections are without merit. We think the proceedings were fairly conducted and that the action of the Commission in issuing the cease and desist order was supported by reliable and substantial evidence. Accordingly the order will stand affirmed. In conformity with the statute, Title 15, United States Code, Section 45 (c), this court, by its order, will command obedience to the terms of the order of the Commission.

Affirmed and so ordered.

[Dissenting Opinion]

STEPHENS, C. J., dissenting: I am unable to agree with the disposition of this case made by the majority. It is conceded in the case that the representations made by the petitioners in their advertisements are a substantially accurate description of the utility of the patented device, Vacudex, as portrayed in the specification of the petitioners' patent.[1] In granting a patent the Commissioner of Patents in effect finds to be true the portrayal in the specification, that is to say, the assertions therein concerning the nature and method of operation and effect of the claimed invention. The Letters Patent incorporate and make a part thereof a copy of the specification in which the invention in described. Nevertheless the Federal Trade Commission contends that it has power, upon evidence considered by it, to find that the representations in the petitioners' advertisements are misleading and deceptive to the purchasing public, and power, therefore, to order the petitioners to cease and desist from making such representations.[2] Its cease and desist order, if valid, will render the grant of the patent in substantial part of no effect. The patent grants for the term of seventeen years the exclusive right "to make, use, and vend the said invention . . ." If the utility of the invention as portrayed in the specification which is made a part of the Letters Patent cannot be advertised, then the invention, as a practical matter, cannot be sold. In effect, therefore, the Trade Commission, in issuing its cease and desist order, is asserting power to review and render in part nugatory the action of the Commissioner of Patents in granting the patent to the device in question. If the Trade Commission has such power in this case, it has it in all cases in which it may, upon evidence considered by it, reach a conclusion contrary to that of the Commissioner of Patents as to the correctness of the representations in the specification of a patent application. Thus the Trade Commission may assume to review and in practical effect to set side, so far as the right of a patentee to vend an invention is concerned, the action of the Commissioner of Patents in respect of any or all outstanding patents. I think the Trade Commission has no such power.

The rule for infringement cases that an issued patent has but "prima facie" or "presumptive" validity (cf. Gebhard v. General Motors Sales Corp., 77 U. S. App. D. C. 331, 332, 135 F. (2d) 248, 249 (1943); Allison Coupon Co. v. Bank of Commerce & Savings, 72 App. D. C. 82, 111 F. (2d) 664 (1940); Callison v. Dean, 70 F. (2d) 55, 58 (C. C. A. 10th 1934); Cleveland Automatic Mach. Co. v. National Acme Co., 52 F. (2d) 769, 770 (C. C. A. 6th 1931)) lends, I think, no support to the position of the majority and the Trade Commission. The power of a United States court to determine the validity of a patent in an infringement suit arises from the statutory right of one accused of infringement to assert as a defense the invalidity of the patent which is the predicate of the action. 35 U. S. C. § 69 (1946). The justification for this statutory right is that, as to the accused in an infringement case, the patent has been issued ex parte; he has never had a hearing in respect of its validity. But the determination by the Commissioner of Patents that a claimed invention is patentable is not ex parte as to the United States. It is the action of the United States, i. e., of the Commissioner of Patents, that is in practical effect—as said above—called into question by the Trade Commission, also an agency of the United States, in the instant proceeding.

[Cases Cited]

I am aware of the ruling in Sola Electric Co. v. Jefferson Electric Co., 317 U. S. 173 (1942), that since the price-fixing provisions of a patent license agreement are, if not within the protection of a lawfully granted patent monopoly, violations of the Sherman Act, a patent licensee sued for royalties may offer evidence of invalidity of the patents upon which the license agreement is founded, notwithstanding rules of estoppel, whether local or federal, which would otherwise forbid him, because of his license agreement,

[1] The Federal Trade Commission states the question thus: "Does the Federal Trade Commission as a matter of law lack jurisdiction to ban false and misleading advertising if the misleading representations concern a patented device and are within the scope of representations made to the Patent Office in connection with the application for the patent." [Italics supplied.]

[2] Specifically, the order of the Trade Commission requires the petitioners to cease and desist from representing that the device, or any substantially similar device, will:

1. Eliminate or reduce back pressure.
2. Save gasoline or oil.
3. Increase the power of the motor or cause it to give better performance.
4. Draw carbon, oil, or moisture from the muffler.
5. Reduce the vibration of the motor.
6. Give the motor greater acceleration or cause it to run more smoothly or more quietly.
7. Save tires.

to do so. But this ruling is of no force in the instant case because, again, the patent licensee, like the accused in an infringement case, was a private person and not a party to the issuance of the patent as was the United States herein.

Neither United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265 (1942), nor Standard Sanitary Mfg. Co. v. United States, 226 U. S. 20 (1912), which are relied upon in the majority opinion, appears to me to lend any force to the contention of the Trade Commission and the decision of the majority in the instant case. In respect of the Masonite case: The Masonite Corporation owned patents on a product known as "hardboard" and itself manufactured and sold the same. It constituted competing manufacturers of building materials its del credere "agents" for the vending of hardboard, through their respective sales organizations, at prices and under terms and conditions fixed by Masonite and to be followed by it. Masonite also agreed to issue to the "agents" at their request "a license to manufacture and sell hard boards" under its patents upon specified terms and conditions and for a cash consideration, but this option was not exercised by the "agents." The Court, treating the "agencies" for the purpose of the decision as bona fide del credere agencies, nevertheless held that the form in which the parties chose to cast the transaction was not to govern and that the "agency" arrangements in reality presented a Bloomer v. McQuewan,[3] Adams v. Burke,[4] Hobbie v. Jennison[5] pattern wherein when a patented product "'passes to the hands of the purchaser, it is no longer within the limits of the monopoly. It passes outside of it, and is no longer under the protection of the act of Congress.'" (316 U. S. at 278, quoting from Bloomer v. McQuewan, 14 How. at 549) The Court said:

> . . . Doubtless there is a proper area for utilization by a patentee of a del credere agent in the sale or disposition of the patented article. A patentee who employs such an agent to distribute his product certainly is not enlarging the scope of his patent privilege if it may fairly be said that that distribution is part of the patentee's own business and operates only to secure to him the reward for his invention which Congress has provided. But where he utilizes the sales organization of another business—a business with which he has no intimate relationship—quite different problems are posed since such a regimentation of a marketing system is peculiarly susceptible to the restraints of trade which the Sherman Act condemns. And when it is clear, as it is in this case, that the marketing systems utilized by means of the del credere agency agreements are those of competitors of the patentee, and that the purpose is to fix prices at which the competitors may market the product, the device is, without more, an enlargement of the limited patent privilege and a violation of the Sherman Act. In such a case the patentee exhausts his limited privilege when he disposes of the product to the del credere agent. He then has, so far as the Sherman Act is concerned, no greater rights to price maintenance than the owner of an unpatented commodity would have. Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Parks & Sons Co., 220 U. S. 373. [316 U. S. at 279-280.]

In the Standard Sanitary case, one Wayman, a defendant, but not himself a manufacturer, on condition of the elimination of unpatented hard enameled "seconds," secured from Standard Sanitary and other manufacturers options upon process patents for enameling iron sanitary utensils. A committee of six, including Wayman and five manufacturers' representatives, worked out, to be incorporated in license contracts, a plan for manufacturers' prices and jobbers' and dealers' resale prices. Under the plan the manufacturers were not to sell to jobbers who did not also take a license and submit to a price schedule. Royalties were a given sum per day for furnace use, but 80% was returnable as "cash bail" if a licensee abided by all of the provisions of its license. Having obtained approval of this plan by a sufficient number in the industry, Wayman exercised his options, became the owner of the patents, and issued the licenses as planned. Eighty-five per cent of the manufacturers and ninety per cent of the jobbers were parties to the arrangements. In answer to a charge that these arrangements were in violation of the Sherman Act, it was sought to justify them under Bement v. National Harrow Co., 186 U. S. 70 (1902), and upon the ground that an undue number of the (unpatented) seconds were being produced, with consequent harm to the reputation of the superior patented product and to the consumer—since the seconds were "palmed off" as not defective. The seconds were said to be "'discrediting the ware and demoralizing the market and business.'" (226 U. S. at 42.) The Court held that the licensing arrangements were illegal. Quoting from the Bement case, it recognized that the Sherman Act "'clearly does not refer to that kind of a restraint of interstate commerce which may arise from reasonable and legal conditions imposed upon the assignee or licensee of a patent by the owner thereof, restricting the terms upon which the article may be used and the price to be demanded therefor. Such a construction of the act we have no doubt was never contemplated by its framers.'" (226 U. S. at 40.) But the Court held that the Wayman license agreements "transcended what was necessary to protect the use of the patent or the monopoly which the law conferred upon it. They passed to the purpose and accomplished a restraint of trade condemned by the Sherman law. . . ." (226 U. S. at 48)

This statement of the Masonite and Standard Sanitary cases shows, I think, that they are irrelevant to the question in the instant case. They stand only for the general rule that a patentee's contractual arrangements must be limited in operation to the proper field of trade belonging to the patentee; or, otherwise stated, that the contractual arrangements may include any condition the performance of which is reasonably within the reward which the patentee by the grant of a patent is entitled to secure, but no other. Putting it still otherwise, these cases hold that if the subject matter of a contract which otherwise would be illegal because in restraint of trade is a patented article, this takes away the illegality only to the extent to which the field of trade controlled through the contract is coextensive with the field within which exclusive control has been granted by the patent law. This is well established, but it is not relevant to the question in the instant case as to the power of the Trade Commission to review collaterally the correctness of the decision of the Commissioner of Patents in respect of the utility of Vacudex as described in the petitioners' patent specification. There is no charge in the instant case that the petitioners were by contract or otherwise operating beyond the field of trade defined in the Letters Patent.

I am aware of the dictum of the Supreme Court in United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 333 U. S. 364, 386-8 (1948), to the effect that in an action brought by the United States to restrain alleged violation of the Sherman Act through patent licensing arrangements which included price-fixing provisions, the United States may attack and the court determine the validity of the patents upon which the licensing arrangements were predicated. But this has only the force of a dictum. In addition, the dictum is limited by the nature of the action and of the tribunal in which the action is brought. It warrants inquiry into the validity of patents by a United States court sitting in an equity proceeding to restrain an alleged violation of the Sherman Act through price-fixing provisions in patent license agreements. The ambit of this dictum is not so broad as to permit an indirect attack by the Trade Commission, an executive agency, upon the correctness of the action of the Commissioner of Patents in determining the utility of a claimed invention.

It is true that where a patent has been obtained by fraud imposed upon the issuing officer, or where such officer may have erred as to his power or made a mistake in the patent instrument itself, the United States may obtain cancellation of the patent in a judicial proceeding against the patentee. United States v. American Bell Telephone Co., 128 U. S. 315 (1888). But the reach of this case is not so broad as to permit collateral attack by an executive agency such as the Trade Commission upon the correctness of the action of the Commissioner of Patents. Moreover, there is no assertion in the instant case that the representations in the specification of the patent with respect to the utility of Vacudex were fraudulently made and the patent thereby fraudulently obtained, and there is no allegation that the Commissioner of Patents exceeded his power in issuing the Letters Patent or that there is a mistake in the patent instrument itself.

[Statutory Provision Upholds Invalidity as Defense in Infringement Suit]

It is to be noted that in the instances in which Congress has authorized a court to review, either collaterally or directly, the action of the Patent Office in granting or denying a patent, it has done so explicitly. Thus it has given the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals jurisdiction of appeals from decisions of the Board of Appeals and the Board of Interference Examiners of the Patent Office as to patent applications and interferences, at the instance of an applicant for a patent or any party to a patent interference. 28 U. S. C. § 1542 (1948). Again, Congress has provided that whenever a patent on application is refused by the Board of Appeals of the Patent Office, or whenever any applicant is dissatisfied with the decision of the Board of Interference Examiners, the applicant, unless appeal has been taken to the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals and such appeal is pending or has been decided, may have remedy by a bill in equity in a United States District Court. Rev. Stat. § 4915 (1878), 35 U. S. C. § 63 (1946). In the infringement cases in which the courts collaterally review the action of the Patent Office in issuing a patent, the right of the accused to set up invalidity as a defense is conferred by the statutory provision explicitly providing that the accused may plead the general issue. 35 U. S. C. § 69 (1946). See also 28 U. S. C. § 1498 (1948).

[Extent of Commission's Power Questioned]

It is to be supposed that Congress recognizes that one of the first objectives in the essentials of good government is order and certainty in relations between government and citizen, and that this cannot be secured if the government itself is not to be depended upon to abide by its grants. The grant of a patent is a formal and solemn governmental act, reciting that "Whereas upon due examination made the said Claimant is adjudged to be justly entitled to a patent under the Law. Now therefore these Letters Patent are to grant unto the said [claimant], its successors or assigns for the term of Seventeen years from the date of this grant the exclusive right to make, use and vend the said invention throughout the United States and the Territories thereof." It must be presumed, I think, that the Congress did not intend that the Government itself, through an executive agency other than the Patent Office, might attack the Government's own grant except in the instances explicitly provided for by statute as above recited. I find nothing in the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U. S. C. §§ 41 et seq. (1946), which indicates that Congress contemplated that the Trade Commission, in exercising its power to restrain dissemination of false advertising, should make a redetermination of a factual finding of the Commissioner of Patents.

It is pointed out by the majority that although the complaint of the Trade Commission attacked as false, among other advertised assertions as to the utility of Vacudex, those that Vacudex "saves mufflers" and "saves tail pipes," nevertheless in its cease and desist order, which listed the assertions of utility which the petitioners are to be restrained from making, the Trade Commission omitted the assertions "saves mufflers" and "saves tail pipes." This, it is contended, means that the Trade Commission in effect found that Vacudex "saves mufflers" and "saves tail pipes." It is then said that since the Commissioner of Patents in order properly to issue Letters Patent for the petitioners' claimed invention need not have found correct all of the assertions of utility made in the specification, it can be assumed that he issued the patent after finding to be correct the very assertions found to be correct by the Trade Commission, i. e., that Vacudex "saves mufflers" and "saves tail pipes," and that he did this without determining the correctness of the other assertions of utility in the specification. It is concluded that the Trade Commission, in passing upon other assertions of utility and finding them to be not correct, is not necessarily collaterally attacking a finding of the Commissioner of Patents.

But this argument is based upon a mere assumption as to what the Commissioner of Patents, in considering the application and issuing the Letters Patent, determined in respect of the utility of Vacudex. It is no less logical to assume that the Commissioner of Patents found correct the very assertions of utility found to be incorrect by the Trade Commission, and that the latter, therefore, is collaterally attacking the finding of the Commissioner of Patents. Either assumption is speculative. The record of the Patent Office proceeding is not before the court. Speculation is hardly a sound support for the claimed power of the Trade Commission to determine the correctness of the assertions of utility as made in the petitioners' patent specification and advertising. It is to be noted, moreover, that even if the assumption made by the majority—that the Commissioner of Patents determined and found to be correct only the assertions of utility which the Trade Commission itself found to be correct—is true, nevertheless the Trade Commission, in sustaining that finding of the Commissioner of Patents, is assuming to review it. It is the question of the power of the Trade Commission to review the action of the Commissioner of Patents that is the paramount issue in this case. For the reasons set forth above, I think the Trade Commission has no such power.

In the Supreme Court of the United States. October Term, 1948. No. 279. June 13, 1949. As amended October 10, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Petroleum Products Industry—Exclusive Supply Contracts—Substantial Lessening of Competition.—A decree enjoining an oil company and its wholly owned subsidiary from enforcing or entering into exclusive supply contracts with independent dealers in petroleum products and automobile accessories was affirmed by a majority opinion of the Supreme Court. It held that observance of requirements contracts by operators of independent service stations whose retail sales amounted to $58,000,000, comprising 6.7 per cent of the total in the area, precluded access by possible competing suppliers to a substantial portion of the market. The use of the contract was held to create just such a potential clog on competition as it was the purpose of Section 3 of the Clayton Act to remove, wherever were it to become actual, it would impede a substantial amount of competitive activity. No ruling was made as to the validity of the agreements under Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

A dissenting justice held that the requirements contracts, on the facts of the case, were relatively innocuous as compared with an agency system or outright acquisition of filling stations as suggested by the Court. Three judges in their minority opinion held that the Government failed to show that the actual or probable effect of the requirement contracts was to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Nature of Appeal]

This is an appeal to review a decree enjoining the Standard Oil Company of California and its wholly-owned subsidiary, Standard Stations, Inc.,[1] from enforcing or entering exclusive supply contracts with any independent dealer in petroleum products and automobile accessories. The use of such contracts was successfully assailed by the United States as violative of § 1 of the Sherman Act[2] and § 3 of the Clayton Act.[3]

[Facts of Case]

The Standard Oil Company of California, a Delaware corporation, owns petroleum-producing resources and refining plants in California and sells petroleum products in what has been termed in these proceedings the "Western area"—Arizona, California, Idaho, Nevada, Oregon, Utah and Washington. It sells through its own service stations, to the operators of independent service stations, and to industrial users. It is the largest seller of gasoline in the area. In 1946 its combined sales amounted to 23% of the total taxable gallonage sold there in that

[1] Standard Stations, Inc., has no independent status in these proceedings; since 1944 its activities have been confined to managing service stations owned by the Standard Oil Co. of California.

[2] "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal: . . . ." 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 50 Stat. 693, 15 U. S. C. § 1.

[3] "It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon, such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller, where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." 38 Stat. 731, 15 U. S. C. § 14.

year: sales by company-owned service stations constituted 6.8% of the total, sales under exclusive dealing contracts with independent service stations, 6.7% of the total; the remainder were sales to industrial users. Retail service-station sales by Standard's six leading competitors absorbed 42.5% of the total taxable gallonage; the remaining retail sales were divided between more than seventy small companies. It is undisputed that Standard's major competitors employ similar exclusive dealing arrangements. In 1948 only 1.6% of retail outlets were what is known as "split-pump" stations, that is, sold the gasoline of more than one supplier.

Exclusive supply contracts with Standard had been entered, as of March 12, 1947, by the operators of 5,937 independent stations, or 16% of the retail gasoline outlets in the Western area, which purchased from Standard in 1947 $57,646,233 worth of gasoline and $8,200,089.21 worth of other products. Some outlets are covered by more than one contract so that in all about 8,000 exclusive supply contracts are here in issue. These are of several types, but a feature common to each is the dealer's undertaking to purchase from Standard all his requirements of one or more products. Two types, covering 2,777 outlets, bind the dealer to purchase of Standard all his requirements of gasoline and other petroleum products as well as tires, tubes, and batteries. The remaining written agreements, 4,368 in number, bind the dealer to purchase of Standard all his requirements of petroleum products only. It was also found that independent dealers had entered 742 oral contracts by which they agreed to sell only Standard's gasoline. In some instances dealers who contracted to purchase from Standard all their requirements of tires, tubes, and batteries, had also orally agreed to purchase of Standard their requirements of other automobile accessories. Of the written agreements, 2,712 were for varying specified terms; the rest were effective from year to year but terminable "at the end of the first 6 months of any contract year, or at the end of any such year, by giving to the other at least 30 days prior thereto written notice. . . ." Before 1934 Standard's sales of petroleum products through independent service stations were made pursuant to agency agreements, but in that year Standard adopted the first of its several requirements-purchase contract forms, and by 1938 requirements contracts had wholly superseded the agency method of distribution.

Between 1936 and 1946 Standard's sales of gasoline through independent dealers remained at a practically constant proportion of the area's total sales; its sales of lubricating oil declined slightly during that period from 6.2% to 5% of the total. Its proportionate sales of tires and batteries for 1946 were slightly higher than they were in 1936, though somewhat lower than for some intervening years; they have never, as to either of these products, exceeded 2% of the total sales in the Western area.

[Qualifying Clause in Section 3 of Clayton Act]

Since § 3 of the Clayton Act was directed to prohibiting specific practices even though not covered by the broad terms of the Sherman Act,[4] it is appropriate to consider first whether the enjoined contracts fall within the prohibition of the narrower Act. The relevant provisions of § 3 are:

> "It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption, or resale within the United States . . . on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods . . . of a competitor or competitors of the . . . seller, where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce."

Obviously the contracts here at issue would be proscribed if § 3 stopped short of the qualifying clause beginning, "where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale . . . ." If effect is to be given that clause, however, it is by no means obvious, in view of Standard's minority share of the "line of commerce" involved, of the fact that that share has not recently increased, and of the claims of these contracts to economic utility, that the effect of the contracts may be to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly. It is the qualifying clause, therefore, which must be construed.

[4] After the Clayton Bill, H. R. 15657, had passed the House, the Senate struck § 4, the section prohibiting tying clauses and requirements contracts, on the ground that such practices were subject to condemnation by the Federal Trade Commission under the then pending Trade Commission Bill. In support of a motion to reconsider this vote, Senator Reed of Missouri argued that the Trade Commission would be unlikely to outlaw agreements of a type held by this Court, in Henry v. A. B. Dick Co., 224 U. S. 1, not to be in violation of the Sherman Act. See 51 Cong. Rec. 14088, 14090-92. The motion was agreed to. Id. at 14223.

[Holding of District Court]

The District Court held that the requirement of showing an actual or potential lessening of competition or a tendency to establish monopoly was adequately met by proof that the contracts covered "a substantial number of outlets and a substantial amount of products, whether considered comparatively or not." Given such quantitative substantiality, the substantial lessening of competition—so the court reasoned—is an automatic result, for the very existence of such contracts denies dealers opportunity to deal in the products of competing suppliers and excludes suppliers from access to the outlets controlled by those dealers. Having adopted this standard of proof, the court excluded as immaterial testimony bearing on "the commercial merits or demerits of the present system as contrasted with a system which prevailed prior to its establishment and which would prevail if the court declared the present arrangement [invalid]." The court likewise deemed it unnecessary to make findings, on the basis of evidence that was admitted, whether the number of Standard's competitors had increased or decreased since the inauguration of the requirements-contract system, whether the number of their dealers had increased or decreased, and as to other matters which would have shed light on the comparative status of Standard and its competitors before and after the adoption of that system. The court concluded:

"Grant that, on a comparative basis, and in relation to the entire trade in these products in the area, the restraint is not integral. Admit also that control of distribution results in lessening of costs and that its abandonment might increase costs. . . . Concede further, that the arrangement was entered into in good faith, with the honest belief that control of distribution and consequent concentration of represenation were economically beneficial to the industry and to the public, that they have continued for over fifteen years openly, notoriously and unmolested by the Government, and have been practised by other major oil companies competing with Standard, that the number of Standard outlets so controlled may have decreased, and the quantity of products supplied to them may have declined, on a comparative basis. Nevertheless, as I read the latest cases of the Supreme Court, I am compelled to find the practises here involved to be violative of both statutes. For they affect injuriously a sizeable part of interstate commerce, or,—to use the current phrase—'an appreciable segment' of interstate commerce."

[Issue Defined]

The issue before us, therefore, is whether the requirement of showing that the effect of the agreements "may be to substantially lessen competition" may be met simply by proof that a substantial portion of commerce is affected or whether it must also be demonstrated that competitive activity has actually diminished or probably will diminish.[6]

[Decisions under Section 3 Discussed]

Since the Clayton Act became effective, this Court has passed on the applicability of § 3 in eight cases, in five of which it upheld determinations that the challenged agreement was violative of that Section. Three of these—United Shoe Machinery Corp. v. United States, 258 U. S. 451; International Business Machines Corp. v. United States, 298 U. S. 131; International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392—involved contracts tying to the use of a patented article all purchases of an unpatented product used in connection with the patented article. The other two cases—Standard Fashion Co. v. Magrane-Houston Co., 258 U. S. 346; Fashion Originators' Guild v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 312 U. S. 457—involved requirements contracts not unlike those here in issue.

[6] It is clear, of course, that the "line of commerce" affected need not be nationwide, at least where the purchasers cannot, as a practical matter, turn to suppliers outside their own area. Although the effect on competition will be quantitatively the same if a given volume of the industry's business is assumed to be covered, whether or not the affected sources of supply are those of the industry as a whole or only those of a particular region, a purely quantitative measure of this effect is inadequate because the narrower the area of competition, the greater the comparative effect on the area's competitors. Since it is the preservation of competition which is at stake, the significant proportion of coverage is that within the area of effective competition. Cf. Indiana Farmer's Guide Publishing Co. v. Prairie Farmer Publishing Co., 293 U. S. 268, 279; United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U. S. 218, 226. The criteria of substantiality deemed relevant in cases involving a nation-wide market are thus also relevant in measuring the effect of Standard's requirements contracts in the seven-state Western area.

The Standard Fashion case, the first of the five holding that the Act had been violated, settled one question of interpretation of § 3. The Court said:

> "Section 3 condemns sales or agreements where the effect of such sale or contract of sale 'may' be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create monopoly. . . . But we do not think that the purpose in using the word 'may' was to prohibit the mere possibility of the consequences described. It was intended to prevent such agreements as would under the circumstances disclosed probably lessen competition, or create an actual tendency to monopoly." 258 U. S. at 356-57. See also Federal Trade Comm'n v. Morton Salt Co., 334 U. S. 37, 46, n. 14.

The Court went on to add that the fact that the Section "was not intended to reach every remote lessening of competition is shown in the requirement that such lessening must be substantial," but because it deemed the finding of two lower courts that the contracts in question did substantially lessen competition and tend to create monopoly amply supported by evidence that the defendant controlled two-fifths of the nation's pattern agencies, it did not pause to indicate where the line between a "remote" and a "substantial" lessening should be drawn.

All but one of the later cases also regarded domination of the market as sufficient in itself to support the inference that competition had been or probably would be lessened. In the United Shoe Machinery case, referring, inter alia, to the clause incorporated in all United's leases of patented machinery requiring the use by the lessee of materials supplied by United, the Court observed:

> "That such restrictive and tying agreements must necessarily lessen competition and tend to monopoly is, we believe, . . . apparent. When it is considered that the United Company occupies a dominating position in supplying shoe machinery of the classes involved, these covenants signed by the lessee and binding upon him effectually prevent him from acquiring the machinery of a competitor of the lessor except at the risk of forfeiting the right to use the machines furnished by the United Company which may be absolutely essential to the prosecution and success of his businesss." 258 U. S. at 457-58.

In the International Business Machines case, the defendants were the sole manufacturers of a patented tabulating machine requiring the use of unpatented cards. The lessees of the machines were bound by tying clauses to use in them only the cards supplied by the defendants, who, between them, divided the whole of the $3,000,000 annual gross of this business also. The Court concluded:

> "These facts, and others, which we do not stop to enumerate, can leave no doubt that the effect of the condition in appellant's leases 'may be to substantially lessen competition,' and that it tends to create monopoly, and has in fact been an important and effective step in the creation of monopoly." 298 U. S. at 136.

The Fashion Originators' Guild case involved an association of dress manufacturers which sold more than 60% of all but the cheapest women's garments. In rejecting the relevance of evidence that the Guild's use of requirements contracts was a "reasonable and necessary" measure of protection against "the devastating evils growing from the pirating of original designs," the Court again emphasized the presence and the consequences of economic power:

> "The purpose and object of this combination, its potential power, its tendency to monopoly, the coercion it could and did practice upon a rival method of competition, all brought it within the policy of the prohibition declared by the Sherman and Clayton Acts." 312 U. S. at 467-68.

It is thus apparent that none of these cases controls the disposition of the present appeal, for Standard's share of the retail market for gasoline, even including sales through company-owned stations, is hardly large enough to conclude as a matter of law that it occupies a dominant position, nor did the trial court so find. The cases do indicate, however, that some sort of showing as to the actual or probable economic consequences of the agreements, if only the inferences to be drawn from the fact of dominant power, is important, and to that extent they tend to support appellant's position.

Two of the three cases decided by this Court which have held § 3 inapplicable also lend support to the view that such a showing is necessary. These are, Federal Trade Comm'n v. Sinclair Co., 261 U. S. 463, and Pick Mfg. Co. v. General Motors Corp., 299 U. S. 3. The third—Federal Trade Comm'n v. Curtis Pub. Co., 260 U. S. 568—went off on the ground that the contract involved was one of agency and so is of no present relevance. The Sinclair case involved the lease of gasoline pumps and storage tanks on condition that the dealer would use them only for Sinclair's gasoline, but Sinclair did not own patents on the pumps or tanks and evidently did not otherwise control their supply. Although the Trade Commission had found that few dealers needed more than one pump, the Court concluded that "the record does not show that the probable effect of the practise will be unduly to lessen competition." 261 U. S. at 475. The basis of this conclusion was thus summarized:

> "Many competitors seek to sell excellent brands of gasoline, and no one of them is essential to the retail business. The lessee is free to buy wherever he chooses; he may freely accept and use as many pumps as he wishes, and may discontinue any or all of them. He may carry on business as his judgment dictates and his means permit, save only that he cannot use the lessor's equipment for dispensing another's brand. By investing a comparatively small sum, he can buy an outfit and use it without hindrance. He can have respondent's gasoline, with the pump or without the pump, and many competitors seek to supply his needs." Id. at 474.

The present case differs of course in the fact that a dealer who has entered a requirements contract with Standard cannot consistently with that contract sell the petroleum products of a competitor of Standard's no matter how many pumps he has,[6] but the case is significant for the importance it attaches, in the absence of a showing that the supplier dominated the market, to the practical effect of the contracts. The same is true of the Pick case, in which this Court affirmed in a brief per curiam opinion the finding of the District Court, concurred in by the Court of Appeals, that the effect of contracts by which dealers agreed not to sell other automobile parts than those manufactured by General Motors "had not been in any way substantially to lessen competition or to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." 299 U. S. at 4.

But then came International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392. That decision, at least as to contracts tying the sale of a nonpatented to a patented product, rejected the necessity of demonstrating economic consequences once it has been established that "the volume of business affected" is not "insignificant or insubstantial" and that the effect of the contracts is to "foreclose competitors from [a] substantial market." Id. at 396. Upon that basis we affirmed a summary judgment granting an injunction against the leasing of machines for the utilization of salt products on the condition that the lessee use in them only salt supplied by defendant. It was established by pleadings or admissions that defendant was the country's largest producer of salt for industrial purposes, that it owned patents on the leased machines, that about 900 leases were outstanding, and that in 1944 defendant sold about $500,000 worth of salt for use in these machines. It was not established that equivalent machines were unobtainable, it was not indicated what proportion of the business of supplying such machines was controlled by defendant, and it was deemed irrelevant that there was no evidence as to the actual effect of the tying clauses upon competition.[7] It is clear, therefore, that unless a distinction is to be drawn for purposes of the applicability of § 3 between requirements contracts and contracts tying the sale of a nonpatented to a patented product, the showing that Standard's requirements contracts affected a gross business of $58,000,000 comprising 6.7% of the total in the area goes far toward supporting the inference that competition has been or probably will be substantially lessened.[8]

[6] Standard urges that the effect of its contracts is similarly confined in view of the fact that they apply not to all sales by a dealer but only to those made through a designated service station. Putting aside the fact that it does not appear that dealers commonly own more than one service station, there is marked difference between a contract which confines an entire retail outlet to the sale of a single brand and a contract which merely confines the use of a dispensing mechanism to a single brand: service-station sites, and therefore retail outlets, are limited in number; the number of pumps which a dealer may choose to set up is not, or so, at least, the Court assumed in the Sinclair case. It is reasonable to assume, therefore, that competition between suppliers is directed rather toward exclusive contracts with the maximum number of strategically located outlets than toward exclusive arrangements with dealers as such.

[7] The Court considered and found inadequate defendant's attempt to establish that the successful use of the machines depended upon a quality of salt which only it could supply, but the Court's willingness to consider such evidence does not weaken the holding that coverage of a more than insignificant volume of business by such tying clauses is an adequate basis for finding a lessening of competition or a tendency to monopoly.

In favor of confining the standard laid down by the International Salt case to tying agreements, important economic differences may be noted. Tying agreements serve hardly any purpose beyond the suppression of competition. The justification most often advanced in their defense—the protection of the good will of the manufacturer of the tying device—fails in the usual situation because specification of the type and quality of the product to be used in connection with the tying device is protection enough. If the manufacturer's brand of the tied product is in fact superior to that of competitors, the buyer will presumably choose it anyway. The only situation, indeed, in which the protection of good will may necessitate the use of tying clauses is where specifications for a substitute would be so detailed that they could not practicably be supplied. In the usual case only the prospect of reducing competition would persuade a seller to adopt such a contract and only his control of the supply of the tying device, whether conferred by patent monopoly or otherwise obtained, could induce a buyer to enter one. See Miller, Unfair Competition 199 et seq. (1941); Note, 49 Col. L. Rev. 241, 246 (1949). The existence of market control of the tying device, therefore, affords a strong foundation for the presumption that it has been or probably will be used to limit competition in the tied product also.

[Economic Advantage of Requirements Contracts]

Requirements contracts, on the other hand, may well be of economic advantage to buyers as well as to sellers, and thus indirectly of advantage to the consuming public. In the case of the buyer, they may assure supply, afford protection against rises in price, enable long-term planning on the basis of known costs,[9] and obviate the expense and risk of storage in the quantity necessary for a commodity having a fluctuating demand. From the seller's point of view, requirements contracts may make possible the substantial reduction of selling expenses, give protection against price fluctuations, and—of particular advantage to a newcomer to the field to whom it is important to know what capital expenditures are justified—offer the possibility of a predictable market. See Stockhausen, The Commercial and Anti-Trust Aspects of Term Requirements Contracts, 23 N. Y. U. L. Q. Rev. 412, 413-14 (1948). They may be useful, moreover, to a seller trying to establish a foothold against the counterattacks of entrenched competitors. See id. at 424 et seq.; Excelsior Motor Mfg. & Supply Co. v. Sound Equipment, Inc., 73 F. 2d 725, 728 (C. A. 7th Cir.); General Talking Pictures Corp. v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 18 F. Supp. 650, 666 (D. Del.).[10] Since these advantages of requirements contracts may often be sufficient to account for their use, the coverage by such contracts of a substantial amount of business affords a weaker basis for the inference that competition may be lessened than would similar coverage by tying clauses, especially where use of the latter is combined with market control of the tying device. A patent, moreover, although in fact there may be many competing substitutes for the patented article, is at least prima facie evidence of such control. And so we could not dispose of this case merely by citing International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392.

Thus, even though the qualifying clause of § 3 is appended without distinction of terms equally to the prohibition of tying clauses and of requirements contracts, pertinent considerations support, certainly as a matter of economic reasoning, varying standards as to each for the proof necessary to fulfill the conditions of that clause. If this distinction were accepted, various tests of the economic usefulness or restrictive effect of requirements contracts would become relevant. Among them would be evidence that competition has flourished despite use of the contracts, and under this test much of the evidence tendered by appellant in this case would be important. See, as examples of the consideration of such evidence, B. S. Pearsall Butter Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 292 F. 720 (C. A. 7th Cir.); Pick Mfg. Co. v. General Motors Corp., 80 F. 2d 641, 644 (C. A. 7th Cir.), aff'd 299 U. S. 3. Likewise bearing on whether or not the contracts were being used to suppress competition, would be the conformity of the length of their term to the reasonable requirements of the field of commerce in which they were used. See Corn Products Refining Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 144 F. 2d 211, 220 (C. A. 7th Cir.), aff'd, 324 U. S. 726; United States v. Pullman Co., 50 F. Supp. 123, 127-29 (E. D. Pa.). Still another test would be the status of the defendant as a struggling newcomer or an established competitor. Perhaps most important, however, would be the defendant's degree of market control, for the greater the dominance of his position, the stronger the inference that an important factor in attaining and maintaining that position has been the use of requirements contracts to stifle competition rather than to serve legitimate economic needs. See Standard Fashion Co. v. Magrane-Houston Co., supra, 258 U. S. 346; Fashion Originators' Guild v. Federal Trade Comm'n, supra, 312 U. S. 457.[11]

[8] It may be noted in passing that the exclusive supply provisions for tires, tubes, batteries, and other accessories which are a part of some of Standard's contracts with dealers who have also agreed to purchase their requirements of petroleum products should perhaps be considered, as a matter of classification, tying rather than requirements agreements.

[9] This advantage is not conferred by Standard's contracts, each of which provides that the price to be paid by the dealer is to be the "Company's posted price to its dealers generally at time and place of delivery."

[10] Some members of the House opposed § 4 of H. R. 15657 (the equivalent of what is now § 3) as denying this benefit to the newcomer, see 51 Cong. Rec. 9267, and Representative McCoy of New Jersey offered an amendment, id. at 9398, to make the agreements in question illegal only when entered "with the intent of obtaining or establishing a monopoly or of destroying the business of a competitor," which he and others supported on this ground. See id. at 9400-02, 9409. The amendment was rejected. Id. at 9410.

[Difficulties in Applying Economic Tests]

Yet serious difficulties would attend the attempt to apply these tests. We may assume, as did the court below, that no improvement of Standard's competitive position has coincided with the period during which the requirments-contract system of distribution has been in effect. We may assume further that the duration of the contracts is not excessive and that Standard does not by itself dominate the market. But Standard was a major competitor when the present system was adopted, and it is possible that its position would have deteriorated but for the adoption of that system. When it is remembered that all the other major suppliers have also been using requirements contracts, and when it is noted that the relative share of the business which fell to each has remained about the same during the period of their use,[12] it would not be far-fetched to infer that their effect has been to enable the established suppliers individually to maintain their own standing and at the same time collectively, even though not collusively, to prevent a late arrival from wresting away more than an insignificant portion of the market. If, indeed, this were a result of the system, it would seem unimportant that a short-run by-product of stability may have been greater efficiency and lower costs, for it is the theory of the antitrust laws that the long-run advantage of the community depends upon the removal of restraints upon competition. See Fashion Originators' Guild v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 312 U. S. 457, 467-68; United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416, 427-29 (C. A. 2d Cir.).

Moreover, to demand that bare inference be supported by evidence as to what would have happened but for the adoption of the practice that was in fact adopted or to require firm prediction of an increase of competition as a probable result of ordering the abandonment of the practice, would be a standard of proof if not virtually impossible to meet, at least most ill-suited for ascertainment by courts.[13] Before the system of requirements contracts was instituted, Standard sold gasoline through independent service-station operators as its agents, and it might revert to this system if the judgment below were sustained. Or it might, as opportunity presented itself, add service stations now operated independently to the number managed by its subsidiary, Standard Stations, Inc. From the point of view of maintaining or extending competitive advantage, either of these alternatives would be just as effective as the use of requirements contracts, although of course insofar as they resulted in a tendency to monopoly they might encounter the anti-monopoly provisions of the Sherman Act. See United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416 (C. A. 2d Cir.). As appellant points out, dealers might order petroleum products in quantities sufficient to meet their estimated needs for the period during which requirements contracts are now effective, and even that would foreclose competition to some degree. So long as these diverse ways of restricting competition remain open, therefore, there can be no conclusive proof that the use of requirements contracts has actually reduced competition below the level which it would otherwise have reached or maintained.

[11] For an exposition of the considerations here summarized, see Stockhausen, The Commercial and Anti-Trust Aspects of Term and Requirements Contracts, 23 N. Y. U. L. Q. Rev. 412, 417-31 (1948).

[12] Upon the request of Standard, its six largest competitors filled out questionnaires showing the number of retail dealers who distributed their products during the years 1937 through 1946. Though their position relative to each other has fluctuated, the figures show that as a group they have maintained or improved their control of the market. Together with Standard, these six companies distributed, as of 1946, through 26,439 of approximately 35,000 independent service stations in the Western area.

[13] The dual system of enforcement provided for by the Clayton Act must have contemplated standards of proof capable of administration by the courts as well as by the Federal Trade Commission and other designated agencies. See 38 Stat. 734, 736, as amended, 15 U. S. C. §§ 21, 25. Our interpretation of the Act, therefore, should recognize that an appraisal of economic data which might be practicable if only the latter were faced with the task may be quite otherwise for judges unequipped for it either by experience or by the availability of skilled assistance.

[Proof that Competition Has Actually Diminished Unnecessary]

We are dealing here with a particular form of agreement specified by § 3 and not with different arrangements, by way of integration or otherwise, that may tend to lessen competition. To interpret that section as requiring proof that competition has actually diminished would make its very explicitness a means of conferring immunity upon the practices which it singles out. Congress has authoritatively determined that those practices are detrimental when their effect may be to lessen competition. It has not left at large for determination in each case the ultimate demands of the "public interest," as the English lawmakers, considering and finding inapplicable to their own situation our experience with the specific prohibition of trade practices legislatively determined to be undesirable, have recently chosen to do.[14] Though it may be that such an alternative to the present system as buying out independent dealers and making them dependent employees of Standard Stations, Inc., would be a greater detriment to the public interest than perpetuation of the system, this is an issue, like the choice between greater efficiency and freer competition, that has not been submitted to our decision. We are faced, not with a broadly phrased expression of general policy, but merely a broadly phrased qualification of an otherwise narrowly directed statutory provision.

[Qualifying Clause of Section 3 Interpreted]

In this connection it is significant that the qualifying language was not added until after the House and Senate bills reached conference. The conferees responsible for adding that language were at pains, in answering protestations that the qualifying clause seriously weakened the Section, to disclaim any intention seriously to augment the burden of proof to be sustained in establishing violation of it.[15] It seems hardly likely that, having with one hand set up an [14] The Monopolies and Restrictive Practices (Inquiry and Control) Act, 1948, adopted July 30, 1948, provides, as one mode of procedure, for reference of restrictive trade practices by the Board of Trade to a permanent Commission for investigation in order to determine "whether any such things as are specified in the reference . . . operate or may be expected to operate against the public interest." 11 & 12 Geo. VI, c. 66, § 6 (2). The Act does not define what is meant by "the public interest," although in § 14 it sets up broad criteria to be taken into account. It is noteworthy, however, that, having established so broad a basis for investigation, the Act entrusts the task to an expert body without provision for judicial review. This approach was repeatedly contrasted in debate with that of the United States. See 449 H. C. Deb. 2046-47, 2058, 2063 (5th ser. 1948); 157 H. L. Deb. 350 (5th ser. 1948). Compare § 5 (2) of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, 41 Stat. 480, 49 U. S. C. § 5 (2), referring to the Interstate Commerce Commission determination of the more defined issues of "public interest" under review in New York Central Securities Corp. v. United States, 287 U. S. 12, 24; United States v. Lowden, 308 U. S. 225.

[15] Representative Floyd of Arkansas, one of the managers on the part of the House, explained the use of the word "substantially" as deriving from the opinion of this Court in Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, and quoted the passage from id. at 229 in which it is said that "the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce comprises the right to enact a law prohibiting a citizen from entering into these private contracts which directly and substantially, and not merely indirectly, remotely, incidentally and collaterally, regulate to a greater or less degree commerce among the States." 51 Cong. Rec. 16317-18. Senator Chilton, one of the managers on the part of the Senate, denying that the clause express prohibition against a practice thought to be beyond the reach of the Sherman Act, Congress meant, with the other hand, to reestablish the necessity of meeting the same tests of detriment to the public interest as that Act had been interpreted as requiring.[16] Yet the economic investigation which appellant would have us require is of the same broad scope as was adumbrated with reference to unreasonable restraints of trade in Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, 246 U. S. 231.[17] To insist upon such an investigation would be to stultify the force of Congress' declaration that requirements contracts are to be prohibited wherever their effect "may be" to substantially lessen competition. If in fact it is economically desirable for service stations to confine themselves to the sale of the petroleum products of a single supplier, they will continue to do so though not bound by contract, and if in fact it is important to retail dealers to assure the supply of their requirements by obtaining the commitment of a single supplier to fulfill them, competition for their patronage should enable them to insist upon such an arrangement without binding them to refrain from looking elsewhere.

We conclude, therefore, that the qualifying clause of § 3 is satisfied by proof that competition has been foreclosed in a substantial share of the line of commerce affected. It cannot be gainsaid that observance by a dealer of his requirements contract with Standard does effectively foreclose whatever opportunity there might be for competing suppliers to attract his patronage, and it is clear that the affected proportion of retail sales of petroleum products is substantial. In view of the widespread adoption of such contracts by Standard's competitors and the availability of alternative ways of obtaining an assured market, evidence that competitive activity has not actually declined is inconclusive. Standard's use of the contracts creates just such a potential clog on competition as it was the purpose of § 3 to remove wherever, were it to become actual, it would impede a substantial amount of competitive activity.

[Sherman Act Not Considered]

Since the decree below is sustained by our interpretation of § 3 of the Clayton Act, we need not go on to consider whether it might also be sustained by § 1 of the Sherman Act.

[Effect on Interstate Commerce]

One last point remains to be disposed of. Appellant contends that its requirements contracts with California dealers, because nearly all the products sold to them are produced in California, do not substantially affect interstate commerce and therefore should have been exempted from the decree. It finds support for this contention in Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 247. But the effect of appellant's requirements contracts with California retail dealers is to prevent them from dealing with suppliers from outside the State as well as within the State and is thus to lessen competition in both interstate and intrastate commerce. Appellant has not suggested that if these dealers were not bound by their contracts with it that they would continue to purchase only products originating within the State. The Addyston case, on the other weakened the bill, stated that the words "where the effect may be" mean "where it is possible for the effect to be." Id. at 16002. Senator Overman, also a Senate conferee, argued that even the elimination of competition in a single town would substantially lessen competition. Id. at 15935.

[16] See United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, 179: "Applying the rule of reason to the construction of the statute, it was held in the Standard Oil case that as the words 'restraint of trade' at common law and in the law of this country at the time of the adoption of the Anti-trust Act only embraced acts or contracts or agreements or combinations which operated to the prejudice of the public interests by unduly restricting competition or unduly obstructing the due course of trade or which, either because of their inherent nature or effect or because of the evident purpose of the acts, etc., injuriously restrained trade, that the words as used in the statute were designed to have and did have but a like significance." See also Handler, A Study of the Construction and Enforcement of the Federal Anti-trust Laws 3-9 (T. N. E. C. Monograph No. 38, 1941). Compare § 4 of the Australian Industries Preservation Act, 1906, which forbids combinations entered "with intent to restrain trade or commerce to the detriment of the public," construed in Attorney General v. Adelaide S. S. Co., [1913] A. C. 781, as requiring proof of actual economic detriment.

[17] "The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine that question the court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint was imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts." 246 U. S. at 238.

hand, dealt not with the diminution of competition between suppliers brought about by the action of one at the expense of the rest, whether within or without the State, but a combination among them to restrain competition. Modification of the decree was required only to make clear that it did not reach a combination among the defendants doing business in a single State which was confined to transactions taking place within that same State.

[Judgment Affirmed]

The judgment below is Affirmed.

[Dissenting Opinions]

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS: The economic theories which the Court has read into the Anti-Trust Laws have favored rather than discouraged monopoly. As a result of the big business philosophy underlying United States v. United Shoe Machinery Co., 247 U. S. 32; United States v. United States Steel Corp., 251 U. S. 417; United States v. International Harvester Co., 274 U. S. 693, big business has become bigger and bigger. Monopoly has flourished. Cartels have increased their hold on the nation. The trusts wax strong.[1] There is less and less place for the independent.

The full force of the Anti-Trust Laws has not been felt on our economy. It has been deflected. Niggardly interpretations have robbed those laws of much of their efficacy. There are exceptions. Price fixing is illegal per se.[2] The use of patents to obtain monopolies on unpatented articles is condemned.[3] Monopoly that has been built as a result of unlawful tactics, e. g., through practices that are restraints of trade, is broken up.[4]

The merger and acquisition movement, which has been evident since the turn of the century and which contributed to the spiraling concentration of corporate wealth into the hands of the few, has not ended. We are presently in the midst of a similar movement. See the Federal Trade Commission report, The Present Trend of Corporate Mergers and Acquisitions, Sen. Doc. No. 17, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. (1947), p. 6, where it is shown that "the increase in the merger movement following V-J day parallels very closely the sharp upward movement which took place at the end of World War I." The causes which have recently contributed to the growing bigness of big corporations are varied. See Lynch, The Concentration of Economic Power (1946), pp. 3-4 where it is said:

"Even before the entrance of the United States into the war the placing of defense contracts served to augment the growth of bigness in industry and to intensify the struggle for survival by small concerns. By 1941 the pattern of defense contracts which, with modifications, was to remain for the duration of the war had been established. It is reported that in that year fifty-six firms, less than one-half of 1 percent of the manufacturing establishments of the country, were awarded 75 percent of all the contracts. Concentration was even more marked within this group, however, inasmuch as six corporations held 31 percent of the total. Between June, 1940, and March, 1943, more than 100 million dollars worth of prime war-supply contracts were awarded. Seventy percent of these were held by the leading 100 corporations; 10 corporations held 32 percent, and the leading 50 held 60 percent.

"Studies by the United States Department of Commerce during 1943-1944 throw additional light on this trend toward industrial concentration. After Pearl Harbor the total number of firms in business declined precipitously. Despite the wartime industrial boom, the number of firms which discontinued operations was greater than that replaced by new entries; it is estimated that the number in business in 1943 was nearly 17 percent less than in 1941. There are numerous indications that the relative importance of small business has declined during the war period and that the dominance of big business has become more marked. Between 1938 and 1942 it appears that the total number of workers employed by 95 percent of the nation's corporations (the smallest) declined 23 percent, whereas those employed by 5 percent of the corporations (the largest) increased 22 percent. A related study indicates that between January 1, 1941, and January 1, 1943, business firms employing fewer than 125 workers each experienced an increase in employment of 1 percent and an increase in the value of their products (attributable principally to price increases) of 16 percent; during the same period, however, the increase in employment by the large establishments employing more than 125 workers was 62 percent and the increase in the value of the product, 96 percent."

Those cases have largely expended the force of Hartford Empire Co. v. United States, 323 U. S. 386—an indefensible decision whereby the Court allowed those who had built one of the tightest monopolies in American history largely

But when it comes to monopolies built in gentlemanly ways—by mergers, purchases of assets or control and the like—the teeth have largely been drawn from the Act.

We announced that the existence of monoply power, coupled with the purpose or intent to monopolize, was unlawful.[5] But to date that principle has not shown bright promise in application.[6] Under the guise of increased efficiency big business has received approval for easy growth. United States v. Columbia Steel Co., 334 U. S. 495, represents the current attitude of the Court on this problem. In that case United States Steel—the giant of the industry—was allowed to fasten its tentacles tighter on the economy by acquiring the assets of a steel company in the Far West where competition was beginning to develop.

The increased concentration of industrial power in the hands of a few has changed habits of thought. A new age has been introduced. It is more and more an age of "monopoly competition." Monopoly competition is a regime of friendly alliances, of quick and easy accommodation of prices even without the benefit of trade associations, of what Brandeis said was euphemistically called "cooperation."[7] While this is not true in all fields, it has become alarmingly apparent in many.

The lessons Brandeis taught on the curse of bigness have largely been forgotten in high places. Size is allowed to become a menace to existing and putative competitors. Price control is allowed to escape the influences of the competitive market and to gravitate into the hands of the few. But beyond all that there is the effect on the community when independents are swallowed up by the trusts and entrepreneurs become employees of absentee owners. Then there is a serious loss in citizenship. Local leadership is diluted. He who was a leader in the village becomes dependent on outsiders for his action and policy. Clerks responsible to a superior in a distant place take the place of resident proprietors beholden to no one. These are the prices which the nation pays for the almost ceaseless growth in bigness on the part of industry.

These problems may not appear on the surface to have relationship to the case before us. But they go to the very heart of the problem.

It is common knowledge that a host of filling stations in the country are locally owned and operated. Others are owned and operated by the big oil companies. This case involves directly only the former. It pertains to requirements contracts that the oil companies make with these independents. It is plain that a filling station owner who is tied to an oil company for his supply of products is not an available customer for the products of other suppliers. The same is true of a filling station owner who purchases his inventory a year in advance. His demand is withdrawn from the market for the duration of the contract in the one case and for a year in the other. The result in each case is to lessen competition if the standard is day-to-day purchases. Whether it is a substantial lessening of competition within the meaning of the Anti-Trust Laws is a question of degree and may vary from industry to industry.

The Court answers the question for the oil industry by a formula which under our decisions promises to wipe out large segments of independent filling station operators. The method of doing business under requirements contracts at least keeps the independents alive. They survive as small business units. The situation is not ideal from either their point of view[8] or that of the nation. But the alternative which the Court offers is far worse from the point of view of both.

The elimination of these requirements contracts sets the stage for Standard and to retain their ill-gotten gains and continue their hold on the economy. The philosophy of that decision can be summed up in the words Brandeis used to describe the decree effecting a so-called dissolution of the American Tobacco Co. He said that its defenders "appear to have discovered in the Constitution a new implied prohibition: 'What man has illegally joined together, let no court put asunder.'" The Curse of Bigness (1935) p. 103.

[6] It should be noted in this connection that a majority of the Court could not be obtained for holding illegal per se the vertical integration in the motion picture industry. See United States v. Paramount Pictures, supra, pp. 173-174.

the other oil companies to build service-station empires of their own. The opinion of the Court does more than set the stage for that development. It is an advisory opinion as well, stating to the oil companies how they can with impunity build their empires. The formula suggested by the Court is either the use of the "agency" device, which in practical effect means control of filling stations by the oil companies (cf. Federal Trade Commission v. Curtis Co., 260 U. S. 568), or the outright acquisition of them by subsidiary corporations or otherwise. See United States v. Columbia Steel Co., supra. Under the approved judicial doctrine either of those devices means increasing the monopoly of the oil companies over the retail field.

When the choice is thus given, I dissent from the outlawry of the requirements contract on the present facts. The effect which it has on competition in this field is minor as compared to the damage which will flow from the judicially approved formula for the growth of bigness tendered by the Court as an alternative. Our choice must be made on the basis not of abstractions but of the realities of modern industrial life.

Today there is vigorous competition between the oil companies for the market. That competition has left some room for the survival of the independents. But when this inducement for their survival is taken away, we can expect that the oil companies will move in to supplant them with their own stations. There will still be competition between the oil companies. But there will be a tragic loss to the nation. The small, independent business man will be supplanted by clerks. Competition between suppliers of accessories (which is involved in this case) will diminish or cease altogether. The oil companies will command an increasingly larger share of both the wholesale and the retail markets.

That is the likely result of today's decision. The requirements contract which is displaced is relatively innocuous as compared with the virulent growth of monopoly power which the Court encourages. The Court does not act unwittingly. It consciously pushes the oil industry in that direction. The Court approves what the Anti-Trust Laws were designed to prevent. It helps remake America in the image of the cartels.

Mr. Justice Jackson, with whom The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Burton join, dissenting: I am unable to join the judgment or opinion of the Court for reasons I will state, but shortly.

Section 3 of the Clayton Act does not make any lease, sale, or contract unlawful unless "the effect of such lease, sale or contract for sale or such condition, agreement or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." 38 Stat. 730, 731, 15 U. S. C. § 14. It is indispensable to the Government's case to establish that either the actual or the probable effect of the accused arrangement is to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly.

I am unable to agree that this requirement was met. To be sure, the contracts cover "a substantial number of outlets and a substantial amount of products, whether considered comparatively or not." But that fact does not automatically bring the accused arrangement within the prohibitions of the statute. The number of dealers and the volume of sales covered by the arrangement of course was sufficient to be substantial. That is to say, this arrangement operated on enough commerce to violate the Act, provided its effects were substantially to lessen competition or create a monopoly. But proof of their quantity does not prove that they had this forbidden quality and the assumption that they did, without proof, seems to me unwarranted.

Moreover, the trial court not only made the assumption but he did not allow the defendant affirmatively to show that such effects do not flow from this arrangement. Such evidence on the subject as was admitted was not considered in reaching the decision that these contracts are illegal.

I regard it as unfortunate that the Clayton Act submits such economic issues to judicial determination. It not only leaves the law vague as a warning or guide, and determined only after the event, but the judicial process is not well adapted to exploration of such industry-wide, and even nation-wide, questions.

But if they must decide, the only possible way for the courts to arrive at a fair determination is to hear all relevant evidence from both parties and weigh not only its inherent probabilities of verity but also compare the experience, disinterestedness and credibility of opposing witnesses. This is a tedious process and not too enlightening, but without it a judicial decree is but a guess in the dark. That is all we have here and I do not think it is an adequate basis on which to upset long-standing and widely practiced business arrangements.

I should therefore vacate this decree and direct the court below to complete the case by hearing and weighing the Government's evidence and that of defendant as to the effects of this device.

However, if the Court refuses to do that, I cannot agree that the requirements contract is per se an illegal one under the antitrust law, and that is the substance of what the Court seems to hold. I am not convinced that the requirements contract as here used is a device for suppressing competition instead of a device for waging competition. If we look only at its effect in relation to particular retailers who become parties to it, it does restrain their freedom to purchase their requirements elsewhere and prevents other companies from selling to them. Many contracts have the effect of taking a purchaser out of the market for goods he already has bought or contracted to take. But the retailer in this industry is only a conduit from the oil fields to the driver's tank, a means by which the oil companies compete to get the business of the ultimate consumer—the man in whose automobile the gas is used. It means to me, if I must decide without evidence, that these contracts are an almost necessary means to maintain this all-important competition for consumer business, in which it is admitted competition is keen. The retail stations, whether independent or company-owned, are the instrumentalities through which competition for this ultimate market is waged.

It does not seem to me inherently to lessen this real competition when an oil company tries to establish superior service by providing the consumer with a responsible dealer from which the public can purchase adequate and timely supplies of oil, gasoline and car accessories of some known and reliable standard of quality. No retailer, whether agent or independent, can long remain in business if he does not always, and not just intermittently, have gas to sell. Retailers' storage capacity usually is limited and they are in no position to accumulate large stocks. They can take gas only when and as they can sell it. The Government can hardly force someone to contract to stand by, ever ready to fill fluctuating demands of dealers who will not in turn undertake to buy from that supplier all their requirements. And it is important to the driving public to be able to rely on retailers to have gas to retail. It is equally important that the wholesaler have some incentive to carry the stocks and have the transport facilities to make the irregular deliveries caused by varied consumer demands.

It may be that the Government, if required to do so, could prove that this is a bad system and an illegal one. It may be that the defendant, if permitted to do so, can prove that it is, in its overall aspects, a good system and within the law. But on the present record the Government has not made a case.[1]

If the courts are to apply the lash of the antitrust laws to the backs of businessmen to make them compete, we cannot in fairness also apply the lash whenever they hit upon a successful method of competing. That, insofar as I am permitted by the record to learn the facts, appears to be the case before us. I would reverse.

[1] The Government can derive no comfort for this sort of thing from International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392. There the defendant started with a patent monopoly of the machine for utilization of its product. The customers, canners, were in effect the ultimate consumers of salt as such. But they could get the advantages of the invention only if they tied themselves to use no other salt therein.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Organized Baseball—Failure To Establish Jurisdiction—Television and Radio Allegation.—The Court refused to reverse a discretionary order which denied two baseball players' motion to restrain a baseball commissioner and league clubs from continuing them on a list of suspended and ineligible players. Since the extent of radio broadcasting and television in the baseball business did not appear in the record the Court held that the bare allegation did not support the jurisdiction of the Court. No ruling was made as to whether the "reserve clause" violated the Antitrust Acts.

[Review of Facts]

L. HAND, Circuit Judge: This is an appeal from an order denying an injunction, pendente lite, in an action under the Anti-Trust Acts to restore the plaintiffs' to their privileges as baseball players and for damages for their exclusion from "organized baseball." It is a sequel of our decision in *Gardella v. Chandler, in which a majority of the court held that the complaint set out a claim under the Anti-Trust Acts against the defendants in that action, who together with others are defendants in this. The plaintiffs in the case at bar moved for an injunction, pendente lite, to compel the defendants to take them off the "suspended" list, and to restore them to their former position as "eligible" baseball players, freed from the "reserve clause" contained in contracts under which they had been employed until 1946 when they accepted engagements elsewhere. The complaint alleged that the defendants, who are the owners and officers of the "Major Leagues" in baseball, regularly broadcast the games play by play to distant audiences by radio and television; but neither in the complaint nor in any supporting affidavits is it alleged how great a part these activities constitute, either absolutely or proportionately to the total activities or to the income of the business. By the "reserve clause" a player promises that "while under contract or reservation he will not play baseball * * * otherwise than for the Club or a Club assignee"—4(a)— and that "on or before February 15 * * * of the year following the last written notice to the player * * * the Club or any assignee hereof may renew this contract for the term of that year" at a salary agreed upon, "or in default of agreement the Player will accept such salary rate as the Club may fix, or else he will not play baseball otherwise than for the Club or for an assignee thereof." The club is given the privilege of terminating the contract upon ten days notice, so that in effect the player agrees to an indefinite employment at any salary—after the first year —which the club may fix, subject to discharge at the club's pleasure. Although the complaint and the affidavits alleged generally that the defendants had a monopoly of the whole business of "organized baseball," this was denied and stands unproved, save as we could take judicial notice of it, which we cannot.

[Three Grounds of Decision In Court Below]

The plaintiffs during 1946 were players with the St. Louis team under contracts containing the "reserve clause"; but, finding better pay elsewhere, they joined Mexican teams. Whereupon the defendants, acting for the "Major Leagues" and for the "Minor

* 172 Fed. (2d) 403.

Leagues" (59 other teams, affiliated with them), "suspended" them for five years, under the sanction that no players in the "Major Leagues" or the "Minor Leagues" are allowed to play on any team with a "suspended" player. The plaintiffs allege that this has substantially excluded them from their calling by confining them to non-professional, or "semi-professional" teams. The defendants counter by alleging that the "reserve clause" was "indispensable" to the conduct of professional baseball, and that they had not prevented the plaintiffs from playing on any teams except those of the "Major" and "Minor" leagues. The judge denied the motion on three grounds. First he held that the injunction would "disturb the status quo" by restoring the plaintiffs to positions which they had voluntarily resigned three years before; second, he held that their rights depended upon disputed questions of fact and law; third, he held that they had an adequate remedy at law in the recovery of damages.

[Second Ground Considered]

Of these three grounds we find it necessary to consider only the second. All members of the court in *Gardella v. Chandler, supra, held that, if the facts alleged in the complaint, which was all that was before us, had been the same as in *Federal Baseball Club v. National League, it would have been our duty to follow that decision, and to hold that the defendants were not engaged in interstate commerce. Judge Chase held that that decision was authoritative in spite of the new facts alleged in the complaint. Judge Frank and I thought otherwise, although we did so for not quite the same reasons. We both thought that radio broadcasting from the "ball-parks" of narratives of the games play by play, and projecting the actual scene by television, might make the defendants' activities interstate commerce, but Judge Frank thought that it was necessary to look only at the absolute extent of the radio broadcasting and television. If that was substantial, it colored the sum total of the activities and made the business interstate, regardless of the proportion which it bore to the whole. I thought that there had been some interstate activities in the Federal Baseball Club v. National League, supra, but that the court did not regard them as enough to make the business interstate. It seemed to me that it was a question of the proportion of the interstate activities to the whole business, and that the new activities of radio broadcasting and television should be added to the earlier interstate activities, and the sum should be compared with the business as a whole. So far as concerns the present record, it makes no difference which of us was right, for it does not appear what is the extent of the radio broadcasting or the television, either absolutely, or proportionately. We are all agreed that the bare allegation in a complaint that the defendants make contracts with broadcasting and television companies will not support the jurisdiction of the court.

[Validity of Reserve Clause Not Decided]

Apart from the question of jurisdiction, we are not prepared to say that, on the record now before us, the "reserve clause" violates the Anti-Trust Acts. Such a determination may involve consideration, among other things, of the needs and conduct of the business as a whole. We do not mean that it would not be otherwise, if the record showed, with enough certainty to support a preliminary injunction, that the defendants have established a monopoly of the baseball business, and that the "reserve clause" is a means of maintaining it. If it be established that they do have such a substantial monopoly, the "reserve clause" will take on a different face, as to which nothing we say now must be understood to express any opinion.

[Order Affirmed]

For the foregoing reasons, we hold, not only that we should not reverse what was in any event a discretionary order, but that the judge came to the only conclusion legally open to him on the record. It would, however, seem highly desirable that the cause should be preferred, and that it should be brought to trial as soon as possible.

Order affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the circuit court for Milwaukee County: Daniel W. Sullivan, Circuit Judge. Affirmed.

Wisconsin Fair Trade Act

Fair Traded Liquor—Reductions in Established Prices—Goods Acquired Prior to Notice.—An order granting a temporary injunction which enjoined a retailer from selling liquor below prices set forth in a distributor's latest price list, pending final determination of an action in which a distributor alleged violations of fair trade contracts, was affirmed. It was held that the allegations were made with sufficient positiveness to sustain the injunction and that there was no abuse of discretion accompanying its issue. The Court held that the non-contracting retailer was bound to sell at prices established by fair trade agreements even though the goods, covered therein, were purchased before receiving notice of the contracts.

See the Wisconsin Fair Trade Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8944, and the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7292.

For the respondent: Quarles, Spence and Quarles, Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

[Review of Facts and Record]

This action was commenced on November 19th, 1948, by the plaintiff Calvert Distillers Corporation, to enjoin the defendant Charles J. Goodman from violating the provisions of certain so-called Wisconsin Fair Trade Act contracts and to recover damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of such violations. The order in question was entered on December 13, 1948. Paragraphs 1 and 2 of the plaintiff's complaint relate to the residence and status of the parties. Paragraphs 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 are set out in the margin.*

* "3. That the practice whereby retailers of liquor distributed by the plaintiff reduce the resale prices of such liquors is injurious to the good will of the plaintiff.

"4. That prior to November 15, 1940, plaintiff, pursuant to the provisions of Section 133.25 of the Wisconsin Statutes, began the practice of selling its products, including those hereafter

Upon the summons, the verified complaint and the affidavit of Alfred B. Chandler, state manager of the plaintiff, an order was issued on November 19, 1948, requiring the defendant to show cause why the court should not grant a temporary injunction restraining the defendant, his servants, employees and attorneys, pending the final hearing of this cause, from directly or indirectly advertising for sale at retail, offering for sale at retail, or selling at retail any of plaintiff's products at prices less than those fixed by plaintiff in its latest consumer's price list. It was further ordered that until the determination of this order to show cause "the defendant, his servants, employes and attorneys, be and they are hereby restrained and enjoined from advertising, offering for sale, or selling any of said products at prices less than those set forth in said latest price list." This order to show cause was returnable November 26, 1948, at two o'clock P. M. The papers upon which the order to show cause was issued were filed in the circuit court of Milwaukee county November 23, 1948. The order to show cause was accompanied by the customary bond in the sum of $3,000.

Upon motion of the defendant the court issued an order requiring the plaintiff to show cause on November 22, 1948, at three o'clock P. M., why the restraining order issued November 19, 1948, should not be vacated and set aside. The motion of the defendant to vacate the restraining order of November 19, 1948, and the order to show cause of the plaintiff why a temporary injunction should not be granted herein, came on for hearing before the court on the 23rd day of November, 1948. On the 13th day of December the court entered an order enjoining "the defendant, his attorneys, agents, servants and employes temporarily and during the pendency of this suit and until judgment is entered herein from selling, offering for sale, and advertising any products of the plaintiff at prices below those set forth by plaintiff in its latest price lists," and the court further ordered that defendant's motion to vacate and set aside the restraining order of November 19, 1948, be denied. From the order entered on the 13th day of December, 1948, the defendant appeals. Further facts will be stated in the opinion.

[Nature of Appeal]

ROSENBERRY, C. J.: While the appeal is from the injunction pendente lite of December 13, 1948, and from that part of the order which denied defendant's motion to vacate the ex parte restraining order issued on November 19, 1948, the questions for decision are really presented by the appeal from that part of the order of December 13, 1948, which granted a temporary injunction pending the final determination of the action. The restraining order of November 19, 1948 was by its terms effective only until the determination of the order of November 19, 1948. A further order having been mentioned, exclusively under contracts known and referred to as 'Fair Trade Contracts,' and that by virtue of said contracts it was agreed that said products would not be sold at prices below those periodically set out in plaintiff's price lists.

"5. That defendant, as plaintiff is informed and believes, on and about November 15, 1940, and on various occasions thereafter, was advised that said products were to be sold at retail only in accordance with said Fair Trade Contracts and in accordance only with plaintiff's consumer's price lists; that defendant has secured substantial quantities of said branded and trade-marked liquors since being advised that said products were to be sold only in accordance with said Fair Trade Contracts and only in accordance with plaintiff's consumer's price lists.

"6. That defendant has wilfully and knowingly advertised, by advertisements appearing in the public press and otherwise, and he and his agents and servants have wilfully and knowingly offered for sale and have sold plaintiff's said products at prices less than those set forth in its latest consumer's price list; and that in an advertisement which appeared in the Milwaukee Journal under the date of November 18, 1948, and in a similar advertisement which appeared in the Milwaukee Sentinel under the date of November 19, 1948, defendant advertised one of plaintiff's said liquors, to-wit, Calvert Reserve, at the price of $3.29 a fifth, and also set forth that the regular price thereof was $4.10, which said regular price of $4.10 was in fact the minimum price for the sale of a fifth of said liquor in accordance with plaintiff's latest consumer's price list.

"7. That plaintiff has protested to defendant against said price cutting and said other improper and unlawful practices; that defendant nevertheless has continued with knowledge to offer for sale and to sell said branded liquors at prices less than those set forth in plaintiff's latest price list and has advised plaintiff that he will continue to do so.

"8. That each and all of said products are in fair and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced by others; that plaintiff has sustained substantial financial damage through the loss of good will among its customers, including retailers who purchased some of its products from distributors, by reason of defendant's said practices; that defendant threatens to continue said practices; and that plaintiff's remedy at law is inadequate, since its damage cannot be accurately computed."

entered on December 13th, the order of November 19th was superceded and no longer of any force or effect. Ritholz v. Ammon (1942), 240 Wis. 578, 4 N. W. (2d) 173. The answer not having been served until December 13, 1948, and not filed until December 14, 1948, it was not before the court on the 23rd day of November, 1948, when the hearing was had. The matter therefore stands upon the complaint and the affidavits filed in support of and opposing the motion heard on November 23, 1948.

[Defendant's Argument]

The appellant contends that the trial court abused its discretion in granting the injunction pendente lite. Appellant argues that the restraining order cannot be sustained because the essential allegations of the complaint must be positively stated. The material parts of the complaint have already been set out.

[Allegations Positively Stated]

It appears from paragraph 4 that some time prior to November 15, 1940, the plaintiff began the practice of selling its products, including those hereafter mentioned, exclusively under contracts known and referred to as Fair Trade Contracts, and that by virtue of said contracts it was agreed that said products would not be sold at prices below those periodically set out in plaintiff's consumer's price list. We are at a loss to understand how allegations could be more positively and clearly stated.

In paragraph 6 of the complaint it is alleged that the defendant has "wilfully and knowingly advertised . . . and wilfully and knowingly offered for sale and have sold plaintiff's said products at prices less than those set forth in its (plaintiff's) latest consumer's price list."

These two allegations state the essence of a cause of action under the Fair Trade Contracts statute. The verification of the complaint sets out that Alfred B. Chandler is Wisconsin State Manager of the plaintiff, and that > "he was such agent in relation to the business out of which the cause of action set forth in plaintiff's complaint in this action arose; that he has read the above and foregoing complaint and knows the contents thereof; that the same is true of his own knowledge, except as to matters therein stated on information and belief, and that as to such matters he believes it to be true."

The allegations of paragraphs 4 and 6 of the complaint being positively stated, the exception found in the verification does not apply. It is true that the allegations of paragraph 5 are upon information and belief and could hardly be made otherwise. It is considered that the allegations of the complaint are made with sufficient positiveness to sustain the restraining order and the temporary injunction.

In response to the motion of the plaintiff to enter a temporary injunction each of the parties filed affidavits in support of their respective positions. In addition to the allegations contained in the complaint, affidavits on behalf of the plaintiff set forth that the defendant had notice of the fact that plaintiff's products were sold under the Fair Trade Act. The defendant filed an affidavit by himself in which he denied that he had such notice. It would extend this opinion to a great length to set out the substantial parts of these affidavits. It is clear from an examination of the record that the affidavits raised a question as to credibility of the affiants. The trial court found that the defendant had such notice, and there are abundant facts stated in the affidavits to support that finding.

[New Contention Raised]

The appellant further contends that the order appealed from granting an injunction pendente lite specified a restraint which is in excess of the statutory authority to contract. Sec. 133.25, subsec. (4) and (5) provided:

> "(4) Every contract containing the provisions referred to in sub-sec. (3) shall include the provision that such commodity may be resold without reference to such contract in the following cases:
> "(a) In closing out in good faith the owner's stock or any part thereof for the purpose of discontinuing delivering any such commodity.
> "(b) When the goods are damaged or deteriorated in quality, and notice is given to the public thereof.
> "(5) Wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract referred to in subsection (3), whether or not the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is a party to such contract, is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby."

This contention was first raised in this case in the appellant's briefs on appeal. It was not brought to the attention of the trial court in any way. If and when the defendant intends to avail himself of the provisions contained in (a) and (b) he should apply to the trial court for a modification of the temporary injunction.

[Notice]

The appellant further contends that the plaintiff's products in possession of the appellant were purchased by him prior to his receiving notice that they were sold pursuant to the terms of the Fair Trade Act, and therefore sec. 133.25 does not apply. We fail to find any provision in the Fair Trade Act which sustains appellant's contention. It appears, however, from the affidavits that the defendant had notice on November 19, 1948, and thereafter continued to make sales in violation of the Fair Trade Act.

The only provision in the Fair Trade Act relating to notice to an offending retailer is that he is guilty of unfair trade competition which is actionable only if the sales are made wilfully and knowingly. The defendant did not challenge the sufficiency of the complaint. While the court did not make formal findings it must have considered that for the purpose of deciding the motion the plaintiff had at least made a prima facie case of liability of the defendant under the Fair Trade Act, and therefore had sold plaintiff's products in violation of the terms of the Fair Trade Act knowingly and wilfully.

[No Abuse of Discretion]

Upon the whole record it is considered that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in making the order of December 13, 1948, granting the plaintiff a temporary injunction.

By the Court.—The order appealed from is affirmed.

Special Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia (now the United States District Court for the District of Columbia).

Sherman Antitrust Act

Real Estate Boards—Order Denying Summary Judgment Not Final—Appeal from Final Order Only.—An appeal brought by real estate boards and individuals named in a civil action brought by the government to enjoin antitrust violations was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction since the Expediting Act made specific provision for an appeal from a final decree of a district court to the Supreme Court rather than to the Court of Appeal and the intention of that Act was held to preclude an appeal to either court in the case of an interlocutory decree. An order denying a motion for summary judgment is not final and therefore not appealable.

For appellee: Victor H. Kramer, Attorney, Department of Justice, with whom Herbert A. Bergson, Assistant Attorney General, and C. Heyward Belser, Attorney, Department of Justice were on the brief.

Before Edgerton and Proctor, JJ., and H. Church Ford, District Judge sitting by designation.

Edgerton, J.: The United States brought this civil action for an injunction under the Sherman Act, 26 Stat. 209, § 4, as amended, 15 U. S. C. § 4, against the National Association of Real Estate Boards, the Washington Real Estate Board, and certain individuals. The defendants moved for summary judgment on the theory of res judicata because they were acquitted in a criminal prosecution based on the same facts. The District Court denied the motion.

The government moves to dismiss this special appeal for lack of jurisdiction. This motion must be granted. The Expediting Act, 32 Stat. 823, § 2, as amended, 15 U. S. C. § 29, provides that in a suit in equity brought by the United States under the Sherman Act "an appeal from the final decree of the district court will lie only to the Supreme Court . . ." In United States v. California Cooperative Canneries, a Sherman Act case from this court, the Supreme Court said: "the Canneries contends that the Court of Appeals had jurisdiction of the appeal from the order denying leave to intervene. It argues that the appeal was not within the purview of § 2 of the Expediting Act, because it was not 'an appeal from the final decree'; . . . and because, under § 226 of the District of Columbia Code, the Court of Appeals has, in its discretion, jurisdiction of an appeal from interlocutory orders. The contention is unsound. . . . Congress limited the right of review to an appeal from the decree which disposed of all matters . . . and it precluded the possibility of an appeal to either court from an interlocutory decree. . . . The purpose of Congress to expedite such suits would obviously be defeated if in the District of Columbia an appeal lay to the Court of Appeals . . ." 279 U. S. 553, 557-559. Section 226 of the District of Columbia Code of 1901, to which the Supreme Court referred in the Canneries case, and section 17-101 of the 1940 edition of the Code were substantially identical.

Appeal dismissed.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Tobacco and Tobacco Products Industry—Summary Judgment Denied.—A tobacco company was held entitled to prove at trial that tobacco distributors acquired power to exclude it from the trade, regardless of how unlikely it may appear, on affidavit, that it will succeed. A motion for summary judgment was denied since the mover was not entitled to it as a matter of law.

For the defendant Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co.: Webster, Sheffield & Horan, New York, New York.

[Matter of Law]

RIFKIND, D. J.: In passing on motions for summary judgment it is not the function of the court to weigh the probability of victory, upon the trial, for the moving party. Such a motion can not be granted even when the probability approaches certainty. The motion is not to be granted unless the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law.

[Supporting Authorities]

The motion in the instant case does not meet that test. I have not made an exhaustive analysis of the Lexington judgment. It probably establishes that the defendants violated the antitrust laws with respect to trade in tobacco or tobacco products. The opinion of the Supreme Court, American Tobacco Co. v. U. S., 1946, 328 U. S. 781, indicates that the conviction established that the defendants jointly acquired the power to exclude actual or potential competitors from the trade and intended to exercise such powers. The plaintiff herein proposes to prove that they exercised that power to exclude it from the trade in tobacco products. It expects to prove the causal relation between the violation and its injury out of the mouths of tobacco distributors. To that opportunity it is entitled, cf. Dixon v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., C. C. A. 2, 1947, 159 F. 2d 863, regardless of how unlikely it may appear, on affidavit, that it will succeed. Bozant v. Bank of New York, C. C. A. 2, 1946, 156 F. 2d 787, 790.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Patent Infringement—Treble Damages—Change of Venue.—In an action brought by an engineering company against a Wisconsin apparatus manufacturer claiming a declaratory judgment, with incidental injunctive relief, adjudging the invalidity and non infringement of patents of the latter company and for treble damages as a result of alleged illegal price fixing and monopoly in restraint of trade, the following procedural orders were made: an order directing amendment of the complaint to separate the causes of action into two counts, an order requiring more definite statement of the patents, an order transferring the action to a Wisconsin court. It was held that the Wisconsin corporation whose agent occupied an office in New York from where he solicited business and forwarded orders to his Milwaukee principal, was "doing business" in New York and could be sued there. The cause was transferred to Wisconsin for the greater convenience of the company whose books, records and properties were situated there. The injunction was denied because, in the opinion of the Court, there was nothing to justify the conclusion that the letters sent by the Wisconsin manufacturer to the customers of the complaining firm, informing them of alleged patent violations, were sent out in bad faith or otherwise than as notices of infringement as provided for in the patent laws.

Opinion

HULBERT, D. J.: There are numerous motions by both plaintiff and defendant in this action now pending before the Court. Plaintiff moves to (1) amend the complaint, and (2) secure a temporary injunction. Defendant moves (1) for a transfer of the action under 28 U. S. C. sec. 1406 for improper venue, (2) for transfer because of forum non conveniens under 28 U. S. C. sec. 1404, (3) to dismiss a portion of the complaint for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted, and (4) for a more definite statement as to certain matters in the complaint. The motions will be considered and disposed of separately.

Motion To Amend Complaint

Plaintiff seeks to amend paragraph 11 of its complaint to read as set forth in the notice of motion. Defendant objects to the amendment on the ground that it would not alter the questions of improper venue raised by defendant's motions and also that the complaint as amended would still fail to set forth sufficient facts to give rise to a claim under the anti-trust laws. Defendant, however, cannot be prejudiced by the amendment. The action is not yet ready for trial, the complaint having only been filed on April 6, 1949. Furthermore, on the argument of the motions, defendant urged its motion to dismiss on the basis of both the original and proposed amended complaint. The motion to amend is granted, and the Court will consider the complaint as amended in disposing of the remaining motions.

Motion for More Definite Statement

The complaint, in form, sets forth one count. The prayer for relief, asks for the following: a declaratory judgment of non-infringement of defendant's patents, a declaration of the invalidity of defendant's patents, a judgment for $750,000. which is treble the damages alleged in paragraph 11 of the amended complaint, and an injunction restraining defendant from interfering with plaintiff's business or customers. In essence, the complaint sets forth two claims: (1) for a declaratory judgment, with incidental injunctive relief, adjudging the invalidity and non-infringement of defendant's patents, and (2) for treble damages under the anti-trust laws because of defendant's alleged illegal price fixing and monopoly in restraint of trade. As a matter of fact, plaintiff in its memorandum on those motions admits that the action seeks these forms of relief. Therefore, it is apparent that the complaint would be subject to a motion under Rule 10(b) F. R. C. P. to separately state and number the counts. We will consider the motion for a more definite statement to be such.

Plaintiff asserts that defendant's motion to dismiss certain paragraphs of the complaint is "unique", but the reason for defendant's motion taking that form is plaintiff's failure to separately state and number its claims. Thus defendant was obliged to attack those paragraphs which it felt asserted the faulty claims.

Furthermore, the Court feels that the complaint, even as amended in paragraph 11, does not adequately set forth plaintiff's claim under the anti-trust laws. When plaintiff amends its complaint to separately state and number the counts, it is directed to set forth a more definite statement as to item 5(b) in defendant's notice of motion. As to item 5(a), plaintiff is to make a more definite statement by identifying by name and date all prior patents and publications to be relied upon.

Motion for more definite statement granted to extent indicated above, and plaintiff is directed to serve its amended complaint within 60 days after entry of an order hereon.

Motion To Dismiss

Because of the disposition of the motion for a more definite statement, the motion to dismiss is denied, without prejudice to a renewal thereof after the amended complaint is served.

Motion To Transfer

Defendant seeks the transfer of this action to the District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin on the ground that the venue is presently laid in the wrong District; that the Court lacks jurisdiction over the defendant in this District, and that defendant has not been properly served with process here. As an alternative form of relief, defendant seeks a transfer of the action on grounds of forum non conveniens under 28 U. S. C. sec. 1404(a).

Defendant, a Wisconsin corporation, is not registered to do business in this District, and asserts that it is not doing business here.

A few preliminary observations are in order before considering the merits of the motions. That the doctrine of forum non conveniens as codified in revised Title 28 section 1404(a) applies to actions under the anti-trust laws has recently been decided in the affirmative. U. S. v. National City Lines, decided by the Supreme Court on May 31, 1949. The Court will consider both motions addressed to venue at the same time because the question of corporate "presence" (raised by defendant in motion under sec. 1406) is very closely allied to, and at times may be coincidental with, the doctrine of forum non conveniens. Latimer v. S/A Industrias Reunidas F. Matarazzo, docket No. 21301, decided June 8, 1949 (C. A. 2).

For the most part, plaintiff and defendant agree on the facts relevant to these motions. One Herbert F. Motz has secured office space at 50 Church Street, New York, N. Y. for the purpose of soliciting customers for apparatus manufactured by defendant. By the terms of his arrangements with defendant, Motz is free to solicit business for other manufacturers as well as defendant. Prior to Motz' connection with defendant early in February 1949, defendant had another representative in this district, George I. Thatcher, who also had offices at 50 Church Street. Letters attached to affidavits in opposition to these motions indicate that Thatcher was connected with defendant as far back as February 1936.

Motz receives compensation from defendant in the form of commissions on orders solicited; Motz' operating expenses are paid by himself, although defendant at times advances funds against future commissions "to defray operating and living expenses".

Motz has the name "Dings Magnetic Separator Company" painted on the door of his office, and also had a telephone installed and listed in the telephone book under the company's name, with the company's acquiescence. Motz' affidavit sets forth the manner of his doing business as follows:

"When a prospective buyer of Dings Company equipment comes to my attention, it is my practice to submit to such buyer a proposal in accordance with data furnished to me by said Company, which proposal gives specifications of the equipment which I believe the customer desires and a proposed price therefor which is specified as being subject to change without notice. I send copies of all such proposals which I submit to prospective buyers to the Dings Company, Milwaukee, Wisconsin for their information and approval, the same all being subject to said Company's approval, rejection or modification in Milwaukee. The practice then is for the buyers to mail to me on their own stationery or order blanks orders for the equipment which they desire, and it is then my practice to address informal letters of thanks to the customers, and to advise them that I have forwarded the order to the factory of the Dings Company, at Milwaukee, Wisconsin."

From that point on, Motz has nothing further to do with the processing, filling, or collection of payment for, the orders.

Other factors bearing significantly on this question are summarized below:

Communications between Motz in New York and defendant in Milwaukee were written on paper entitled "Inter-Office Correspondence". In advertising literature proposed to be sent out by defendant, reference to Motz is made as "our new Sales Manager in your area". Letterheads on stationery used by Motz to write to prospective customers contain the company's name and Milwaukee address, and also the notation, "New York Office" followed by the New York address and telephone number. A catalogue of defendant lists the addresses of its branch offices including the New York office.

Venue of the anti-trust claim is laid under sections 4 and 12 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A. sections 15, 22, under which venue is proper in any district in which a defendant resides, is found, or has an agent, and for corporate defendnats this includes any district in which it transacts business; venue of the declaratory judgment count is assumed to be under the general venue statute, 28 U. S. C. section 1391(c), under which a corporation may be sued in the district in which it is incorporated, or licensed to do business or is doing business.

Under the facts as detailed above, it is apparent that defendant comes within the literal meaning of the venue statutes. That Motz is defendant's agent can hardly be denied; and the continuous solicitation of business was itself "doing business" within the meaning of the venue statute. Kilpatrick v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., 166 F. 2d 788 (C. A. 2). cf. also International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U. S. 310 in which the facts were substantially similar to those herein, with one exception (discussed below).

Although the defendant comes within the literal language of the venue statutes, it still remains to be determined whether this forum would be so inconvenient to defendant as to trespass on its right of due process. Latimer v. Matarazzo, supra. If the subject matter of the action arose out of defendant's activities in this district, which is the distinguishing factor in the International Shoe Company case, the question of convenience would hardly detain us. But nowhere in either the complaint or plaintiff's affidavits is this fact alleged.

It is uncontradicted that no director, officer or employee of defendant, other than Motz, is located in this district. Defendant owns no property here (the office equipment in New York was supplied by Motz).

The complaint does not allege the other parties who entered into the alleged illegal price fixing agreements with defendant. However, from an affidavit submitted by plaintiff it is asserted that one James J. Ferris attended meetings in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, between defendant and two other Wisconsin corporations at which the alleged agreements were made. Presumably the testimony of the people who attended these meetings, named in the affidavit, will be necessary in defense of the claim under the anti-trust laws. Furthermore, all defendant's officers, books and records are located in Wisconsin and would be more readily available for inspection and examination there than in this district.

In opposition to the motion to transfer, plaintiff urges that a large percentage of the installations which have been claimed to infringe defendant's patents are located nearer to this district than to the Eastern District of Wisconsin; but none of them are alleged to be within this district. Thus, this fact does not aid plaintiff. Plaintiff is also not located within this district. One of plaintiff's customers who has been allegedly threatened by defendant has its headquarters in New York City, and four expert witnesses for plaintiff "reside within a radius of 35 miles of New York City." The residence of expert witnesses cannot be considered as controlling, or even of great importance, in determining questions of forum non conveniens. Fifth & Walnut Inc. v. Loew's Inc., 76 F. Supp. 64, 67 (S. D. N. Y. 1948).

Thus, the convenience of plaintiff in having the action tried here is reduced to the convenience of one witness, a customer of plaintiff's. Certainly the convenience of defendant and its witnesses, and the convenience of the Court with its heavily overburdened calendars greatly outweigh this convenience to plaintiff in this action which did not arise out of defendant's activity in this district. Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 330 U. S. 501.

For all of the foregoing reasons the Court concludes that there does not exist here that second element in "presence" necessary to subject the defendant corporation to suit here in this action. cf. Hutchinson v. Chase & Gilbert Inc., 45 F. 2d 139 (C. A. 2). The motions to transfer are granted and the whole action (both the declaratory judgment anti-trust claims) will be transferred to the Eastern District of Wisconsin.

Motion for Temporary Injunction

Plaintiff seeks an injunction pendente lite restraining defendant from interfering with plaintiff's customers by writing letters to them threatening them with suit on account of alleged use or infringement of any of the patents involved in this suit. The basis of the motion is a series of letters sent out by defendant, one to plaintiff, and others to customers of plaintiff informing them of alleged violations of defendant's patent rights. There is nothing in the moving papers to justify a conclusion that these letters were sent out in bad faith or otherwise than as notices of infrigement as provided for in the patent laws, 35 U. S. C. A. sec. 49. Since defendant is specifically permitted to send out such notices, in the absence of a showing of bad faith the motion must be denied. Art Metal Works Inc. v. Auto Match Corp., 36 F. 2d 954 (S. D. N. Y., 1930); cf. also Zephyr American Corp. v. Bates Mfg. Co., 59 F. Supp. 573 (D. N. J., 1945).

In the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Civil Action No. 2218-48. April 30, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Agreement To Withdraw Advertising Business—Concerted Action By Trade Association Members—Treble Damage Action Dismissed.—A treble damage action brought by a publisher of a monthly newspaper against a merchants' and manufacturers' association was dismissed for failure to state a cause of action. The concerted action of the advertising committee in refusing to approve of its members' advertising in the paper did not offend the antitrust laws. Disapproval of the paper resulted in a decrease in its income, but it was found that the committee's lawful function did not affect interstate commerce or create an unreasonable restraint of trade.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1230.101, 1640.121, 1640.619.

For the plaintiffs: Eugene E. Ditto, Harold L. Schilz, Washington, D. C.

For the defendants Merchants & Manufacturers Ass'n, Inc., and The Hecht Company: John J. Carmody, Jo V. Morgan, Washington, D. C.

For the defendants Kann, Inc. & A. Kahn, Inc., and Young Men's Shop: Leon Tobriner, Gilbert Hahn, Washington, D. C.

For the defendant Woodward & Lothrop: Hogan and Hartson (Joseph J. Smith, Jr.), Washington, D. C.

BEN MOORE, District Judge: Plaintiffs have brought an action against defendants for treble damages, alleging violation of Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Sherman Anti-trust Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 1 et seq., and consequent injury to plaintiffs.

Motions to dismiss filed by each of the defendants are pending, as well as a motion for summary judgment filed by plaintiffs. Argument on all these motions was heard at the same time by the Court. The motions to dismiss are based on numerous grounds, but this opinion will deal only with the first, which is, in each motion, that the complaint fails to state a claim against the respective defendants upon which relief can be granted.

[Allegations Summarized]

The substantial allegations of the complaint may be briefly summarized as follows:

Plaintiff District of Columbia Citizen Publishing Company is the publisher of the District of Columbia Citizen, a monthly newspaper with general circulation in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, which derives its income largely from advertising. Plaintiff Paul P. Walsh was for a time the owner and publisher of this newspaper, having transferred his rights therein to the corporate plaintiff in March, 1948.

Defendant Merchants and Manufacturers Association, Inc., is a trade association in the District of Columbia. The other defendants are alleged to be members of this trade association.

The Association maintains a committee on donations and advertising, whose decisions are alleged to control the advertising policy of the members of the Association. This committee is alleged to maintain an approved list of newspapers and publications in which it allows members of the Association to advertise. The members of the Association are alleged to comply with a rule of the Association that they will not advertise in any publication not approved by the committee. Solicitations for advertizing by agents of the District of Columbia Citizen directed to members of the Association have been referred by them to the committee, which, it is alleged, has refused to approve such advertising, and thereafter advertising has been declined by these Association members. The refusal is alleged to be arbitrary and capricious, and for the purpose of injuring and destroying competition, and potential competition of the District of Columbia Citizen with other publications, "and some in which some of the said defendants and co-conspirators have a financial interest."

The District of Columbia Citizen is alleged to be an attractive newspaper comparing favorably in its essentials with any "specific purpose" Tabloid newspaper or trade publication published on a weekly or monthly basis in any comparable metropolitan area. Its advertising is alleged to be well presented, and advertisers are alleged to have expressed satisfaction with its services. Its mail circulation is 15,000 copies, part of which go into interstate commerce; in April, 1948, it distributed 36,000 copies. It is alleged that the circulation would be much larger and more widespread but for the so-called boycotting or blacklisting by defendants, which, it is alleged, has diminished its circulation, impaired its prestige, and caused it heavy financial loss because of its failure to obtain advertising which it would have otherwise obtained.

For the purpose of passing on the motions to dismiss, the foregoing factual allegations of the complaint will be treated as true.

Section 1 of the Sherman Act makes combinations in restraint of interstate commerce unlawful; Section 2 extends the ban to monoplies and attempts to monopolize any part of interstate commerce; and Section 3 makes the prohibitions of Section 1 applicable to commerce in the District of Columbia.

While all monopolies involve restraints of trade, there may be restraints of trade which are not monopolistic. Consideration of this motion, therefore, involves two inquiries; first, whether the allegations, if true, show that the defendants monopolized or attempted to monopolize any part of interstate commerce; and secondly, if not, do they show that defendants combined to restrain trade in the District of Columbia, or in interstate commerce?

[No Monopoly of Interstate Commerce]

Obviously, the acts charged to defendants do not tend to create any monopoly of the newspaper publishing business on the part of defendants. They are not engaged in that business. It is alleged that some of them have a financial interest in some other publications; but the extent of this interest is not shown, nor is it alleged that defendants or any of them advertise in these other publications, or that any of them are on the committee's so-called approved list. None of the evil effects which are inseparably connected with monopolies can be reasonably expected to result from the mere agreement of defendants not to advertise in this small monthly newspaper.

Although not alleged, it is a matter of common knowledge that there are in the District of Columbia many large daily newspapers engaged in the dissemination of news and advertising matter to the public. It would strain the imagination to say that the reduction in circulation of a small monthly newspaper such as the District of Columbia Citizen could substantially affect the business of these daily newspapers one way or the other. The only possible monopolistic tendency would be in relation to other publications of similar character to the District of Columbia Citizen; and it is not alleged that defendants are interested in the publication of any such newspapers, or even that any exist.

It is alleged in the complaint that the defendants and nineteen other of the larger and more important retail and department stores in Washington have engaged in wrongful and unlawful attempts to monopolize the circulation of advertising within the District of Columbia and in interstate commerce; but such allegations are clearly without basis in the facts alleged to support the charge. The complaint states that the method employed to effect this monopoly is the boycotting of plaintiffs' newspaper by refusal to advertise in it. There is no allegation that more than twenty-four stores refused to advertise in the District of Columbia Citizen. There is no allegation that the defendants or any of the other nineteen stores attempted to coerce, induce or in any way influence other stores in the placing of advertising in the plaintiffs' newspaper, or any other newspaper in the District of Columbia. The complaint itself refutes this charge in alleging that persons and stores that have placed such advertising have expressed satisfaction. In the absence of any allegation to the contrary, it must be assumed that these satisfied patrons are continuing to place advertising in the paper, without any threat of retaliation by the defendants in this suit. The only thing shown in the complaint in support of the charge of monopolization of advertising, is the mere refusal of approximately twenty-four concerns, out of the thousands of potential advertisers in the city of Washington and elsewhere to advertise in the District of Columbia Citizen. I hardly think that this is sufficient to indicate an attempt to monopolize advertising on the part of the defendants. Moreover, the mere withholding of advertising, without an accompanying intention to place such advertising elswhere, in some publication which would not otherwise have carried it, could have no tendency to create a monopoly.

Viewing all the allegations in their most favorable light from the standpoint of the plaintiffs, no element of monopoly is discernible, or at most it is so slight as to be negligible.

I am therefore of opinion that the complaint does not state any facts which tend to show that the defendants or any of them have monopolized, or attempted to monopolize, or combined to monopolize, any part of interstate commerce.

[No Unreasonable Restraint Established]

Whether the complaint shows facts which could warrant a conclusion that defendants have combined to restrain trade is a question which presents more difficulty. It is well settled that in actions of this nature the complaint must be construed with great liberality. However, although plaintiffs have great latitude, it still is necessary, in order successfully to resist a motion to dismiss, that they allege facts sufficient to justify the Court in requiring defendants to answer the complaint.

It has been well said that the end sought by the Sherman Act was: ". . . the prevention of restraints to free competition in business and commercial transactions which tended to restrict production, raise prices or otherwise control the market to the detriment of purchasers or consumers of goods and services, all of which had come to be regarded as a special form of public injury." Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U. S. 469. At another point in the same case Mr. Justice Stone pointed out that it has been "repeatedly recognized that the restraints at which the Sherman law is aimed, and which are described by its terms, are only those which are comparable to restraints deemed illegal at common law;" and he mentions as such, "contracts for the restriction or suppression of competition in the market, agreements to fix prices, divide marketing territories, apportion customers, restrict production, and the like practices which tend to raise prices or otherwise take from buyers or consumers the advantages which accrue to them from free competition in the market." Ibid.

In short, it is the public interest which is protected by the Act. The right of an individual to sue for a private injury is conditioned upon and limited by the presence in the circumstances of a public detriment or injury, without which, although there may exist an actionable wrong, the individuals right to redress cannot be asserted by virtue of the Sherman Act. Prairie Farmer Pub. Co. v. Indiana Farmer's Guide Pub. Co. (C. C. A. 7, 1937) 88 F. (2d) 979, cert. denied 301 U. S. 696; Glenn Coal Co. v. Dickinson Fuel Co. (C. C. A. 4, 1934) 72 F. (2d) 885; Shotkin v. General Electric Co. (C. C. A. 10, Dec. 2, 1948) 171 F. (2d) 236; Swartz v. Forward Association (D. Mass., 1941) 41 F. Supp. 294.

It is true that there are certain types of combinations or restraints which are deemed to be illegal per se and no detriment to the public need be shown. However, in this type of case the injury to the public is presumed from the very nature of the restraint, even though the proof may be to the contrary. U. S. v. National Lead Co. (D. C. N. Y., 1945) 63 F. Supp. 513, affirmed 332 U. S. 319; U. S. v. Aluminum Co. of America (C. C. A. 2, 1945) 148 F. (2d) 416.

Trade associations such as the Merchants and Manufacturers Association, Inc., serve a useful purpose in the economic life of any community. Naturally, whatever actions such associations may engage in for the general welfare of their members is concerted action; and it is difficult to imagine any act relating to the general business practices of members of the association which would not in some degree put a restraint upon trade; but a restraint of trade, to be actionable, must be an unreasonable restraint. Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, et al. v. The United States, 221 U. S. 1. Appalachian Coals, Inc., et al. v. United States, 288 U. S. 344; Sugar Institute, Inc., et al. v. United States, 297 U. S. 553. It must either be unlawful in itself, or else it must tend naturally to produce one or more of the evils with relation to the public which have already been cited, and which it was the purpose of the Sherman Act to prevent. Aside from such acts, whatever an individual may lawfully do in his dealings with others when acting alone may also be lawfully done by a combination of persons. Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, et al. v. United States, supra; United States v. Reading Company, 226 U. S. 324, 369. It cannot be doubted that a single advertiser has complete liberty of action to decide for himself whether he will or will not place advertising with a particular newspaper publisher. There is nothing unlawful per se in the maintenance by a trade association of a committee for the purpose of making decisions for or recommendations to its members with reference to what advertising media may be useful or advantageous. In the absence of facts alleged in the complaint on which to base the conclusion of plaintiffs that the agreement not to advertise in the District of Columbia Citizen was arbitrary and capricious and for the purpose of preventing competition with other publications, the Court must conclude from a consideration of the entire complaint and from general knowledge of the functions of trade associations that the committee was actuated by a proper and lawful purpose; and indeed it is quite natural that merchants in the city of Washington would agree that there is no advantage to them in advertising in a small monthly newspaper such as we have here. The situation is no different from that which would result if the publication denied approval were a theatre program, a city directory, or one of those pamphlets usually found in hotels whose purpose is to apprise guests of current events of interest. Whatever element of restraint of trade may be present in committee disapproval of advertising in such publications is not, in my opinion, of such nature or degree as to warrant the characterization of unreasonableness.

[Trade Association's Lawful Function]

What we have here is simply a case of a trade association, in the exercise of a lawful function and for the benefit of its members, declining as an association to advertise in plaintiffs' newspaper. Plaintiffs may be injured thereby, and the circulation of the newspaper may be seriously impaired and its profits reduced; but in my opinion there does not follow as a natural result any detriment or injury to the public in restriction or suppression of competition, or in any other of the numerous evil results against which protection is afforded by the Sherman Act.

[No Cause of Action]

It is my conclusion that the complaint when construed as liberally as it may be for the plaintiffs does not state a cause of action under the Sherman Act. In view of this conclusion, it is unnecessary to deal with any other grounds of the several motions to dismiss, or with plaintiffs' motion for a summary judgment.

Therefore, the several motions to dismiss the complaint will be sustained. An appropriate order may be submitted for entry.

In the Court of Appeals of Maryland. No. 168, October Term, 1948. Filed June 9, 1949. 122 The Daily Record, Baltimore 3, June 22, 1949.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of Baltimore City. W. Conwell Smith, Chief Judge.

Maryland Unfair Sales Act

Wholesale Groceries—Sales Below Cost—Allegations for Injunction.—A decree overruling a demurrer to an amended petition filed by a wholesale grocer for an injunction to enjoin his competitor from selling and advertising wholesale grocery products below cost in violation of the Unfair Sales Act was affirmed and the petition ordered to be answered. It was held that the bill which alleged competition between the parties, sales at less than cost not included in the exemption provided by the Act, destruction of competition, diversion of trade, suffering of loss and possible further loss, and that pecuniary compensation would not afford adequate relief, substantially complied with the statutory requirements. While the time, place and persons to whom the specific sales below cost were made may be required in proof of the case, they need not, the Court decreed, be included in the allegations of the bill.

Argued before MARBURY, Ch. J.; DELAPLAINE, COLLINS, GRASON, HENDERSON and MARKELL, JJ.

[Nature of Appeal]

COLLINS, J.: This is an appeal by Isaac Cohen, Individually and Trading as Capital Wholesale Grocery Company, et al., appellant and defendant below, from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City overruling his demurrer to the amended petition of the appellees, petitioners below, Frey and Son, Inc., et al.

[Allegations]

This amended petition states the following matters. Each of the petitioners are engaged in the wholesale grocery business in Baltimore in competition with each other and with the appellant, and the appellant is engaged in business in Baltimore where he is selling at wholesale a number of listed items at prices specified. The appellees are reliably informed, believe and aver that pursuant to the Unfair Sales Act, Article 83, Sections 111 to 115, inclusive, of the Annotated Code of Maryland, 1943 Supplement, the cost of said items to the appellant, as defined in Section 112 of Article 83, was specific amounts set out in the amended petition. The appellees are advised, believe and allege that the aforesaid prices at which the appellant "has sold, is continuing to sell, has advertised and is continuing to advertise, has offered for sale and is continuing to offer for sale the said items at or less than cost of said items to him, as defined in Section 112 of Article 83 of the Annotated Code of Maryland, 1943 Supplement, and that said advertisements, such offers to sell and such sales by the Defendant were made, and are being made with the intent to injure your Petitioners who are competitors of the Defendant, and that such advertisement, such offers to sell and such sales were made, and are being made with the intent to destroy competition with and between your Petitioners and the Defendant."

The "Petitioners are advised, believe and therefore allege that such sales and offers to sell the said items, made by the Defendant from time to time at cost or less than cost, as defined in the aforesaid Unfair Sales Act, were not sold: (a) in bona fide clearance sales, advertised, marked, and sold as such. (b) to forestall loss. (c) as imperfect or damaged, or as being discontinued, and were not advertised, marked and sold as such. (d) upon final liquidation of any business. (e) for charitable purposes or to relief agencies. (f) on contract to departments of the government or governmental institutions. (g) by any officer acting under the order or direction of any court. (h) in good faith to meet competition. [Article 83, Section 114.]

"7. That your Petitioners are advised, believe and therefore allege that the Defendant, by selling and offering for sale the said items at the prices herein named, with the intent to injure your Petitioners who are competitors of the Defendant, and to destroy the competition of your Petitioners, that the Defendant has violated and is violating the Provisions of the Unfair Sales Act hereinbefore referred to; that such sales and offers to sell at the price aforesaid, with the intent to injure competition, and to destroy competition as aforesaid, are unfair methods of competition, contrary to public policy and in contravention of the aforesaid Act.

"8. That your Petitioners allege that such advertisement, such sales and offers to sell at the prices aforesaid, by the Defendant, are unfair methods of competition and have the effect and result of unfairly diverting trade from your Petitioners and otherwise injurying your Petitioners, who are competitors of the Defendant, and that the same has the result and effect of substantially lessening the competition of your Petitioners with the Defendant; that your Petitioners further allege that each of them has suffered a loss, has been injured and are suffering a loss and are being injured, and are threatened with further loss and injury by reason of the said act by the Defendant, as aforesaid, and that your Petitioners further allege that it is impossible to ascertain the amount of pecuniary loss that they each have already suffered as a result of the Defendant's violation of the said Act and will continue to suffer if the said practices of the Defendant are permitted to continue, and that the same, and the continuance of the same have resulted, and tend to result in irreparable loss of sales to your Petitioners, and the impairment of the goodwill of your Petitioners business; that your Petitioners further allege that pecuniary compensation would not afford adequate relief to your Petitioners; that it is necessary that the Defendant be restrained from continuing its unfair trade practices in derogation and violation of the said Act; to prevent multiplicity of judicial proceedings; that the wrongs complained of as above set forth, imminently imperil and immediately threaten destruction of your Petitioners businesses, and that your Petitioners have no adequate remedy at law."

The appellees ask that a preliminary and perpetual injunction be granted restraining and enjoining the appellant, his agents, employees, and personal representatives during the suit from advertising and selling and from offering for sale at wholesale, any of the items described therein at the prices described, or at any other price, which shall be less than the cost thereof, and any grocery products at prices which shall be at cost or less than cost thereof to the defendant, as defined by the Unfair Sales Act, Article 83, Sections 111 to 115 inclusive, of the Annotated Code of Maryland, 1943 Supplement, "with intent to injure your Petitioners, competitors of said Defendant, or with intent to destroy competition with and between your Petitioners and the said Defendant." The amended petition also asks for other and further relief.

[Agreement On Appeal]

To that amended petition a demurrer was filed by the appellant and from a decree overruling the demurrer the appellant appeals.

The appellant contends that the petition should show when, where, how, and to whom, specific sales below cost in violation of the Act were made, and, if so, which particular person were the said sales intended to injure and, if a designated individual was intended to be so injured, how, where and in what manner was he so injured.

Appellant relies strongly on the case of State ex rel. Malone v. Fleming, 164 Kansas 723, 192 P. 2d 207. In that case, involving the Unfair Practices Act of the State of Kansas, the Court held the allegations not sufficient because the bill did not allege whether defendant sold or offered to sell below cost as a wholesaler or a retailer; in what manner it advertised to sell below cost; the county in which the alleged unlawful acts took place; and because the bill omitted essential elements of intent to divert trade unfairly from a competitor and to prevent competition and injure public welfare. That case is of little assistance here.

Article 83, Section 113, 1943 Code and 1947 Supplement of the Code, provides:

> "No retailer shall, with intent to injure a competitor or competitors, or destroy any competition, advertise, offer to sell, or sell at retail any item of merchandise at less than cost to the retailer as defined in this Act, and no wholesaler shall, with such intent, advertise, offer to sell, or sell at wholesale any item of merchandise at less than cost to the wholesaler, as defined in this Act. Evidence of any advertisement, offer to sell or sale of any item of merchandise by any retailer or wholesaler at less than cost to him, shall be prima facie evidence of intent to injure a competitor or competitors, or destroy competition. Upon complaint of any person claiming to be injured, the Circuit Court of any county and the Circuit Courts of Baltimore City shall have jurisdiction to enjoin any such retailer or wholesaler from the commission of any act prohibited by the provisions of this Act." See Blum v. Engelman, — Md. —, 57 A. 2d 421.

[Prerequisites for Injunction]

Section 113, supra, specifically provides for an injunction to enjoin the violation of the Act. A bill for an injunction, of course, should ordinarily contain the allegations mentioned in the Act. Miller's Equity Procedure, Section 473, page 553; Gayle v. Fattle, 14 Md. 69, 85. The bill before us substantially alleges the statutory requirements. Allegations are made that the petitioners are wholesalers in competition with each other and the appellant; the sales, offers to sell and advertisements by the appellant of the articles by name at less than cost; the sale price of each item and the cost to the appellant; and that these sales, offers to sell, and advertisements, are not included in the exemptions provided by Section 114, supra. These are particular acts forbidden by the statute. As to appellant's contention that the time, place and persons to whom the sales were made should be alleged in the bill, these may be required in proof of the case but hardly in the allegations of the bill. It was said by this Court in the case of Goldsborough v. County Trust Company of Maryland, 180 Md. 59, 62, which involved an injunction provided for by statute and where on demurrer objections were made because certain allegations required by the statute were not included in the amended bill: "Before an injunction can issue of course, the statutory requirement must be substantially complied with; but that may be done at a later stage of the case."

[Allegation of Damage]

It has been stated many times by this Court that the mere allegation in a bill of complaint that irreparable damage will ensue is not sufficient unless facts are stated which will satisfy the Court that the apprehension is well founded. Lamm v. Burrell, 69 Md. 272; West Arlington Land Co. v. Flannery, 115 Md. 274; Warren Mfg. Co. v. Baltimore, 119 Md. 221; Consolidated Gas Co. v. North. Cent. Railway Co., 107 Md. 671; Fowler v. Pendleton, 121 Md. 297; Pope v. Clark, 122 Md. 1; Baltimore v. Sackett, 135

Md. 56; Salisbury v. Camden Sewer Co., 135 Md. 573; Distillery v. Distilling Co., 168 Md. 212, 220; Smith v. Shiebeck, 180 Md. 412, 421.

In the instant case, we have such facts stated, namely: competition between the parties; advertisement and sale at less than cost price, not included in the exemptions provided by Section 114, supra; the destruction of competition; the diversion of trade from the petitioners; the suffering of a loss and the possiblity of further loss and destruction of business by reason of defendant's violation of the statute; together with the further allegation that pecuniary compensation will not afford petitioners adequate relief. Naturally sales by a competitor of goods for less than cost would divert trade from and injure competitors, thereby causing irreparable damage to competitors, the appellees. Furthermore, Section 113, supra, specifically provides that: "Evidence of any advertisement, offer to sell or sale of any item of merchandise by any retailer or wholesaler at less than cost to him, shall be prima facie evidence of intent to injure a competitor or competitors, or destroy competition."

[Decree Affirmed]

We are of opinion that the demurrer was properly overruled in this case, and that the petition should be answered.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Painting Industry—Agreement To Better Working Conditions—No Trade Restraint. —A demurrer to a complaint filed for a declaration of rights under an agreement covering wages and working conditions in the painting industry between decorators' associations and painters' unions and employers, which set up a committee to police the industry and make levies against employers to bear the cost of such supervision, was overruled. There was no reason to declare that an agreement which did not control prices, suppress competition or injure the public constituted a monopoly or restraint of trade.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1280.101.

For the plaintiff: Tobringer & Lazarus, San Francisco, California.

For the defendant: M. S. Hubermann, San Francisco, California.

[Statement of Case]

SAPIRO, J.: Plaintiff association has filed this action for declaratory relief for the purpose of having its rights declared under an agreement entered into by the defendant, which agreement required the defendant to make certain payments as his share of the expenses of administering the contract.

Plaintiff committee was organized under an agreement entered into between various painting and decorating contractors' associations in the Bay Area and various groups of painters' unions in the Bay Area.

The express purpose of the agreement under which plaintiff was created to stabilize the painting industry by creating harmonious relations and maintaining stability of conditions of employment. The agreement the subject matter of this proceeding, first provides for the organization of the plaintiff committee, then proceeds to set out certain provisions covering apprentices, employers and unions. It then provides for the wages and working conditions of employees, and other terms and considerations as to painting work.

Provision is made in the agreement for the supervision of the activities of the employers for the purpose of assuring their conformance to the working conditions that had been established.

The cost involved in supervising the conduct of the employers is borne by a fund to which members of the association are required to contribute $12.00, for which an official shop card is issued, and non-members of the association are required to pay $12.00 plus certain dues, and for which they receive an identification card. The dues that the non-members are required to pay are equal to the dues paid by the members of the associations to their associations. Defendant has contended that the agreement is unenforceable as to him because it is invalid on its face. He bases his contention on a claim that the agreement violates the antitrust laws, and also that there is discrimination. Neither of these grounds of objection is tenable. The agreement appears clearly to be valid and enforceable.

[Antitrust Laws]

It has been long recognized, and it is clearly a desirable situation to achieve, that employers and unions work together for stability in the industry. As this agreement recites, if an employer enters into an agreement with the union and fails to conform to the working conditions, it would result in unfair competition among other employers, and would also create unrest, labor disturbances, and many other situations that would work to the disadvantage of public welfare. It is therefore proper for associations of employers and unions to agree on methods of procedure whereby their activities might be policed and supervised so as to insure observance of the labor agreement entered into between them.

Inasmuch as this is true as to the members of the association, it certainly follows that this activity could be extended one step further and a non-member who adheres to the agreement may well join in such an agreement for the purpose of producing stability in the industry. It follows as a matter of course that there is a certain cost involved in supervising and policing the industry. It is proper for this cost to be borne by a charge placed on the employers. The cases cited by plaintiff in the memorandum filed: Electrical Contractors Association v. Schulman Electric Co., (1945) 391 Ill. 333, 63 N. E. (2d) 392, and also Griffits & Sprague Stevedoring Co. v. Waterfront Employers Association of Pacific Coast, (1947) 162 F. (2d) 1017, clearly set forth why such agreements are not in restraint of trade. Likewise in Minkoff v. Jaunty Junior, Inc., 38 N. Y. S. (2d) 507 (1942), it is recognized that agreements entered into between employers and unions for the bettering of conditions in the industry, even where the employer is called upon to bear a charge involved therein, do not constitute illegal monopolies or restraints of trade. So here the agreement itself cannot be said to constitute a monopoly or restraint of trade. To the contrary, its provisions that would produce harmony and peace in an industrial activity are of the type that ought to be encouraged, and the Court should make every effort to see that they are lived up to for the purpose of producing industrial peace that would so benefit a community.

The particular agreement involved in this case does not in any manner control prices, nor limit the activities of the employer parties so as to stifle or suppress competition, nor injure the public. It purports only to regulate relations between employer and employee groups. There is nothing in the contract that would point to the contrary.

[Discrimination]

The claim of discrimination is not well founded. It is true that the non-member employer pays to the joint committee a sum greater than that paid directly to the joint committee by the employer who is a member of an association. However, that employer pays dues to the association in a sum equal to the amount required to be paid by the non-member employer to the committee. The employers are placed in exactly the same position when it comes to a determination of the amount expended by them in this activity. The fact that the non-member employer pays to the committee rather than to an association does not constitute a discrimination, inasmuch as the amounts paid are exactly the same. There is no contention, and there could be no contention, that the amounts paid are unreasonable because it appears from the agreement that the charge made is but a small charge that would not work a hardship on any employer.

There seems to be no reason whatsoever for declaring this agreement invalid. On the other hand, there seems to be ample reason to sustain the agreement and to grant the declaratory relief called for by the complaint.

The Court therefore orders the demurrer of the defendant overruled.

If the parties, in view of this opinion, stipulate that declaratory judgment may be entered in accordance therewith, the Court will so order. If, however, there is any question in reference to whether a declaratory judgment should be entered without the right to answer, the Court will grant the defendant the right to answer.

[¶ 62,442] United States v. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corporation et al.

In the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio, Western Division. Civil No. 5778. Filed June 23, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Glass Fiber Products—Consent Judgment—Practices Enjoined.—Contracts between manufacturers of glass fiber products were terminated and further performance of them enjoined by a consent judgment entered in a civil antitrust action charging violations of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. The decree enjoined the following practices: allocation of markets, limitation of production and imports, exclusion of any manufacturer from any market, refraining from competing and receiving or exchanging exclusive rights to patents, inventions or technical information. Agency relationships with and control over foreign corporations were enjoined by the order. It also required the issuance to any applicant, on a royalty free or a reasonable royalty basis of licenses to use patents for the manufacture of glass fibers and glass fiber products as well as a grant of immunity from infringement actions. Affiliated directorates among the companies named were condemned and the companies were enjoined from acquiring any securities or assets in other concerns also engaged in the manufacture of glass products.

See the Sherman Antitrust Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1022.25, 1220.211, 1530.10, 1530.50, 1590.

For the plaintiff: Tom C. Clark, Attorney General, Washington, D. C.; Don C. Miller, U. S. Attorney, Cleveland, Ohio; Gerald P. Openlander, Assistant U. S. Attorney, Toledo, Ohio.

For the defendants: Marshall, Melhorn, Bloch & Belt, Toledo, Ohio; Welles, Kelsey, Fuller, Cobourn & Harrington, Toledo, Ohio; Halsey Sayles, Elmira, New York; Fraser, Shumaker, Kendrick & Winn, Toledo, Ohio.

Final Judgment

The Plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its amended complaint herein on July 16, 1948; the defendants Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corporations, Owens-Illinois Glass Company, and Corning Glass Works, having appeared and filed their consolidated answer to the amended complaint denying the violation of law charged therein; and the plaintiff and said defendants by their attorneys having severally consented to the entry of this Final Judgment without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein and without admission of any party defendant in respect of any such issue;

NOW, THEREFORE, before any testimony has been taken herein, and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and upon consent as aforesaid of all the parties hereto, it is hereby ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED as follows:

I.

[Jurisdiction]

This Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter hereof and of all parties hereto. The amended complaint states a cause of action against the defendants under Section 2 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," commonly known as the Sherman Act, as amended.

II.

(F) Agreement between Owens-Corning and Fiberglas Canada dated December 29, 1939, sometimes referred to as "Agreement B".

(G) Agreement between Owens-Corning and Fiberglas Canada dated December 29, 1939, sometimes referred to as "Agreement C".

(H) All existing amendments, renewals and extensions of the foregoing contracts, agreements, arrangements and understandings set forth above in clauses (A) through (G), including those by which Corning and Owens-Corning became parties thereto.

V.

[Practices Enjoined]

Each of the defendants is hereby enjoined and restrained from:

(A) Entering into, performing, abiding by, carrying out, adhering to, maintaining, furthering, or enforcing, directly or indirectly, any combination, conspiracy, contract, agreement, understanding, plan, or program with any of the Foreign Companies, any agent, sales representative or distributor thereof, or any person acting or claiming to act on behalf of such Foreign Companies, agent, sales representative or distributor thereof, or with any other foreign manufacturer of glass fibers or glass fiber products, any agent, sales representative or distributor thereof, or any person acting or claiming to act on behalf of such manufacturer, agent, sales representative or distributor;

(1) to allocate or divide territories or markets for manufacture, sales, or distribution of glass fibers or glass fiber products;

(2) to refrain from, restrain, or limit production or distribution of glass fibers or glass fiber products;

(3) to limit, restrain or prevent importation into or exportation from the United States, its territories, or possessions, of glass fibers or glass fiber products;

(4) to exclude any manufacturer or distributor thereof from any market for glass fibers or glass fiber products;

(5) to refrain from competing in manufacture or sale of glass fibers or glass fiber products in any territory or market; or

(6) to receive or exchange exclusive rights to patents, inventions, or technical information relating to glass fibers, glass fiber products, or to any material, process, method or machinery used in the production or manufacture thereof, or to grant exclusive rights to future patents, inventions, or technical information.

(B) Referring any order or inquiry for glass fibers or glass fiber products to any of the Foreign Companies, any agent, sales representative or distributor thereof, or to any other foreign manufacturer of glass fibers or glass fiber products, or any agent, sales representative or distributor for such manufacturer.

(C) Appointing or designating any of the Foreign Companies or any other foreign manufacturer of glass fibers or glass fiber products as the agent, sales representative, or distributor of a defendant, in connection with glass fibers or glass fiber products, or otherwise distributing or selling glass fibers or glass fiber products through any of the Foreign Companies or any other such manufacturer.

(D) Appointing, designating or continuing the appointment or designation of, any person as the agent or sales representative (including distributor) of a defendant, in connection with glass fibers or glass fiber products, who also act as agent or sales representative (including distributor), for, or is affiliated or connected with, any of the Foreign Companies or any other foreign manufacturer of glass fibers or glass fiber products.

(E) Acting for or representing as agent, cluding distributor) of a defendant, in connection with glass fibers or glass fiber products, any of the Foreign Companies or any other foreign manufacturer of glass fibers or glass fiber products.

(F) Refusing or failing to sell glass fibers or glass fiber products, manufactured or sold by them, without discrimination as to price, terms or conditions of sale to any person located in the United States for sale in, or shipment by such person to, any area or territory outside of the United States, or selling glass fibers or glass fiber products to any such person on the condition, agreement or understanding that such person not sell in, or ship such glass fibers or glass fiber products to, any area or territory outside the United States.

(G) Exercising any control over or influencing in any manner whatsoever, by virtue of stock ownership, representation on the Board of Dirrectors, or otherwise, Fiberglas Canada with respect to the markets or territories in which.it shall or shall not manufacture, sell or distribute glass fibers or glass fiber products, or with respect to any combination, conspiracy, contract, agreement, understanding, plan or program between Fiberglas Canada and any of the Foreign Companies, any agent, sales representative or distributor thereof, or any person acting or claiming to act on behalf of such Foreign Companies, agent, sales representative or distributor, or any other foreign manufacturer of glass fibers or glass fiber products, any agent, sales representative or distributor thereof, or any person acting or claiming to act on behalf of such manufacturer, agent, sales representative or distributor, to do any of the things hereinabove enjoined and restrained in Section (A) of this Article V.

VI.

[Licenses Ordered to Be Issued]

Defendant Owens-Corning is hereby:

(A) Ordered and directed, insofar as it has the power or authority to do so, to issue to any applicant, including any defendant, making written request therefor;

(1) a non-exclusive, unrestricted, royalty-free license under any, some or all of the patents and patent rights listed in Schedule A attached thereto [not reproduced herein]; and

(2) an unrestricted, unconditional and irrevocable grant of immunity from any action or proceeding by any defendant for all past and present acts of infringement of any or the patent or patent rights listed in said Schedule A.

(B) Enjoined and restrained from making any disposition of any of the patents listed in Schedule A [not reproduced herein], or rights under such patents, which deprives it of the power or authority to issue said licenses or grants of immunity required by Section A of Article VI, unless it sells, transfers or assigns said patents or rights and requires, as a condition of such sale, transfer or assignment that the purchaser, transferee or assignee thereof shall observe the provisions of Article VI of this judgment with respect to the patents or rights so acquired and the purchaser, transfers or assignee shall file with this Court, prior to the consummation of said transaction, an undertaking to be bound by the provisions of Article VI with respect to the patents or rights so acquired.

VII.

(A) Defendant Owens-Corning is hereby ordered and directed: (1) insofar as it has the power or authority to do so, to grant to any applicant, including any other defendant, making written request therefor, a non-exclusive license to make, use and sell glass fibers and glass fiber products under any, some or all of the patents, listed in Schelule B attached hereto [not reproduced], and under any, some or all Future Glass Fiber Patents; (2) within thirty days after the date of application, issuance or acquisition of any of the Future Glass Fiber Patents, to advise this Court and the Attorney General, or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, in writing, of the number and date of such application, issuance or acquisition; and (3) to refrain from making disposition of the patents listed in Schedule B [not reproduced herein], or rights under any such patents, or the Future Glass Fiber Patents, which deprives it of the power or authority to grant said licenses, unless it sells, transfers or assigns said patents or rights and requires, as a condition of such sale, transfer or assignment, that the purchaser, transferee or assignee thereof shall observe the provisions of Article VII of this judgment with respect to the patents or rights so acquired and the purchaser, transferee or assignee shall file with this Court, prior to the consummation of said transaction, an undertaking to be bound by the provision of Article VII with respect to the patents or rights as acquired.

(B) Defendant Owens-Corning is hereby enjoined and restrained from including any restriction or condition whatsoever in any such license granted by it pursuant to the provisions of this Article except that (1) the license may be non-transferable; (2) a reasonable non-discriminatory royalty may be charged; (3) reasonable provisions may be made for periodic inspection of the books and records of the licensee by an independent auditor or any person acceptable to the licensee who shall report to the licensor only the amount of the royalty due and payable;

(4) reasonable provision may be made for cancellation of the license upon failure of the licensee to pay the royalties or to permit the inspection of his books and records as hereinabove provided; and (5) the license must provide that the licensee may cancel the license at any time by giving thirty days' notice in writing to the defendant Owens-Corning.

(C) Upon receipt of a written request for a license under the provisions of this Article, defendant Owens-Corning shall advise the applicant in writing of the royalty which it deems reasonable for the patent or patents to which the request pertains. If the parties are unable to agree upon a reasonable royalty within 60 days from the date such request for the license is received by defendant Owens-Corning, the applicant therefor or Owens-Corning may forthwith apply to the Court for the determination of a reasonable royalty, and defendant Owens-Corning shall, upon receipt of notice of the filing of such application, promptly give notice thereof to the Attorney General. In any such proceeding, the burden of proof shall be on the defendant Owens-Corning to establish the reasonableness of the royalty requested, and the reasonable royalty rates, if any, determined by the Court shall apply to the applicant and to all other licensees under the same patent or patents. Pending the completion of any such negotiations or proceeding, the applicant shall have the right to make, use and vend glass fibers or glass fiber products under the patents to which its application pertains without payment of royalty or other compensation as above provided, but subject to the provisions of Subsection D of this article.

(D) Where the applicant has the right to make, use and vend glass fibers or glass fiber products under Subsection C of this Article, and applicant or defendant Owens-Corning may apply to the Court to fix an interim royalty rate pending final determination of what constitutes a reasonable royalty. If the Court fixes such interim royalty rate, defendant Owens-Corning shall then issue and the applicant shall accept a license providing for the periodic payment of royalties at such interim rate from the date of the filing of such application for an interim royalty. If the applicant fails to accept such license or sublicense or fails to pay the interim royalty in accordance therewith, such action shall be ground for the dismissal of his application, and his rights under Subsection C shall terminate. Where an interim license or sublicense has been issued pursuant to this Subsection, reasonable royalty rates, if any, as finally determined by the Court shall be retroactive for the applicant and all other licensees under the same patents to the date of the filing of the application by the applicant.

(E) Any license granted to defendant Owens-Corning by defendants Owens-Illinois or Corning under the Future Glass Fiber Patents shall be non-exclusive and shall permit Owens-Corning to sublicense others. Defendant Owens-Corning is ordered and directed to grant such sublicenses on the same terms and conditions as it is required to grant licenses under its own patents as in this Article VII provided. Defendants Owens-Illinois and Corning are ordered and directed, at the option of the applicant, to grant a license under any such patent to the applicant on the same terms, including royalties, if any, as the license which shall have been granted to defendant Owens-Corning.

(F) Nothing herein shall prevent any applicant from attacking in the aforesaid proceedings or in any other controversy the validity or scope of any of the patents, nor shall this judgment be construed as imparting any validity or value to any of said patents.

VIII.

Each of the defendants herein is ordered and directed, insofar as it has the power or authority to do so, to grant upon written request to any applicant licensed under the provisions of Articles VI and VII of this judgment, with respect to any products manufactured in the United States pursuant to such license, a non-exclusive grant of immunity from suit under foreign patents or patents issued on foreign applications for patents corresponding to any United States letters patent under which the applicant is licensed.

IX.

Defendant Owens-Corning is hereby ordered and directed to furnish promptly for a period of five years from the date of this judgment and at a purely nominal charge, to each person who is licensed pursuant to the provisions of Articles VI or VII of this judgment, and who makes written request therefor in connection with the manufacture or intended manufacture in the United States of glass fibers or glass fiber products, a written manual or manuals describing all the methods, processes, materials and machinery employed by Owens-Corning at the date of entry of this judgment in the commercial production of glass fibers and glass fiber products manufactured by it involving the use of the licensed inventions. Defendant Owens-Corning is further ordered to compile and furnish annually, at the end of each of the five years following upon the entry of this judgment, at a charge (which shall be nil as to any applicant paying royalties to defendant Owens-Corning and reasonable as to other applicants) to each such applicant upon request, any written amendments or supplements to said manuals necessary to assure that the manual or manuals accurately and completely describes all the methods, processes, materials and machinery then currently employed by Owens-Corning in the commercial production of glass fibers and glass fiber products manufactured by it involving the use of the licensed inventions. In the event that any such person shall find the information set forth in any such manual, or in any supplement or amendment thereto, inadequate to enable successful utilization by that person of any of the methods, processes, materials or machinery described therein, and such person shall so inform Owens-Corning, then defendant Owens-Corning is ordered and directed to furnish promptly such additional written information as shall be reasonably necessary to the successful utilization thereof. Owens-Corning may require that such manuals, amendments and supplements thereto, and additional written information shall be returned upon said person entirely discontinuing the manufacture of glass fibers or glass fiber products.

Defendant Owens-Corning is hereby enjoined and restrained from:

(1) Entering into, carrying out or performing any contract, agreement or understanding with any person by the terms of which such person agrees or undertakes to refrain from the manufacture, sale or distribution of glass fibers or glass fiber products;

(2) Selling or supplying glass fibers or glass fiber products to any person on the condition, agreement or understanding that such person purchase or obtain glass fibers or glass fiber products only from Owens-Corning, or that such person refrain from purchasing or obtaining glass fibers or glass fiber products from any person other than Owens-Corning;

(3) Fixing, establishing, adhering to or maintaining arbitrary, unreasonable or discriminatory prices, discounts or other terms or conditions of sale with the purpose of suppressing or injuring competition in the manufacture, sale or distribution of glass fibers or glass fiber products.

(4) Entering into, performing or carrying out any contract, agreement or understanding with any other manufacturer of glass fibers or glass fiber products with respect to prices, discounts or other terms or conditions of sale of any glass fibers or glass fiber products.

XI.

[Purchase of Assets or Securities Enjoined]

Each of the defendants Owens-Illinois and Corning, so long as it owns or controls any shares of stock or other financial interest in Owens-Corning, and defendant Owens-Corning, is hereby enjoined and restrained from acquiring, directly or indirectly, any ownership interest, by purchase or acquisition of assets or of securities or otherwise, in any person engaged in whole or in part of the manufacture, sale or distribution of glass fibers or glass fiber products in the United States, or from leasing, or from acquiring any control over, any such person.

XII.

Defendant Owens-Corning shall cause each of its officers, directors, or employees, and of its subsidiaries, who is serving as officer, director or employee of any other defendant, or subsidiary of such defendant, within 30 days from the entry of this judgment, to sever his connections from such other defendant or subsidiary. Thereafter each defendant is enjoined and restrained from causing, authorizing or knowingly permitting any of its officers, directors, or employees, or of its subsidiaries, to serve as an officer, director, or employee of any other defendant or subsidiary thereof.

XIII.

[Control of Commercial Policy Enjoined]

Each of the defendants, Owens-Illinois and Corning, is hereby enjoined and restrained, so long as it is entitled to vote any of the shares of the capital stock of Owens-Corning, from:

(A) Participating in, controlling, directing or influencing in any manner whatsoever any act or commercial policy of Owens-Corning except with respect to the matters as to which stock can be voted as set forth in this Article;

(B) Exercising the right to vote any stock of Owens-Corning for any purpose other than (1) the election or removal of directors, subject to the provisions of Sections C and D of this Article; and (2) such necessary business acts as, under Owens-Corning's certificate of incorporation, require the vote of the stock of Owens-Illinois and Corning and are approved by the Attorney General, provided that, upon disapproval by the Attorney General for any reason, such vote may be exercised only if the Court shall determine that the action proposed is not inconsistent with the provisions or purposes of this judgment.

(C) Exercising the right to vote the stock of Owens-Corning for the election of any individual as a director who shall not be approved by the Court, after thirty days notice to the Attorney General, as not being affiliated with or interested in Owens-Illinois or Corning, provided, however, that once a director of Owens-Corning has been so elected, said director may be re-elected without recourse to the provisions of Section C of this Article XIII of this judgment.

(D) Exercising the right to vote the stock of Owens-Corning for the removal of any director unless the Court shall approve such proposed action after thirty days notice to the Attorney General, and refusing to vote such stock for the removal of any director of Owens-Corning of whom this Court, after notice to the defendants and opportunity for hearing, shall disapprove as being affiliated with or interested in Owens-Illinois or Corning.

XIV.

Upon 60 days' written notice to the defendants, the plaintiff may, notwithstanding this judgment, in this action, file a petition with the Court at any time after five years following the date of this judgment asking that the Court determine and adjudge whether at that time any defendant is monopolizing or is party to an unlawful monopoly of any part of the trade or commerce in glass fibers or glass fiber products among the several states or with foreign nations, and that the Court award such relief as is appropriate. This judgment shall not be construed to bar the government from prosecuting, civilly or criminally, any charge involving a new violation of the antitrust laws.

XV.

[Securing Compliance]

For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment and for no other purpose, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, upon written request of the Attorney General, or an Assistant Attorney General, and on reasonable notice to any defendant, made to its principal office, be permitted subject to any legally recognized privilege, (1) access during the office hours of said defendant to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda, and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of said defendant relating to any matters contained in this judgment, and (2) subject to the reasonable convenience of said defendant and without restraint or interference from it to interview officers or employees of said defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters; and upon request the defendant shall submit such reports in writing to the Department of Justice with respect to matters contained in this judgment as may from time to time be necessary to the enforcement of this judgment. No information obtained by the means provided in this Article shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of such Department, except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment or as otherwise required by law.

XVI.

Jurisdiction is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this judgment to apply to this Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment or for the modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, and for the purpose of the enforcement of compliance therewith and the punishment of violations thereof.

We hereby consent to the entry of the foregoing Final Judgment.

For the Plaintiff: Herbert A. Bergson, Assistant Attorney General; Sigmund Tim-berg, Special Assistant to the Attorney General; Don C. Miller, United States Attorney, by Gerald P. Openlander, Asst. U. S. Attorney; George W. Wise, Edwin H. Pewett, Attorneys.

For the Defendants: Frederick M. Eaton, John Marshall Briley, Shearman & Sterling & Wright; William A. Belt, Marshall, Melhorn, Bloch & Belt; Henry H. Fowler, Fowler, Hawes & Symington, for Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corporation; Fred E. Fuller, Frank A. Harrington, Leslie Henry, Welles, Kelsey, Fuller, Cobourn & Harrington, for Owens-Illinois Glass Company; Halsey Sayles, Sayles & Evans; Ross W. Shumaker, John W. Winn, Shumaker, Loop, Kendrick & Winn, for Corning Glass Works.

In the District Court for the District of Columbia. Civil Action No. 3472-47. June 28, 1949.

Action by the United States of America against the Washington Real Estate Board and others, to enjoin alleged violations of the Sherman Act. Judgment for the defendants.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Real Estate Business—Fixing of Commissions—Labor Not a Commodity.—A civil action brought by the Government for an injunction enjoining associations of real estate boards from fixing brokerage commissions was dismissed. The Court was of the opinion that for persons engaged in a particular occupation to fix or prescribe a standard charge for their services does not alone and of itself create an unreasonable restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Act. The legal right of those who toil for wages to combine to regulate the compensation to be charged by them for their own services applies also to persons who work for commissions. A different problem might be presented if the rates fixed were shown to be unreasonable or oppressive in themselves or if it appeared that they resulted in a substantial diminution of competition or otherwise created an unreasonable restraint of trade or commerce.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1021.221, 1220.194, 1230.101, 1280.101, 1610.612, and the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2026.10.

For the plaintiff: Victor H. Kramer, Herbert N. Maletz and C. Heyward Belser, all of Washington, D. C.

For the defendants National Association of Real Estate Boards and Herbert U. Nelson: Roger J. Whiteford and Jo V. Morgan, Jr., both of Washington, D. C.

For the defendants Washington Real Estate Board and others: William E. Leahy and William J. Hughes, both of Washington, D. C.

For the defendant J. Hawley Smith: A. K. Shipe, of Washington, D. C.

Opinion

HOLTZOFF, District Judge:—This is a civil action by the United States for an injunction to restrain the defendants from continuing alleged violations of the Sherman Antitrust Act. The suit is brought under Section 3 of the Act, U. S. Code, Title 15, Section 3. The pertinent portions of this section are as follows:

> "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce in the District of Columbia is declared illegal."

[Parties]

The defendants in this case are, first, the Washington Real Estate Board, which is a corporation having its place of business in the District of Columbia. Other defendants are members of the Board, who are sued as a class, a few of the members being named as representatives of the class. Finally, there is also joined as a defendant the National Association of Real Estate Boards, which is a corporation having its principal place of business in Chicago, Illinois. The National Association comprises among its members various local real estate boards, and the Washington Real Estate Board is one of these members.

[Argument]

The Government contends that the defendants have combined to fix real estate brokerage commissions to be charged by real estate brokers in the District of Columbia. The Government urges that this activity constitutes a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

[Evidence Reviewed]

In brief, the evidence shows that the membership of the Washington Board embraces about 250 real estate brokers out of a total number of about 2,000 brokers operating in the District of Columbia. The Washington Board has for many years prescribed fixed rates of commissions to be paid to brokers on sales of real property. The rates are published and are readily available to the public. All members of the Board are urged to use these rates. Actually, both members and many nonmembers employ them. There is nothing clandestine or surreptitious about this activity of the Washington Board. The National Association has been joined as a defendant on the theory that it has encouraged and has incited the Washington Board to fix and prescribe rates of commissions to be charged by the members of the latter.

In 1943 the rates were changed, resulting in higher charges in many instances and in lower commissions in other situations. In actual practice, the prescribed rates of commissions are used in the great majority of transactions, although at times, in exceptional situations, a lower charge is made than that prescribed by the Board. For example, smaller commissions than the standard rate have been charged in connection with large developments comprising a great many homes.

[No Evidence of Unreasonable Restraint]

No evidence has been introduced tending to show that the standard rate of commissions prescribed by the Washington Board is unreasonable or excessive or that this activity unduly or unreasonably restrains competition as between brokers or adversely affects the sales of real property. On the contrary, there is evidence in the record to the effect that before the Board attempted to fix standard commission rates there was chaos and confusion, resulting in occasional overcharges on the part of the less scrupulous members of the craft, and that one of the purposes of the Board was to eliminate this undesirable condition. The Government contends, however, that irrespective of whether it is reasonable or laudable, the fixing of commission rates is illegal per se and constitutes a violation of the Sherman Act.

[Rule of Reason]

Ever since the decisions of the Supreme Court in Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, and United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, it has been consistently held that the Sherman Act does not ban all restraints of trade, but proscribes only those that are unreasonable. In the two cases to which I have referred, the Court held that the Sherman Act must be construed in the light of reason and that the rule of reason must prevail.

[Price Fixing of Personal Services v. Price Fixing of Commodities]

In recent years it has been held by the Supreme Court that price-fixing is per se an unreasonable restraint of trade and, therefore, illegal in and of itself, even under the so-called rule of reason. United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150, and United States v. Trenton Potteries Co., 273 U. S. 392. The cases in which this doctrine has been formulated and enunciated, however, involved prices of commodities and of articles of trade. This principle has never been invoked, so far at any rate, in connection with charges for personal service. There is a vast distinction in principle between fixing the prices of commodities or articles, on the one hand, and prescribing charges for personal services, on the other hand.

[Labor Not a Commodity]

A statement of the pertinent public policy in respect to personal services is to be found in the Clayton Act, U. S. Code. Title 15, Section 17. The statement is as follows:

> "The labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce."

This is a very important, basic pronouncement. The term "labor" as used in the Clayton Act is not limited to the work of manual laborers or of mechanics. It comprises intellectual labor as well. Neither is the term restricted to the work of the poor or the needy. Thus there are labor unions of mechanics, of clerks, of teachers, and of airplane pilots. Many other similar instances might be adduced. All of these organizations fix wages or salaries to be charged by their members. Such activities have never been held to form violations of the Sherman Act per se.

[Right to Contract for Personal Services]

A real estate board may in a sense be likened to a labor union of real estate brokers. Admittedly there is no case in the Federal courts that has applied to personal services the rule that the fixing of prices of commodities or articles is per se an unreasonable restraint of trade. To contract for one's personal services is a fundamental right of every man. For men to combine to regulate the compensation to be charged by them for their own services is also entirely legal. While this right has been generally recognized in respect to persons who toil for wages or salaries, no reason appears discernible why it is not equally applicable in principle to those persons who work for commissions. The instant case appears to be the first occasion in the history of the enforcement of the Sherman Act that the Government has challenged this right.

It is a matter of common knowledge that rates of commissions for brokers' services of various kinds have been openly prescribed by numerous organizations of brokers for a great many years. This activity has never been condemned as violative of the Sherman Act, and the Government has never so contended prior to this case. On the contrary, the resulting stabilization of charges and the consequent uniformity has generally been considered as being in the public interest. No reason is perceived for changing these principles as they have been heretofore understood.

[Rates Not Oppressive or Unreasonable]

The Court is of the opinion that for persons engaged in a particular occupation to fix or prescribe a standard charge for their services does not alone and of itself create an unreasonable restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Act. A different problem might be presented if the rates fixed were shown to be unreasonable or oppressive in themselves or if it appeared that they resulted in a substantial diminution of competition or otherwise created an unreasonable restraint of trade or commerce. There is no such showing or even contention in this case.

New York Fair Trade Act

Issuance of Cash Receipts—Price-Cutting Device—In an appeal taken by drug retailers, an order denying a motion to punish another retailer for contempt in violating the provisions of a judgment was reversed and the motion granted. Redeeming cash register receipts for ten per cent of their amounts, in merchandise, was held to be a price-cutting device in violation of the provision in a judgment against selling at prices lower than those established by fair trade contracts.

See the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7314, and the New York Fair Trade Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.45.

Reversing the decision of the New York Supreme Court, reported at ¶ 62,362.

For the appellants: Abraham Sarason, New York, New York.

For the respondent: Milton M. Eisenberg, New York, New York.

[Opinion]

In an action to restrain violation of contracts made under the provisions of the Fair Trade Law (art. XXIV-A, General Business Law), order denying appellants' motion to punish the respondent for contempt in violating the provisions of the judgment, reversed on the law, with $10 costs and disbursements, the motion granted, and the respondent fined $250.

[Price-Cutting Device]

In our opinion the practice of redeeming cash register receipts for ten per cent of their amounts, in merchandise, is a price cutting device in violation of the provision of the judgment against selling at prices lower than those established by Fair Trade contracts.

CARSWELL, Acting P. J. ADEL, WENZEL and MACGRATE, JJ., concur.

[Dissenting Opinion]

JOHNSTON, J., dissents and votes to affirm the order, with the following memorandum:

I agree with the majority that the practice of defendant was a violation of the injunction. However, the proof shows that the acts of defendant were not wilful but were the result of an honest mistake, based on advice of counsel given and followed in good faith. At the time defendant committed the acts in question and up to the time of the making of the order at Special Term denying the motion to punish him for contempt, the only reported cases in this and other jurisdictions held that similar acts were not a violation of the injunction or of the Fair Trade Act. (Nechamkin v. Picker, 189 Misc. 61; Weco Products Co. v. Mid-City Cut Rate Drug Stores, 55 Cal. A. 2d 684, 131 P. 2d 856; Bristol-Myers Co. v. Lit Bros. Inc., 336 Pa. 81.) The single case which up to that time had held that the act was a violation of the injunction was reported only in the New York Law Journal. (Radin's Pharmacy, Inc. v. Wolf, N. Y. L. J., May 29, 1941, p. 2431, col. 4.) Under these circumstances, where defendant could not apply to vacate or modify the injunction or seek an advisory opinion as to whether his acts were a violation of the injunction, where the law is unsettled and there is a debatable question as to whether the act complained of was actually a violation of the injunction, defendant's reliance in good faith on advice of counsel prevents punishment for contempt. (Matter of Granz, 78 App. Div. 399.) This court has consistently held that, where a defendant is guilty of no more than an honest mistake, or where the proof does not show that defendant has wilfully and contumaciously violated the provisions of an injunction order, defendant should not be punished for contempt. (Ditomasso v. Loverro, 242 App. Div. 190, 194; Palisi v. Yanarella, 76 N. Y. S. 2d 211, 218 [not officially published], affd. 272 App. Div. 1070.) To the same effect is Grant v. Johnson (272 App. Div. 1085, 3d Dept.). We have applied the same rule to motions to punish for contempt for violation of an injunction order under the Fair Trade Act. (Evans v. Stein, 269 App. Div. 1052.)

[¶ 62,445] Opinion of the Attorney General of Minnesota.

No. 417-E, addressed to James W. Clark, Commissioner, Department of Business Research and Development, by J.A.A. Burnquist, Attorney General, Charles E. Houston, Assistant Attorney General. June 17, 1949.

Minnesota Unfair Trade Practices Act

Sale of Cigarettes by Wholesaler to Retailer—Sales Below Cost—Out of State Sales.—A wholesaler located outside the state of Minnesota is governed by that state's laws forbidding sales below cost, if the sale is made within the state.

See the Minnesota Unfair Trade Practices Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8428.

Your letter of June 15 calls attention to M. S. A. 325.04, which forbids a retailer or wholesaler engaged in business within this state from selling goods at less than cost thereof to the vendor for the purpose or with the effect of injuring competitors and destroying competition.

You also refer to L. 1947, C. 619, Sec. 4, M. S. A. 297.04. This is the cigarette tax law. It is there provided in Subd. 3 that a person without this state who ships or transports cigarettes to retailers in this state, to be sold by those retailers, may obtain from the commissioner of taxation a license as a distributor of cigarettes. Subd. 5 is authority to such licensee to engage in business as a distributor or sub-jobber of cigarettes at the place of business shown in his application.

You ask the question.

Are wholesalers or jobbers, located outside the state, who have complied with the licensing provision last mentioned, required to comply with Sec. 325.04, supra?

Opinion

Sec. 325.04 is directed against the making of certain sales. If the sale is made in Minnesota, this section applies. If the sale is made in another state, it does not apply. The laws of Minnesota can have no force beyond its borders under such a statute. For example, if a retailer in Minnesota writes a letter to the wholesaler in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and gives him an order for the purchase of cigarettes and the wholesaler at Milwaukee fills that order, received by mail at Milwaukee, it is a Milwaukee contract and is not controlled by Sec. 325.04. But if the Milwaukee wholesaler has an office in Minnesota and the business transacted is done at that office so that the contract is made in Minnesota, then, of course, Sec. 325.04 applies. There are other circumstances under which the contract might be considered a Minnesota contract. So, the first point is to determine where the sale was made.

[¶ 62,446] John A. Allgair v. Glenmore Distilleries Company, Incorporated, New England Wine & Liquor Co., Conway Liquor Co., Inc., Conway Company, Inc. and American Beverage Co.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil 49-603. June 28, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Basis of Jurisdiction—Transacting Business—Motion to Dismiss Denied.—In a suit brought by a New Jersey corporation against various liquor companies for violation of the antitrust laws, a motion made by two Massachusetts corporations to dismiss the action and quash service of the summons for lack of jurisdiction was denied. It appeared from the affidavits filed that parts of the transactions that gave rise to the action took place within the jurisdiction of the Court. It was found that the New York company which sold the cases of whiskey acted for the Massachusetts vendors as well as for itself.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2032.55.

For the plaintiff: Jay Leo Rothschild, New York, New York.

For the defendant: Breed, Abbott & Morgan, New York, New York.

[Nature of Motion]

LEIBELL, D. J.: Two of the defendants, New England Wine & Liquor Co. and Conway Company, Inc., have made identical motions to dismiss the action and to quash the service of the summons for lack of jurisdiction over the person of said defendants on the grounds that (1) the defendants are Massachusetts corporations and are inhabitants of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; (2) that they do not transact business within the State of New York or the Southern District of New York; and (3) that the defendants have not appointed an agent for the service of process and are not subject to service of process within the State of New York or Southern District of New York.

[Parties in the Action]

The defendant, Glenmore Distilleries Company, Incorporated, is a Delaware corporation, but is authorized to do business within the State of New York and has an office at Rockefeller Plaza, New York City, for the transaction of business. It has appeared in the action and filed an answer and an amended answer.

The fourth defendant, American Beverage Company, has not appeared or answered. But a return of the United States Marshal from the Massachusetts District (Boston) shows that he served the summons and complaint on one Isadore Paretsky, a director of American Beverage Company, on April 7, 1947, and that on the following day the summons and complaint were returned to him by Paretsky with instructions to serve them on Attorney Harry L. Margolis, now of San Francisco, California, who was the last President and Treasurer of the corporation before its dissolution in Massachusetts. The Marshal re-served Paretsky on April 14th at the direction of plaintiff's attorney.

This action, brought by plaintiff, a New Jersey corporation, is a suit by a private party for violation of the anti-trust laws. [T. 15 U.S.C.A. § 15].

Section 22 provides:—

"District in which to sue corporation. Any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found."

[Questions Raised]

There is a question raised as to whether Glenmore acted as an agent for the two moving defendants in the transactions that gave rise to this suit. There is also a question raised as to the transactions themselves, where they were initiated and carried out, by whom and for whom, and whether they were sales of merchandise by the said two defendants, New England and Conway, or so called "participations" by them in plaintiff's wholesale profit. These questions are also involved in the merits of the controversy itself.

[Parts of the Transactions]

Enough appears from the affidavits submitted, especially from the exhibits annexed to plaintiff's affidavit, to show that parts of the transactions did take place within this Southern District of New York, that they related to cases of whiskey claimed to be owned by New England and Conway (Exs. A, B, and J), having been sold to them by Glenmore (as Glenmore's original answer admitted). Plaintiff's dealings were with and through Glenmore here in New York City. I am satisfied that for these transactions Glenmore acted for New England and Conway as well as for itself. In these deals New England and Conway were transacting business in New York City, within this Southern District of New York. [Eastman Kodak Co. v. Southern Photo Materials Co., 273 U. S. 359 at p. 373, and United States v. Scophony Corp., 333 U. S. 795 at p. 808.]

As those cases indicate, all that is involved here is the question of venue. For reasons stated above this suit may be brought here.

[Motion Denied]

The motion is to quash the service and to dismiss. There is no contention that the wrong person was served or that there was any defect in the service. Indeed the file indicates that the attorneys for these two defendants are appearing only specially until the motion is decided. Even if this were the wrong venue the Court would not be obliged to dismiss the action but could transfer it to the proper venue under T. 28, U. S. C., § 1406.

The defendants' motions are in all respects denied.

[¶ 62,447] United States v. Schine Chain Theatres, Inc., et al.

In the United States District Court for the Western District of New York. Civil Action No. 223. June 24, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Theatre Operation—Consent Judgment—Practices Enjoined.—In a civil antitrust suit which alleged monopolization of theatre operations, a theatre circuit, its affiliated companies and individual officers consented to a judgment which ordered disposition of forty theatres, laid down conditions under which films were to be bought and licensed, and enjoined practices and the performance of agreements which eliminated independent competition.

In order to create substantial motion picture theatre operating competition, specified properties were ordered to be conveyed to persons who would use them as motion picture theatres. Provision was made for leasing of theatres provided that no covenant based upon a share of the profits of the theatre was included in the lease. The company was enjoined from acquiring any financial or operating interest in additional theatres unless such acquisition would not unreasonably restrain competition.

When buying pictures, the theatre circuit was prohibited from combining open and closed towns to increase its buying power. The number of first-run pictures to be taken by the chain was curtailed to a stipulated percentage of all pictures released. Licenses were ordered to be taken on a single-theatre basis and free of restrictive conditions not available to competitors.

The decree enjoined the following practices: attempting to control the admission price charged by others by agreement with distributors or demands made upon distributors, demanding or receiving any clearance over theatres not in substantial competition, entering into any licensing agreement for more than one picture season and covering the exhibition of pictures released by one distributor during the entire period of agreement, measuring a license fee by a specified percentage of the feature's national gross, operating theatres normally in competition as a unit, enforcing any agreement not to compete or restrict the use of real estate to non-theatrical purposes, preventing a competitor from acquiring or operating a theatre and cutting admission prices to prevent independent competition.

Consent Decree as to Schine Defendants

JOHN KNIGHT, District Judge: The plaintiff, the United States of America, having filed its Second Amended Complaint herein, and all the defendants having appeared and severally filed their answers to such complaint, denying the substantive allegations thereof, the Court after trial having entered a decree herein consisting of a judgment dated October 31, 1945, an Amended Judgment dated March 29, 1946, and an Order of Divestiture dated July 2, 1946; the defendants having appealed from such decree; the Supreme Court having in part affirmed and in part reversed such decree, and having remanded this cause to this Court for further proceedings in conformity with its opinion dated May 3, 1948, and this Court having, on August 13, 1948 entered an order vacating certain parts of its decree, findings of facts and conclusion of law, affirming other parts thereof, and providing for further proceedings pursuant to the Mandate and Opinion of the Supreme Court, and no further testimony or evidence having been taken after the remand of this cause; and no decision having been rendered by this Court after said remand upon the issues to be determined upon said remand, and all parties hereto, by their respective attorneys, having severally consented to the entry of this final judgment without admission by the defendants in respect to any such issue to be determined on remand.

It is hereby Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed:

[Previous Decree Superseded]

I

This judgment shall supersede the provisions for relief contained in the previous decrees of this Court.

[Practices Enjoined]

II

The Schine defendants, their officers, agents, servants, and employees are each hereby enjoined:

1. From combining open and closed towns in buying pictures for theatres operated by them or any one or more of them.

2. Except for the towns of Amsterdam, N. Y.; Glens Falls, N. Y.; Salisbury, Md.; Buffalo, N. Y.; and Syracuse, N. Y., from licensing for a period of three years from July 1, 1949 (or, in the case of a locality where a theatre is required to be divested pursuant to the provisions of paragraph IV, for a period of three years from the date possession of a theatre in operating condition is taken):

a. More than 60% [1] of the feature films released by the major distributors for first run [2] exhibition in any fiscal year, except as to pictures for which competitors who have had an opportunity to request licenses have not made an offer or have made an insubstantial offer; [3] and

b. More than 48 [4] feature films from among the eighty pictures constituting the aggregate of the ten pictures released by each of the major distributors, respectively, for first run [2] exhibition in any fiscal year, which are allocated by the respective distributor to its highest selling bracket or brackets, except as to pictures for which competitors who have had an opportunity to request licenses have not made an offer or have made an insubstantial offer.[3]

3. From attempting to control the admission prices charged by others by agreement with distributors, demands made upon distributors, or by any means whatsoever.

4. From demanding or receiving any clearance over theatres not in substantial competition.

5. From demanding or receiving any clearance over theatres in substantial competition with the theatre receiving the license for exhibition in excess of what is reasonably necessary to protect the licensee in the run granted. Upon request or complaint made by an exhibitor to the Schine defendants, or notice received by the Schine defendants of a request or complaint made to a distributor, that the clearance held by a Schine theatre over his theatre is unreasonable, the defendants agree to procure, from each of the major distributors from whom they license film, a review of the reasonableness of such clearance. Before such review shall be undertaken, written notice shall be given to the exhibitor affected, which notice shall advise such exhibitor that he may present his views orally or in writing to the distributor as to what, if any, clearance he deems reasonable. The defendants also agree, with respect to any complaint of unreasonable clearance, to submit upon request by the complainant the same to arbitration before any impartial arbitrator for determination, and decision of such arbitrator shall be binding upon the parties. Nothing herein shall prejudice the plaintiff or the exhibitor, in any court or arbitration proceeding in which the reasonableness of any clearance is in issue.

6. From asking or knowingly receiving, in the licensing of feature films for any theatre operated by the Schine defendants, discriminatory terms or conditions not available to competitors.

7. From licensing any feature for exhibition upon any run in any theatre in any other manner than that each license shall be offered and taken theatre by theatre, solely upon the merits.

8. From making any franchise agreements. The term "franchise" as used herein means a licensing agreement or series of licensing agreements, entered into as a part of the same transaction, in effect for more than one motion picture season and covering the exhibition of pictures released by one distributor during the entire period of agreement.

9. From making any formula deal or master agreement. The term "formula deal" as used herein means a licensing agreement with a circuit of theatres in which the license fee of a given feature is measured for the theatres covered by the agreement by a specified percentage of the feature's national gross. The term "master agreement" means

[1] For towns where defendants shall have two or more theatres and there is first run competition, substitute "two thirds."

[2] For the City of Rochester, N. Y., substitute "second run" for "first run."

[3] As to towns where Schine has competitors who desire first run feature films and in which there is a theatre to be divested, this limitation shall take effect not later than July 1, 1952.

[4] For towns where defendants shall have two or more theatres and there is first run competition, substitute "53."

a licensing agreement, also known as a "blanket deal", covering the exhibition of features in a number of theatres usually comprising a circuit.

10. From conditioning the licensing of films in any competitive situation upon the licensing of films in any other situation.

11. From making or continuing to perform pooling agreements whereby given theatres of two or more exhibitors normally in competition are operated as a unit or whereby the business policies of such exhibitors are collectively determined by a joint committee or by one of the exhibitors or whereby profits of the "pooled" theatres are divided among the owners according to pre-arranged percentages.

12. From enforcing any existing agreements not to compete, or to restrict the use of any real estate to non-theatrical purposes.

13. From using any threats or deception as a means whereby a competitor is induced to sell or is prevented from acquiring or operating a theatre.

14. From buying or booking films for any theatre other than those in which the Schine defendants own a financial interest.

15. From cutting admission prices for the purpose of eliminating or preventing the competition of independent competitors.

16. From continuing any contract, conspiracy, or combination with each other or with any other person which has the purpose or effect of maintaining the exhibition or theatre monopolies of the defendants or of preventing any other theatre or exhibitor from competing with the defendants or any of them, and from entering into any similar contract, conspiracy, or combination for the purpose or with the effect of restraining or monopolizing trade and commerce between the States.

[Pooling Arrangements Dissolved]

III

The existing pooling arrangements at Fostoria and Medina, Ohio, and Syracuse, New York, shall be dissolved.[5] Such dissolution in Fostoria and Medina may be effected either by dissolution of the respective corporations through which the defendants' theatre interests in these towns are jointly held with non-defendants and return of the theatres involved to the respective stockholders who owned them prior to the formation of the corporation or by a sale of the defendants' stock in such corporations. In the event that said corporations have not been dissolved as outlined above by August 15, 1949, the defendants' stock therein shall be sold to the other parties to the pool or to a party other than a defendant or owned or controlled by or affiliated with or related to defendants.

[Disposition of Property Ordered]

IV

A. For the purpose of creating substantial motion picture theatre operating competition in the localities hereinafter listed where the plaintiff claims that no competition or no substantial or adequate competition now exists or did exist during the years covered by the evidence and findings of fact in this cause, the Schine defendants shall dispose of all of the interest of each or any of the defendants in the following properties to persons who will use them as motion picture theatres[6] within three years from the date of the entry of this judgment, and shall entertain offers for the purchase of such theatres at any time. As to at least one-third of said properties such disposition shall be completed within one year from such date, and as to at least two-thirds of the said properties such disposition shall be completed within two years from such date. Each such disposition shall be to a party other than a defendant or owned or controlled by or affiliated with or related to a defendant, and shall be subject to the approval of this Court, upon notice to the Attorney General. The Schine defendants are also ordered and directed to comply with the other directions contained in the following tabulation:—

[5] The original order of the District Court directing the dissolution of the pool at Syracuse, New York, dated July 5, 1946, has been complied with in a manner approved by the District Court on August 18, 1947.

[6] The following properties, which the Schine defendants have certified either have never been used for theatre purposes or have not been so used for a long period of time and are not equipped or adaptable for use as such, need not be subject to the requirement of disposition for use as motion picture theatres:

B. As to such of the theatres required to be disposed of under this judgment as defendants have been unable to sell on reasonable terms, defendants, upon application to the Court in any such case and with the approval of the Court first obtained, may lease or sublease the same to a party not a defendant herein or owned or controlled by or related to or affiliated with a defendant herein; on condition, however, that no such lease or sublease shall contain any rental provisions based upon a share of the profits of the theatre covered by the lease or any other theatre; and further on condition that defendants shall thereafter sell their interest in any such theatre so leased or subleased as soon thereafter as they can do so upon reasonable terms and in any event prior to the expiration of such lease or sublease. Approval of the Court to lease such theatres shall not be obtained without a prior showing of due diligence on the part of the defendants to sell the theatres.

V

A. The Schine defendants are hereby enjoined from acquiring any financial or operating interest in any additional theatres except after an affirmative showing that such acquisition will not unreasonably restrain competition. Such showing shall be made before this Court upon reasonable notice to the Attorney General at Washington, D. C.

[7] In lieu of selling one theatre in each town, defendants may dispose of both theatres in either town.

[8] If the ownership and operation of either the Vernon Theatre or the Memorial Theatre shall be permanently disposed of to a person who (1) will use it as a motion picture theatre, (2) is not a defendant or owned or controlled by or affiliated with or related to a defendant, and (3) is not an exhibitor now operating in Mt. Vernon, the Vine Theatre need not be disposed of.

[9] In lieu of disposing of any theatre in Cambridge defendants may dispose of both theatres in Easton.

B. Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to prevent the Schine defendants from acquiring interests in theatres (other than those required to be disposed of hereunder).

a. As a substantially equivalent replacement for theatres held or acquired in conformity with this judgment which may be lost through physical destruction or conversion to non-theatrical purposes, or

b. In renewing leases covering any theatres held or acquired in conformity with this judgment or in acquiring an additional interest in any such theatre under lease, or

c. As a substantially equivalent replacement for any theatre held or acquired in conforming with this judgment which has been lost through inability to obtain a renewal of the lease thereof upon reasonable terms, if the defendants shall show to the Court and the Court shall find that such acquisition shall not unduly restrain competition.

C. The term "acquisition" or "acquiring", as used in this judgment, shall include, without limitation, construction, or completion of construction, of theatres.

[For the Purpose of Compliance]

VI

A. For the purpose of securing compliance with this decree, and for no other purpose, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, on written request of the Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of antitrust matters, and on notice to any defendant, reasonable as to time and subject matter, made to such defendant at its principal office, and subject to any legally recognized privilege , (1) be permitted reasonable access, during the office hours of such defendant, to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda, and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of such defendant, relating to any of the matters contained in this decree, and that during the times that the plaintiff shall desire such access, counsel for such defendant may be present, and (2) subject to the reasonable convenience of such defendant, and without restraint or interference from it, be permitted to interview its officers or employees regarding any such matters, at which interview counsel for the officer or employee interviewed and counsel for such defendant company may be present. For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment any defendant, upon written request of the Attorney General, or an Assistant Attorney General, shall submit such reports with respect to any of the matters contained in this decree as from time to time may be necessary for the purpose of enforcement of this decree.

B. Information obtained pursuant to the provisions of this section shall not be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Department of Justice, except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States is a party, or as otherwise required by law.

VII

Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this consent decree to apply to the Court at any time for such orders or direction as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction, modification, or carrying out of the same, for the enforcement of compliance therewith, and for the punishment of violations thereof, or for other or further relief.

We hereby consent to the foregoing Judgment.

[¶ 62,448] State of Wisconsin v. Retail Gasoline Dealers Association of Milwaukee, Inc., et al.

In the State of Wisconsin Circuit Court, Milwaukee County. No. 213-601. May 11, 1949.

Wisconsin Statutes on Trusts and Monopolies

Activities of Retail Gasoline Dealers' Association—Price-Fixing Conspiracy—Corporate Charter Annulled.—In an action instituted by the Attorney General of Wisconsin, the corporate charter of an association formed to promote the interests of retail gasoline dealers was cancelled. In ordering both the organization and its officers to forfeit certain sums of money, the Court declared that they had violated the several provisions of Section 133.01 of the Wisconsin statutes by becoming parties to an unlawful combination in restraint of trade and by engaging in concerted action to fix, maintain and control the retail price of gasoline. The fact that the combination was engaged in the promotion of the interests of the trade, or was seeking to eliminate competitive evils, or was exercising a stabilizing control over prices did not constitute a legal justification for price-fixing activity which was held to be inherently illegal.

See the Wisconsin statutes on Trusts and Monopolies, Vol. 2, ¶ 8955.

For the plaintiff: Thomas E. Fairchild, Attorney General; Leonard Bessman, Assistant Attorney General, both of Madison, Wis.; William J. McCauley, District Attorney in and for Milwaukee, Wis.; Henry Wozniak, Assistant District Attorney, Milwaukee, Wis.

For the defendants: John C. McBride, Alois K. Voissem, Roman H. Pitz, all of Milwaukee, Wis.

Decision

CHAS. L. AARONS, Judge: In this action the State charges in its complaint that between January 1, 1944 and the time of filing the complaint the defendants severally and the retail gasoline dealers in Milwaukee County represented by the defendants as a class "engaged in an unlawful combination, conspiracy or agreement intended to restrain and prevent competition in the retail sale price of gasoline sold in the county of Milwaukee"; and that "said combination and conspiracy did control, raise and fix the retail sale price of gasoline sold in the county of Milwaukee, Wisconsin and did illegally restrain commerce and trade within the State of Wisconsin, contrary to the provisions of section 133.01" of the Wisconsin statutes (paragraph 20). The complaint sets forth in effect that pursuant to said conspiracy the defendants did restrain commerce and prevent competition by agreeing to fix and fixing certain uniform and increased prices to be charged the general public per gallon for certain grades of gasoline in six specific instances (on and between March 12, 1947 and January 6, 1948) as indicated in paragraph 22 of the complaint.

The answers of the defendant Retail Gasoline Dealers Association of Milwaukee, Inc. (hereinafter referred to as the "Association") and of the other defendants who are officers and directors of such Association specifically deny the several allegations pertaining to the alleged conspiracy, combination and agreement and deny that there was any intention to restrain and prevent competition in the retail sale price of gasoline sold in Milwaukee County.

As a separate defense the defendant Association sets forth that it and the directors of such Association are exempt from the provisions of section 133.01 by section 133.04 of the Wisconsin statutes in that said Association is an organization intended to, and that it does, legitimately promote the interests of trade, commerce and manufacturing in the State of Wisconsin.

A separate answer by the defendant Lester Kleinmann embodies the denials and defenses set forth by the other individual defendants; and adds as a separate defense that he was not a director of the Association until a time subsequent to the time of the offenses charged in the complaint.

It was conceded that all of the individual defendants except Louis M. Faber (the executive secretary of the Association) have been engaged in the retail sale of gasoline in Milwaukee County.

On May 14, 1948, upon order of the Circuit Court of Milwaukee County and pursuant to application made by the State, the defendant Association and all of the individual defendants named in the complaint (except the defendants Kenneth Grundmann and Al Volz) were temporarily restrained from taking part in any manner in any conspiracy, combination or agreement to fix, maintain or increase the price of gasoline sold at retail in Milwaukee County.

The action was tried on November 29th and 30th and December 1st, 1948. Thereafter arguments and briefs were submitted by counsel for the parties.

[Documentary Evidence]

The documentary evidence produced by the State includes the Articles of Organization of the Association and a number of written communications in the form of notices and bulletins issued by the Association. The State also called Louis M. Faber, the executive secretary of the Association, as an adverse witness and a number of gasoline dealers who received the communications issued by the Association. There was also oral testimony given by investigators employed by the State.

It appeared from the Articles of Organization of the Association that it was organized as a Wisconsin corporation in 1933. Included among the business purposes of the corporation are the following:

> "To buy, sell, and generally deal in automobile accessories, tires, batteries, alcohol, gasoline, lubricating oil, motor fuel, grease, kerosene, heating oil, and all petroleum products and merchandise of like character and description for and on behalf of its members.
> "To promote and further the best interests of all persons who are engaged in the business of conducting, operating, and maintaining gasoline filling and service stations who are now, or who shall hereafter become members of this association and to do any and all acts which may tend to promote and protect the interests of its members, and in connection therewith to provide a uniform system of accounting to all members of such association and to furnish advice, assistance and information relative to collections, credits, advertising, and statistics and to do all things incident to the efficient conduct of the members' business and to do all valid acts which tend to put the business of its members on a more profitable, efficient and economical basis and for such purpose and in connection with such business to hold, possess, purchase, lease, mortgage, and convey real and personal property, enter into contracts and in general do any and all things and exercise any and all powers necessary or convenient for the accomplishment of any of said business." (Article I)

Such corporation was organized as a nonstock association, it being provided that no dividends or pecuniary profits shall be declared to the members. The Articles provide, among other things, that members of the Association shall be such as are engaged in the business of selling at retail or wholesale such articles of merchandise as are enumerated in paragraph 2 of Article I of the Articles and who shall pay the fees and dues prescribed by the board of directors.

The communications which were issued by the Association were, except as otherwise designated, transmitted to all retail gasoline dealers in Milwaukee County. Some of them were signed in the name of the Association; others were signed by the corporate secretary, defendant Robert E. Dunford. (T. 28, 35*) All of them were prepared by Louis M. Faber, the executive secretary. (T. 117, 118, 119)

On January 17, 1946 a notice (Exhibit 10) was sent "To All Service Station Operators," which began with a statement: "This is a report to you on the recent price discussion." The substance of the notice is that there were rumors of dealers and supplying companies "having difficulty in maintaining the gasoline prices that have been posted for the past few years"; and that such rumors have been checked and have been found to be in error. It was stated therein: "The over-whelming majority of dealers did not change their prices"; and that a few dealers were misinformed and lowered their posted prices but returned to their former level "upon clarification of the sitution." The letter concludes:

> "We are now checking all rumors and suggest that prices remain at the old postings.
> "In any case should the condition warrant a suggested change you will be informed by this association." (T. 36, 37)

In explanation of Exhibit 10 the testimony of Faber, given on adverse examination, was, in part, to the effect that a few dealers had complained that there were "bad competitive conditions," or that somebody was selling "at a price that was bad," or "at a different price." (T. 37, 38)

On February 1, 1946 the defendant Dunford, as secretary of the Association, sent a letter (Exhibit 11) addressed "to All Shell Dealers." This letter calls attention to the fact that salesmen for the Shell Company were encouraging many of their lessees to reduce their selling price of gasoline. The argument is made in the letter that the supplying company has no legal control over the price charged by the dealer and urges upon the dealer the necessity of "a greater margin of profit." (T. 40)

On July 25, 1946 a notice (Exhibit 12) addressed "To All Retailers of Gasoline," signed by Robert E. Dunford as secretary of the Association, again calls attention to prices, saying that some dealers at times "have been selling their gasoline at almost unheard of prices." It refers to an impending price cut by stations selling Clark's Super Gas but urges:

> "Every dealer is asked to sit tight at his present prices.
> "We are watching this situation very carefully and hope that no dealer will make any price move until he is informed by this association on what to do.
> "For your own salvation, don't make any move, regardless of what any oil company tells you until you hear from us." (T. 41, 42)

On August 12, 1946 the Association held a regular monthly meeting in which, among other things, there appeared the following:

> "Unfinished Business:
> "Faber gave a complete analysis of the dealer's margin in comparison with increased wholesale and retail prices of gasoline and also what the additional margins mean to stations averaging the different amounts of gasoline and how many years of dues the dealers could pay with just their increased earnings during the year of 1946." (Exhibit 15) (T. 44)

On January 1, 1947 the Association issued a bulletin (Exhibit 13) which, among other things, contains an item entitled "Gasoline Prices Up." In the discussion concerning prices under that heading the statement is made:

> "In checking over prices over a span of years, we find that gasoline prices at the present time are the highest that they have ever been for over 20 years. This high price is not attributable to dealers' activities alone. * * * We hope that some day these prices will level off." * * * (T. 42)

On April 19, 1947 the Association issued a bulletin (Exhibit 14) in which, under the heading "Gasoline Prices" the statement is made: "Since the end of the war the prevailing retail prices have increased 3.3¢ per gallon." It also states: "The continuous increase in the tank wagon prices, particularly in gasoline, has brought the prices up to quite a high level." The item contains the further statement:

> "When prices began to rise and it was suggested that dealers increase their margins by 4/10 of a cent per gallon, some of the supplying oil companies put up a tremendous howl and, in fact, intimidated and coerced dealers from taking this 4/10 of a cent margin. Considering that the supplying oil companies have taken 75.8% of the 3.3¢ increase in prices, they haven't done so badly!" (T. 43)

On March 12, 1947 a notice (Exhibit 4) issued by the defendant Association, addressed "To All Gasoline Retailers," stated in effect that the tank wagon price on all grades of gasoline will be increased by one-half cent on a designated day. The notice adds: "It is suggested that dealers pass along this increase by raising their retail prices by the same amount." This is followed by a schedule of "the prevailing prices" on premium, regular and third grade gasoline. (T. 14)

A similar notice addressed "To All Retailers," dated March 24, 1947 (Exhibit 5), announcing a tank wagon price increase, suggested an increase in the retail prices by the same amount "to compensate for the increase." (T. 16)

Shortly before October 13, 1947 a notice (Exhibit 6) purporting to be signed by Robert E. Dunford, secretary, addressed "To All Retailers of Gasoline," was sent to all members of the Association and, likewise, generally mailed to non-members together with an application form for membership on the reverse side of the notice. The notice announces an increase of the tank wagon or wholesale price of all grades of gasoline to cover a 3/10 of a cent per gallon increase in freight rates. The notice also states:

> "It is suggested that you increase your retail price postings on all grades of gasoline by 6/10¢ per gallon. This will give the retailer a much needed additional 3/10¢ per gallon margin, in addition to recovering his increased costs in the tank wagon price, due to a freight increase."

This is followed by the statement that "Prices on almost everything have gone up," and seeks to justify the dealers in adding "some additional margin to cover increased costs of operation." The notice contains a schedule of "the prevailing price of gasoline" for ethyl (or premium), regular and third grade gasoline. The notice also contains a suggestion of an increase of the retail prices of certain types of anti-freeze. (T. 19, 20)

On October 21, 1947, a notice (Exhibit 7) purporting to be signed by Robert E. Dunford, secretary, addressed "To All Gasoline Retailers," is to the effect that the tank wagon or wholesale price of all grades of gasoline will go up 8/10 of a cent per gallon on the day designated. It also states:

> "It is suggested that all retailers increase their prices at their pumps by 8/10¢ per gallon so as to recover this new increase in your cost. This suggested increase of 8/10¢ is in addition to the 6/10¢ per gallon suggested increase of last week."

The notice also contains a schedule of "Suggested Posted Prices" for the various grades of gasoline. The notice contains the further statement:

> "This increase is all for the benefit of your supplier. If there still is any dealer whose conscience bothered him last week when it was suggested that he increase his margins by 3/10¢, he certainly should have a change of mind, when he sees the suppliers now grab 8/10¢ at one crack.
> "Why should you collect additional money for the railroads and the oil companies without occasionally getting some to cover your increased costs? These increases are generally explained by stating that they are to cover increased costs—you have them too." * * * (T. 27)

On December 15, 1947 a notice (Exhibit 8) purporting to be signed by Robert E. Dunford, secretary, addressed "To Retailers of Gasoline," calls attention to an increase in the tank wagon, or wholesale, price of gasoline and suggests "that retailers of gasoline increase their retail price posting on all grades of gasoline by 2¢ per gallon." It further states:

> "This suggested increase in the posted price will cover the 1½¢ increase in the tank wagon price, and provide for a much needed additional ½¢ per gallon margin for the dealer."

It contains further discussion in justification of the increase by reason of increases in all costs in the operation of a service station and in the cost of living. The notice schedules "the prevailing price" of several grades of gasoline (including the suggested increase). The notice was sent both to members of the Association and to non-members. The reverse side of the notice contains a form of application for membership in the Association headed by a drawing representing a chef in the act of tasting some palatable preparation contained in a kettle designated "Results." Underneath this illustration appears the legend: "You Have Tasted the Results of an Active Association. Now Is the Time to Join." (Exhibit 8 (Reverse side) and T. 30, 31.)

On January 6, 1948 an unsigned postal card notice (Exhibit 9) was issued by the Association, addressed "To All Gasoline Dealers," which suggested that "retailers of gasoline increase their price postings on all grades by .3¢ to recover the increase in tank wagon prices." (T. 32)

In addition to the notices mailed by the Association to all gasoline dealers in Milwaukee County, there is oral testimony to the effect that direct personal appeals were made by Association representatives to gasoline dealers to maintain the prices scheduled by the Association as the "prevailing prices."

[Oral Testimony]

David Boeshaar, who was employed by the Association during the summer of 1947 for the purpose of collecting dues from members and also to solicit new memberships, testified that he was instructed by the defendant Louis M. Faber to say in the "sales talk" which he gave to prospective members "that if all the dealers in Milwaukee got together that they would be able to get the prices that they wanted through the organization—higher profits, that is." (T. 48)

The defendant Ray Powers, called adversely, testified that after receiving the notice of October 13, 1947 (Exhibit 6), which recommended a dealer margin increase of 3/10 of a cent in addition to the tank wagon increase of 3/10 of a cent, he did not immediately comply by adding the dealer margin increase. Thereupon he received a telephone call from the defendant Faber urging him to make the additional raise of 3/10 of a cent "so that I would . . . my price would be the same as the other stations." Thereupon, within a day or two, Powers raised his price as requested. (T. 56) Powers also gave testimony to the effect that Faber was having trouble with the Shell service stations in respect to getting them to take the 3/10 of a cent increase and that by getting Powers to "break the ice" he, Faber, "might have easier sailing with the other Shell stations to take that 3/10 of a cent increase." (T. 56, 57)

Others of the defendants, called adversely, testified that they acted upon the notices received from the Association and raised their prices accordingly.

The defendant Lester Kleinmann—one of the Association directors—called adversely, was, as the court indicated on the trial (T. 83), "inclined to do a little fencing with the counsel." When asked as to whether he followed the price recommendations of the Association, he testified:

"Well, it is a recommendation possibly that * * * is guiding to a certain extent because, after all, I assume that the Association is paying a secretary for — to do something and to figure out costs of business and operations and the like of it and the trend throughout the country, what is happening. And it certainly would be his job to try to advise as to cost of operation, because in most cases I don't believe the average filling station man sits down and figures out his costs of operation or knows whether he is losing money or making money until he is broke." (T. 83, 84.)

The witness Gerald Malone, who was a retail gasoline dealer in Milwaukee County but was not a member of the Association at the time of the trial, although he had been a member in prior years, testified that after receiving the notices from the Association pertaining to price increases he checked with his competitors in the neighborhood and that when they indicated that they were going to raise their price to the amount recommended by the Association, he also did so. "As a general rule," he said, "we went along with the price suggested." (T. 68, 69, 70.)

While there was reluctance on the part of some of the witnesses to admit that the price recommended by the Association was the sole influence, it is established beyond question that the large majority of retail gasoline dealers acquiesced in the Association's suggestions.

Exhibits 17, 18 and 22 consist of compilations of price statistics pertaining to Association and non-Association members. (T. 91, 92, 93 and 106.) It is shown by the statistics contained in these exhibits that at the time of the making of an investigation by a representative of the State employed by the Attorney General's office 90.15 per cent of the number of members of the Association were selling gasoline at the last recommended price contained in the Association notices, namely 29.4 cents for premium grade gasoline and 27.4 cents for regular grade gasoline. (T. 106 and Exhibit 22.) They also show that 55.32 per cent of the non-members of the Association who were on the Association mailing list were selling such grades of gasoline at the last Association recommended price. (T. 107.) They further show that 69.86 per cent of the total number of stations on the mailing list of the Association, including members and non-members, were at the time of such investigation selling at such last recommended price. (Exhibit 22 (summary) and T. 106, 108.)

The investigation referred to was made in July 1948. The last Association recommended price is the one contained in Exhibit 9, dated January 6, 1948, pursuant to which the retail price of premium (or ethyl) grade gasoline was scheduled at 29.4 cents per gallon and the price of regular grade gasoline at 27.4 cents per gallon. (T. 32.)

The influence of the Association's recommendations is further shown by the fact that there were 135 service stations where gasoline was sold at retail which were not on the Association mailing list, and that 72 of such stations (i. e. 53.33 per cent) were at the time of said investigation posting the exact price last recommended by the Association. (See Exhibit 21 and T. 94 and recapitulation and summary, Exhibit 22.)

When testimony regarding these statistics was introduced objection was made by defendants' counsel on the ground that the investigation by which the prices were ascertained to be as indicated was made in the month of July 1948, approximately six months after the time of the Association's last recommended prices. But it should be borne in mind that the Attorney General's inquisitorial proceeding under section 133.06 was instituted by the service of subpoenae on January 7, 1948—the day after the issuance of the Association's price suggestion of January 6, 1948—and that thereafter the present action was instituted and a temporary injunction granted. Without the evidence of such statistics, however, it appears quite conclusively that generally the price recommendations of the Association were followed.

[Defendant's Testimony]

The testimony adduced on behalf of the defendants was meager. Only the defendants Faber and Dunford were called by the defense. Their testimony was to the effect that they "did not agree with or conspire with anyone" to send out the several notices pertaining to price increases (Faber T. 116 et seq.; Dunford T. 123 et seq.); that the purpose of the notices was to give information of increases in tank wagon or wholesale prices and to quiet rumors of reductions that might result in a "price war." (T. 118 as to Exhibit 10.)

The State contends that the evidence overwhelmingly establishes serious violations of section 133.01, Wisconsin statutes.

The defendants contend: that there was no proof of a contract or combination to restrain trade or to prevent competition; that there was no intention to fix or control retail prices but merely a "passing on" to the public of wholesale price increases and the adding of a percentage of profit which was reasonable in view of increased costs imposed on the retailer. They contend that there is no evidence that the defendants were capable of controlling prices of gasoline or that they actually did control the price; that no coercion was exercised—each retail dealer being free to make his own decision. It was further contended by the defense that the defendant Association's activities were not unlawful; that they were within the exemption provision of section 133.04 pertaining to "associations or organizations intended to legitimately promote the interests of trade, commerce or manufacturing in this state."

[Statutes and Law Applicable]

The several contentions on both sides have been carefully studied in connection with the evidence and in the light of the statutes and law applicable.

Section 133.01(1) reads as follows:

"133.01 Unlawful contracts; conspiracies. (1) Every contract or combination in the nature of a trust or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce is hereby declared illegal. Every combination, conspiracy, trust, pool, agreement or contract intended to restrain or prevent competition in the supply or price of any article or commodity in general use in this state, to be produced or sold therein or constituting a subject of trade or commerce therein, or which combination, conspiracy, trust, pool, agreement or contract shall in any manner control the price of any such article or commodity, fix the price thereof, limit or fix the amount or quantity thereof to be manufactured, mined, produced or sold in this state, or fix any standard or figure in which its price to the public shall be in any manner controlled or established, is hereby declared an illegal restraint of trade. Every person, corporation, copartnership, trustee or association who shall either as principal or agent become a party to any contract, combination, conspiracy, trust, pool or agreement herein declared unlawful or declared to be in restraint of trade, or who shall combine or conspire with any other person, corporation, copartnership, association or trustee to monopolize or attempt to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce in this state shall forfeit for each such offense not less than $100 nor more than $5,000. Any such person, corporation, copartnership, trustee or association shall also be liable to any person transacting or doing business in this state for all damages he may sustain by reason of the doing of anything forbidden by this section."

It has been pointed out in Pulp Wood Co. v. Green Bay P. & F. Co., 157 Wis. 604, 625, and again in State v. Lewis and Leidersdorf Co., 201 Wis. 543, 549, that section 133.01 (formerly section 1747e) is a mere re-enactment of the first two sections of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act applied to intrastate transactions, "and that its construction is ruled by the federal decisions construing the federal statute."

Although the cases indicate occasional seeming variations in the conclusions reached by the courts as applied to specific factual situations a study of the decisions discloses that the following principles are now generally firmly adhered to in dealing with violations of the so-called "Anti-Trust Act":

[Governing Principles]

1. In order to establish the existence of an illegal combination it is not necessary to prove that those who are parties thereto have bound themselves contractually; nor that the unlawful conspiracy be formed by simultaneous action of the participants. Direct proof of an illegal combination is rarely possible. Lange v. Heckel, 171 Wis. 59, 64; Wm. Goldman Theatres v. Loews, Inc., 150 F. (2d) 738, 743.

In Interstate Circuit v. United States, 306 U. S. 208, 226-227; 83 L. Ed. 610, 620, Mr. Justice Stone, in delivering the opinion of the court, uses the following language:

> "It is elementary that an unlawful conspiracy may be and often is formed without simultaneous action or agreement on the part of the conspirators. (Citing cases.) Acceptance by competitors, without previous agreement, of an invitation to participate in a plan, the necessary consequence of which, if carried out, is restraint of interstate commerce, is sufficient to establish an unlawful conspiracy under the Sherman Act. (Citing cases.)"

In this connection attention is directed to the testimony of some of the witnesses called adversely by the State's counsel. That those who attended the Association meetings had knowledge of and discussed the subject of the maintenance of increased and uniform prices for the retail sale of gasoline as indicated in the notices referred to appears fairly inferable, if not quite obvious, from the oblique manner in which answers were given to questions propounded by the State's counsel. See Kleinmann's testimony T. 84-87; and Faber's testimony who when asked whether the suggestions for price increases referred to in Exhibits 4 to 9, inclusive, were discussed at any of the meetings of the Association, replied:

> "Not to my knowledge. Because the 'Chair' always called the membership's attention to the fact that such decision at a meeting would be in violation of the anti-trust laws."

When again asked whether there was any discussion at the meetings as to the suggestions for price increases, he replied:

> "Not officially as part of the meeting."

When asked under what circumstances such discussion was had, he replied:

> "Well, under some circumstances a man might be talking about cost of living and the likes of it, and the increased cost of operation, and what it is costing him to operate, but no decisions. They were prevented to be had. Every man had to to make his own decision." (T. 33.)

In this connection see the illuminating article in Vol. 61 Harvard Law Review (Sept. 1948) on "Competition and Antitrust Laws," particularly page 1324 dealing with "The Meaning of 'Conspiracy.'"

2. To establish a combination as being one in violation of the anti-trust laws it is not necessary to prove that coercion was exercised for the purpose of obtaining compliance with the plan of the combination. State v. Lewis and Leidersdorf Co., 201 Wis. 543, 557. In that case Mr. Justice Fowler, in delivering the opinion of the court, stated:

> "We are of opinion that if monopoly be created or attempts thereat be made through combinations and conspiracy with intent and purpose to produce such results, the statute is violated although coercion be absent."

3. To establish the combination as being one in violation of the Anti-Trust Act it is not essential that there be proof of an overt act. The mere intention to conspire is in itself the offense. With reference to a combination to fix or maintain prices it is necessary only to show a combination intending to secure such result.

This appears clearly from the statute here involved—particularly the second sentence (133.01(1)) containing the language "combination * * * intended to restrain" etc. And see Nash v. United States, 229 U. S. 373, 378; 57 L. Ed. 1232, 1236, where Mr. Justice Holmes uses the following language:

> "Coming next to the objection that no overt act is laid, the answer is that the Sherman Act punishes the conspiracies at which it is aimed on the common law footing—that is to say, it does not make the doing of any act other than the act of conspiring a condition of liability." Id. 1236.

(See comment and citations under "4" (the next subdivision).)

4. It is not essential that the result of the combination should be a compelte monopoly. It is sufficient if it really tends to that end and to deprive the public of the advantages which flow from free competition. State v. Lewis and Leidersdorf Co., 201 Wis. 543, 557.

In the United States v. Socony Vacuum Oil Company, 310 U. S. 150, 224; 84 L. Ed. 1129, 1168, the court comments upon this subject, saying:

> "Price fixing agreements may have utility to members of the group though the power possessed or exerted falls far short of domination and control."

It should be borne in mind that it is not necessary that both a purpose and a power to fix prices are necessary for the establishment of a conspiracy under the antitrust law. The existence or exertion of power to accomplish the desired objective becomes important only in cases where the offense charged is the actual monopolizing of any part of the trade or commerce (dealt with in section 2 of the Sherman Act). Where acts are not sufficient in themselves to produce a result which the law seeks to prevent, an intent to bring it to pass is necessary in order to produce a dangerous probability that it will happen. But when that intent and the consequent dangerous probability exist, the statute directs itself against that dangerous probability as well as against the completed result. (This language is in part quoted from United States v. Griffith, 334 U. S. 100, 105, 106; 92 L. Ed. 1236, 1242 and 1243. On this subject see also "Note 59" in United States v. Socony Vacuum Oil Company, 84 L. Ed. at page 1168, 1169.)

Also see Pulp Wood Co. v. Green Bay P. & F. Co., 168 Wis. 400, 413; Ethyl Gasoline Corp. v. U. S., 309 U. S. 436, 458; 84 L. Ed. 852, 862.

5. The fact that the combination sought to eliminate competitive evils such as ruinous competition by reason of price cutting and was engaged in an endeavor to curb competitive abuses does not constitute a legal justification for the activity of such combination in respect to fixing or maintaining prices; and likewise the fact that the prices are fixed by the combination at the fair going market price is immaterial. (Anno. 50 A. L. R. at p. 1000 to U. S. v. Trenton Potteries Co., 50 A. L. R. 989 (Syl. 1) and 995. This case is also reported in 273 U. S. 392, 397; 71 L. Ed. 700, 705.) The fact that the method of attempted control may be considered "as stabilization" does not alleviate the price fixing evil. United States v. Socony Vacuum Oil Company, 310 U. S. 150, 220 to 224; 84 L. Ed. 1129, 1166 to 1169. See also State of Minnesota v. Minneapolis Milk Company, 124 Minn. 34; 51 L. R. A. (n. s.) 244, where it was held that a beneficent purpose such as that the increased price was necessary to afford the members a profit can not excuse a violation of the statute. Id. 248.

In the instant case defendants "point the finger" at the wholesalers who raised the tank wagon price. From the time of Adam, Eve and the serpent such defense has been repeatedly asserted but has never been good law. While not passing here on the conduct of the wholesalers the statute does not permit this court to hold that the violation of law by one condones the violation by another in engaging in a forbidden combination. To so hold would mean the complete failure of law enforcement.

6. Price fixing agreements are unlawful per se under the Wisconsin statute here involved as well as under the Sherman Act. U. S. v. Socony Vacuum Oil Company, 310 U. S. 150, 218, et seq.; 84 L. Ed. 1129, 1165, 1167, et seq.

7. The fact that the Association is one engaged in the promotion of the interests of trade in this state does not exempt it from liability under sec. 133.01(1).

Considerable stress was placed upon the following provision of section 133.04 of the Wisconsin Statutes:

> "133.04. What Organizations Included. The word 'person' wherever used in the three next preceding sections shall be deemed to include, besides individuals, corporations, partnerships and associations existing under or authorized by the laws of the United States, any of the territories of this or any other state or of any foreign country; provided, that nothing therein shall be construed to affect labor unions or any association of laborers organized for the purpose of promoting the welfare of its members, nor associations or organizations intended to legitimately promote the interests of trade, commerce or manufacturing in this state * * *." (Italics supplied)

Said section does not operate to exempt the Association from the provisions of section 133.01 since the activity of the Association in respect to the fixing and maintenance of price does not "legitimately promote the interests of trade, commerce or manufacturing in this state."

In section 17 of Title 15 of the Clayton Act there is a similar provision to the effect that nothing contained in the anti-trust laws shall

> "forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, under the anti-trust laws."

The word "organizations" as there used referred to "labor, agricultural or horticultural organizations instituted for the purpose of mutual help."

That provision has been held to give no exemption to a union if it engaged in a combination to violate the Sherman Act. One of the most recent decisions to that effect is Allen-Bradley Company v. Local Union No. 3 etc., 325 U. S. 797, 805, 806, et seq.; 89 L. Ed. 1939, 1945, 1946.

[Violation Established]

In the light of these principles, the facts elicited upon the trial compel the conclusion that there has been a clear violation of several provisions of section 133.01(1) of the Wisconsin statutes.

The several notices issued by the Association to its members as well as to retail gasoline dealers generally in Milwaukee County disclose unlawful activities in attempting to "tamper with price structures." (84 L. Ed. at p. 1167)

The circulation by the Association of schedules of the "prevailing price of gasoline"; the "suggestions" in the notices that such scheduled prices be maintained; the warnings against reductions of the scheduled prices "until informed by this Association on what to do"; the attempts to enlarge the membership of the Association by appeals to non-members which point out graphically that the Association, by its campaign for uniformly fixed and progressively increasing retail prices, was bringing "results" in additional profits to the retail gasoline dealer;—were in themselves sufficient to establish that those who authorized the issuance and mailing of said notices intended to restrain or prevent competition in the retail price of several grades of gasoline; and that a standard or figure was fixed by those responsible for the issuance of said notices in which the price of gasoline sold at retail to the public was in some manner controlled or established. The said written notices were, however, reenforced by personal pressure exercised by the executive secretary of the Association (Faber) in personal contacts with members of the Association when they did not promptly respond to the notices by posting the increased prices.

The evidence in this case establishes not only the specific intent to fix the retail price of gasoline—and thus to restrain or prevent competition in Milwaukee County—but also that the activities of the Association succeeded in fixing and establishing increased and uniform prices of that commodity by a large proportion of the retail gasoline dealers in said county. (Exhibits 17, 18 and 22; and pages 13 and 14, supra.)

That the Association's activities were produced by concerted action—by an unlawful combination—is likewise established by the evidence and the reasonable inferences therefrom. That the directors may have exercised caution in avoiding discussion of the price-fixing notices "officially as part of the meeting" because "such decision at a meeting would be in violation of the anti-trust laws" (T. p. 33—supra p. 19) emphasizes the transparency of the defendants' categorical denials of conspiracy.

As to the parties to that combination: It cannot fairly be doubted that Robert E. Dunford, corporate secretary of the Association, whose name was signed by Faber to a number of the communications, was aware of and acquiesced in their contents. (T. 119-124) This is also true of all of the officers and directors of the Association since they were the governing body of the Association, were recipients of the price-fixing notices, and acted in accordance with the suggested price schedules.

The evidence is undisputed that no officer or director of the Association at any time attempted to dissuade Faber from his unlawful activities in circulating the price maintenance notices. (T. 35) Under the circumstances, and in accordance with familiar rules, the officers and directors of the Association must be held responsible for the activities of their executive secretary. State ex rel Kropf v. Gilbert, 213 Wis. 196, 217.

Attention has been directed to the fact that the Association is not exempt from the provisions of section 133.01(1) in so far as it pertains to acts intended to restrain trade or prevent competition in the price of gasoline. (Supra. p. 23)

The fact that the Association was engaged in circulating statistical information pertaining to the trade and was seeking to prevent "disastrous price wars" does not justify its activities in fixing retail prices of gasoline in violation of the Wisconsin Anti-Trust Law. (Supra p. 21-22)

A case involving the activities of a trade association whose methods were closely analogous to those used in the instant case is Food & Grocery Bureau of Southern Cali- fornia v. United States, 139 Fed. (2d) 973. In the District Court the "Bureau" and individual directors were convicted of conspiring to restrain interstate commerce in fixing retail prices of goods and groceries in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. (43 F. Supp. 974) Such conviction was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals. (139 Fed. (2d) 973)

It appeared there that the "Bureau" circulated many letters to its members containing statements as to "minimum prices" and asking the members to "kindly observe this price" or to "conform." There were exhortations to hold to the prices announced and injunctions against deviation thereof with appeals to the profit motive. A marked similarity of language employed by the Association in the instant case is observable in the "Bureau's" letters. In that case, as here, an unsuccessful attempt was made by the directors to disclaim responsibility for the acts of the secretaries of the "Bureau."

Respecting the "good motives" of the "Bureau" the District Judge said: (43 F. Supp. 974 at 980)

> "If there be a violation of law, it matters not that the Bureau may have engaged in other very laudable activities." * * * "But when, under the guise of enforcing the (California Unfair Practices) Act, clear price-fixing and price stabilization activities are carried on, the protestations of lawful motive lack force." Id. 980.

The conclusion is unescapable that the Association as well as its officers and directors have violated the several provisions of section 133.01 by becoming parties to an unlawful combination in restraint of trade, and by engaging in concerted action to fix, maintain and control the retail price of gasoline sold in Milwaukee County.

[Immunity to Certain Defendants]

Certain of the defendants are entitled to immunity by virtue of the provisions of section 133.24 since they were examined in inquisitorial proceedings instituted by the Attorney General under section 133.06 and 133.03. These defendants are Louis Faber, Kenneth Grundmann, Al Volz and Ray Powers. As to those the State has announced that it asks for no forfeitures or costs by reason of the immunities thus granted by the statute.

As to the defendant Lester Kleinmann, the evidence shows that he was not elected a director until after the mailing of the price-fixing notices referred to. It is not shown that he was in a position to prevent the commission of the unlawful acts of the Association.

As to those retail gasoline dealers who are not made parties defendant to this action but who are intended to be included only as members of a class pursuant to the provisions of section 260.12, I am of the opinion that no judgment in personam can be entered against them since they do not appear to have been given a due opportunity to defend the action. This is particularly true of the class of non-member retail gasoline dealers who were on the Association's mailing list and who are alleged to have received price recommendations. Nor can those dealers who are not made defendants be rightly held to be adequately represented by others who were made parties but whose situation as to liability is not the same as those dealers who are not parties. It appears that the two defendants who were selected to represent such non-member class were the defendants Grundmann and Volz, both of whom acquired immunity as hereinabove stated.

In Hansberry v. Lee, 311 U. S. 32, 40, 85 L. Ed. 22, 26, it is said:

> "It is a principle of general application in Anglo-American jurisprudence that one is not bound by a judgment in personam in a litigation in which he is not designated as a party or to which he has not been made a party by service of process."

In the opinion of Mr. Justice Stone in that case it is further said:

> "It is familiar doctrine of the federal courts that members of a class not present as parties to the litigation may be bound by the judgment where they are in fact adequately represented by parties who are present, or where they actually participate in the conduct of the litigation in which members of the class are present as parties (citations), or where the interest of the members of the class, some of whom are present as parties, is joint, or where for any other reason the relationship between the parties present and those who are absent is such as legally to entitle the former to stand in judgment for the latter." 85 L. Ed. 27, 28.

In that case the court held—after a discussion of potentially conflicting interests between those who were parties and those who were not but were sought to be brought in by representation—that the representation in the case of such absent parties did not satisfy the requirements of due process; and therefore such absent parties were not bound by the judgment. Id. p. 28-29.

[Terms of Judgment]

As to the judgment to be here rendered pursuant to the conclusions reached the court has no discretion except as to the amounts of the forfeitures to be imposed against the respective defendants. Judgment should be granted as follows:

1. The defendant Milwaukee Retail Gasoline Dealers Association of Milwaukee, Inc. shall forfeit the sum of $2,000 with costs and disbursements.

2. The corporate charter of the defendant Retail Gasoline Dealers Association of Milwaukee, Inc. must be cancelled and annulled pursuant to the provisions of section 133.01.

3. The defendants Henry Frey, Ted Schaumann, Robert E. Dunford, P. E. Griffin, Ray Kobs, Herold Luderus, Arthur Genner, Walter Nimmer, Arthur Tess, and Stanley Ufnowski, each of whom are directors of said Association, shall each forfeit the sum of $200 with costs and disbursements.

4. Each of the defendants named, together with all members of the said Association, shall be enjoined from continuing in said combination and conspiracy in restraint of trade and shall be further enjoined in the manner and according to the terms provided in the temporary restraining order granted by the Circuit Court of Milwaukee County of May 14, 1948.

Findings of fact and conclusions of law in harmony with the foregoing decision may be submitted by the Attorney General after the delivery of a copy of such proposed findings and conclusions to opposing counsel.

[¶ 62,449] Chicago Sugar Company v. The American Sugar Refining Company.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. October Term, 1948, April Session, 1949. Nos. 9158, 9159. July 11, 1949.

Appeals from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division.

Clayton Act, Robinson-Patman Act

Competitive Terms Offered by Suppliers to Customers—Price Discrimination—Good Faith in Meeting Competition.—A sugar distributor sought three-fold damages against a sugar refiner for alleged discrimination within the meaning of Section 2 (a) and (e) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act consisting in the offer to other customers of the privilege of re-entering contract balances for a January contract at decreased June prices, when in response to a public announcement issued by the sugar supply company, the complaining customer had taken delivery under a comparable contract at a higher price. It was established by the course of dealing between the parties and public announcements outlining the basis upon which business was accepted under the contracts that customers were not obligated to accept delivery of contract balances. To encourage disposal of balances suppliers extended guarantee terms to unguaranteed balances, allowed re-entry of contract balances and cancellation of contract balances. The extension of such privileges were competitive terms so that when offered by one refiner, his competitors felt impelled to offer like terms in order to compete.

It was held that the distributor had voluntarily accepted delivery under his January contract; that he had been accorded all the privileges of all other customers. The Court declared that when the seller reduced its basis price it did so in good faith to meet the identical terms previously offered by its competitors and not for the purpose of discriminating between customers.

The Court upheld the lower court's decision which dismissed the action on count two in which it was alleged that the seller's classification of customers as manufacturers and distributors, the offer of contracts only to the manufacturing trade, and the repricing of these contracts resulted in discrimination.

See the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212, 2216.

For the plaintiff: Leslie M. O'Connor, Chicago, Illinois.

For the defendant: Kenneth F. Burgess, Howard Neitzert, George A. Raney Jr., Chicago, Illinois.

Before MAJOR, C.J., KERNER and DUFFY, JJ.

KERNER, J. By the appeal in No. 9158 plaintiff challenges the propriety of a judgment dismissing its complaint after a trial upon the merits. In No. 9159 defendant appeals from that part of the same judgment which taxed to defendant one-half of the costs of the proceedings before a master.

[Complaint]

The complaint contained three counts. The first two counts charged violation of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 U. S. C. A. § 13 (a) and (e)) and sought to recover three-fold damages. The third count sought damages for breach of contract. After defendant had filed its answer, the cause was referred to a master for hearing and to report his conclusions and recommendations. The master having heard the cause, filed his report. He made 79 findings of fact. He also made conclusions of law and recommended that the cause be dismissed. Exceptions to the report were filed and overruled, and the report of the master was approved. In the judgment order dismissing the cause, the court adopted the master's findings of fact and conclusions of law.

[Issue Defined]

The issue is whether the acts of defendant were discriminatory within the meaning of § 2 (a) and (e) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 13 (a) and (e). Under § 2 (a) it is unlawful to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality where the effect may be to substantially lessen competition or to injure, destroy or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination. And § 2 (e) forbids preferential services or facilities connected with the sale of a commodity upon terms not accorded to all purchasers on proportionally equal terms.

[Facts Reviewed]

Plaintiff, an Illinois corporation, is a distributor engaged in the business of buying and selling sugar, largely with industrial users. Defendant, a New Jersey corporation, is engaged in the business of buying and refining raw cane sugars and in selling domestic refined cane sugars and sugar products. In 1936 and 1937 there were 14 domestic cane refiners in the United States which, with the exception of those owned by Western Sugar Refinery and California & Hawaiian Sugar Refining Corporation (hereinafter referred to as "Pacific Coast Refiners") and located in San Francisco, California, were located along the Gulf and Atlantic coasts. Sugar is a standardized commodity, and the sugar business is extremely competitive. A customer will pay no more for one refiner's brand than for another; price and terms rather than brand control its sale and distribution, and no seller of sugar can continue in business unless he gives his customers the same privileges any other refiner gives. All domestic cane refiners sell their sugar through brokers on substantially the same terms. Two types of contracts are offered to the trade by refiners: (a) contracts containing specifications for the immediate sale and delivery of the sugar, and (b) contracts not containing specifications, referred to as 30-day contracts.

The 30-day contract form does not require contract bookings to be withdrawn within the guarantee period applicable to the contract. The guarantee period is not mentioned in the contract form, but, pursuant to announcement, contract prices may be guaranteed for 30 days, 42 days, or not guaranteed at all; yet, in all except in very unusual cases the delivery period as stated in the contract form is 30 days and delivery specifications are required of the purchaser within 15 days from the date of the contract. Many contracts do not carry a guarantee, yet the delivery period is determined in precisely the same manner as in the case of guaranteed contracts.

Most of the sugars sold by refiners are through the medium of 30-day contracts, entered on market moves. A market move develops when refiners announce an increase in their basis prices. Ordinarily a price increase is announced the day before a new and higher price becomes effective. In the interim between the announcement and the effective date of the new price, sugar buyers enter into 30-day contracts with refiners, booking such amount of sugar as the seller will accept or as the buyer may consider to his advantage. These 30-day contracts do not contain specifications as to the grade, kind, style of package, or quantities of sugar to be delivered, nor are the dates on which the sugars are to be delivered specified. They contain a provision that the buyer agrees to buy and the seller agrees to sell a designated number of 100-pound bags of refined cane sugar at a basis price per pound. When sugars booked on a 30-day contract form are delivered to the customer, the deliveries are made pursuant to delivery specifications furnished by the purchaser, stating the kinds of sugar and amounts desired, and the refiners make deliveries until they advise their customers to the contrary. While the contract forms used by the various refiners differ in their terms, all require the purchaser to buy and the seller to sell specified quantities of sugar at a firm price, the sugar to be delivered within 30 days of the contract unless otherwise indicated.

The provisions of the 30-day contract forms requiring purchasers to specify for delivery sugars booked under the contract within 15 days of the contract date and to accept delivery within 30 days of the contract were ignored by both buyer and seller from the date of the introduction of the 30-day contract form, and buyers withdrew sugars if, as and when they desired so to do, and it became common practice for all refiners to make deliveries until they notified their trade to the contrary. No effort was made by any refiner to require its customers to withdraw contract bookings, and undelivered contract balances were cancelled at the request of the buyer.

[Contracts Modified in the Course of Dealings]

On January 4, 1937, the parties executed two 30-day contracts. By contract No. FA-21160, plaintiff agreed to buy and defendant agreed to sell 75,000 100-pound bags, and by contract No. FA-21161, 25,000 100-pound bags of refined sugar. The parties agree that the language of the contract did not express their true agreement, and both parties disregarded the rights and obligations provided by the contracts with respect to furnishing specifications, the withdrawal of contract balances or the delivery of sugar booked under the contracts. They also agree that the contracts were supplemented or modified by the course of dealing between the parties since January 1, 1932, and by public announcements outlining the basis upon which business was accepted under the contracts.

About 1936 California & Hawaiian Sugar Refining Corporation (hereinafter referred to as C. & H.), to improve its competitive position in the central states, offered to guarantee its 30-day contract price against a decline in its own basis price for 42 days following the date of its contracts. This move by C. & H. was met with like terms by other refiners, and the terms so offered became known as "guarantee terms" or as "the guarantee" and there evolved in the trade a term known as "the regular 42-day guarantee" and thereafter 42-day guarantee terms were extended to purchasers holding 30-day contracts to withdraw sugars booked at the lowest basis price during the first 42 days following the date of the contract.

[Devices to Dispose of Contract Balances]

Having given their customers cause to believe that they would not be required to withdraw 30-day contract bookings if they did not desire to do so, the refiners were confronted with the problem of inducing withdrawals and with the further problem of disposing of undelivered contract balances in cases where the buyer could not be induced to make such withdrawals. They devised various expedients for extending guarantee terms to the unguaranteed contract balances, two of which were known as "extending the guaranty period" and "re-entering contract balances." Re-entering January 4 contracts involved no making of new contracts, and when contract balances were re-entered, the refiners extended to their customers holding undelivered contract balances the same rights and privileges with respect to such contract balances as though the old contracts were cancelled, and upon the customer's request they could cancel undelivered contract balances.

Two methods were devised for the disposition of undelivered contract balances in cases where the customer failed to withdraw such balances. The practice was to advise contract holders by letter or public announcement that unless the balances were withdrawn by a specified date in the future, the contracts would be cancelled. By the other method the refiners announced that they would permit customers to cancel the outstanding contracts. The extension of guarantee terms, the re-entry of contract balances, the cancellation of contract balances and the offer to cancel contract balances are competitive terms, and when extended by one refiner to its customers, competing refiners are required to offer like or similar terms in order to hold the good will of their customers.

[Facts Leading Up to Alleged Discrimination]

From January, 1932, until November 5, 1936, there were 32 market moves on which 30-day contracts were entered into between the parties, and during 1936, deliveries were made to plaintiff many days after the 30-day contracts had expired. January 4, 1937, the cane refiners announced that effective January 5, they would advance their basis prices from 4.80 cents to 5 cents per pound. In the market move which followed, substantial quantities of sugars were booked on 30-day contract forms, but withdrawals were light during January and February. February 11 the Pacific Coast Refiners announced a decline in their basis price. Other refiners met this competition. February 15, 1937, the 42-day guarantee contracts entered into on the January 4 move expired. At this time substantial balances were outstanding under the January 4 contracts. February 5, the Pacific Coast Refiners announced that upon the customer's request, they would cancel undelivered contract balances. This announcement placed customers of the Pacific Coast Refiners on a more favorable basis than customers holding 30-day January 4 contracts with eastern and southern refiners whose outstanding contract balances were unguaranteed and who were not free to enter new business because of such contract balances. Defendant and the other eastern and southern refiners promptly met this competition by extending guarantee terms on January 4 contract balances. Plaintiff did not request cancellation of its January 4 contracts, but its president expressed his satisfaction with defendant's extending guarantee terms to the contract balances.

In March, 1937, defendant announced that a sugar control bill introduced in the United States Senate on March 2 provided for the imposition of an excise tax on refined sugar manufactured after April 1, 1937, and that if the bill became a law in that form, all refined sugar manufactured in the United States before April 1 would be exempt from the tax. March 5, C. & H. announced that it would terminate the guarantee applicable to its 30-day contracts as of March 31, 1937. Defendant followed suit on March 6, and announced that it had extended its guarantees so that the guarantees would expire not later than March 31.

The demand for sugar during the month of March was exceedingly heavy, the deliveries being over 300% of their normal volume, with the result that it was impossible to buy sugar except in the form of contract withdrawal, and on March 17 defendant announced that as against January 4 contract balances, it could not obligate itself to make delivery of any sugar before April 1, unless specifications and shipping instructions were furnished.

At this time plaintiff was in the same position as all other customers of defendant in that it had the right and privilege as to when and how it would take delivery of sugars booked on the January 4 market move. Defendant did not require plaintiff to withdraw and take delivery of the sugars, nor did the contracts require plaintiff to withdraw or take delivery of the sugars; nevertheless, plaintiff elected to withdraw and take delivery of the sugars, and on March 6, a broker handling plaintiff's January 4 contracts telephoned to defendant an assortment of sugars amounting to 63,750 bags, to be placed in warehouses in Chicago, to be available to plaintiff prior to April 1. These sugars, together with sugars then held in the warehouse by defendant for plaintiff, were the equivalent of the undelivered balance due plaintiff under its contract No. FA-21160.

On March 9, 1937, plaintiff's president informed defendant that Purity Bakeries, one of plaintiff's customers, would withdraw balances due plaintiff under contract No. FA-21161, and that he was anxious to obtain title to outstanding contract balances prior to April 1 when it was anticipated that the tax bill would become effective, and offered to take delivery of sugars at defendant's refineries if that would facilitate delivery and pass title to the sugars that were undelivered under the January 4 contracts. Thereupon defendant submitted a plan for the delivery of balances due plaintiff to which plaintiff agreed. Pursuant to the plan the sugars were delivered, but because of the demands on defendant's shipping and refining facilities, the deliveries were not completed until April 14, 1937.

The demand for sugars disappeared about the middle of April when it became apparent that the Sugar Tax Bill would not pass, and there was little activity in the trade. Contract balances were unguaranteed and new business was offered without a guarantee. May 12, C. & H. issued an announcement reinstating guarantee terms and re-entering January 4 contract balances. Similar announcements were made by at least six other domestic cane refiners, and defendant met this competition. The reinstatement of guarantee terms and the re-entry of contract balances marked the beginning of a new period of intense competition, and within a few days the market began to show signs of weakness and refiners cut their prices. May 20, 1937, a refiners' basis price of 4.70 cents per pound became effective. To meet this competition, defendant announced that its basis price was 4.70 cents per pound, specifications with order, prompt shipments, guarantees in effect to apply as theretofore. May 25, all of the refiners announced that on the buyer's request, they would cancel re-entered January 4 contract balances.

On May 26, 1937, defendant announced that balances against contracts booked on January 4 at 4.80 basis price were guaranteed to 42 days from May 11, and its customers were offered the privilege of cancelling. This offer was in effect an offer to re-enter contract balances under terms applicable to new business and to accept new contracts without regard to whether a customer held or had held an undelivered balance. At that time plaintiff cancelled balances, inactive since April 14, amounting to 40,432 bags. June 10 the refiners reduced their basis price to 4.50 cents and on that date defendant also announced that its basis price was 4.50 cents per pound, prompt shipment on 30-day contracts with guarantee against decline but not beyond 42 days from contract date.

[Price Reduction in Good Faith]

Plaintiff had considerable sugar delivered during March and April at defendant's refinery in Louisiana, which had been paid for in whole or in part in June after the price decline, and although there were no outstanding balances between the parties in March and April, 1937, under the re-entered January 4 contracts, the price decline on June 10 did affect the price paid by the trade for sugars previously delivered. Nevertheless when defendant reduced its basis price in June, it did so in good faith to meet identical terms previously offered by its competitors and not for the purpose of discriminating against plaintiff or any other customer. Plaintiff was accorded all the privileges and advantages of all other customers holding January 4, 30-day contracts. And there was no proof that any of defendant's customers had received more favorable prices or terms with respect to sugar booked on the January 4 move than those received by plaintiff.

During the five years preceding January 1, 1937, plaintiff had withdrawn all contract balances during the guarantee period applicable to such contracts on six occasions, although bookings had been made with defendant on 32 market moves during this period, and defendant had re-entered contract balances on at least five occasions when plaintiff held contracts with defendant.

[Findings of Lower Court]

Based upon these facts, the court concluded that by the public announcements of defendant and by its course of dealing with plaintiff, the provisions of the January 4 contracts were amended and modified; that defendant had waived the provision in the contracts requiring plaintiff to furnish specifications for the delivery of the sugars within the period mentioned therein, and any obligation requiring plaintiff to withdraw the sugars within 30 days or within any other period of time; that plaintiff did not consider itself legally obligated nor was it in fact obligated to withdraw sugars booked under the contracts; that plaintiff withdrew its January 4 contract balances voluntarily; that none of defendant's public announcements were made for the purpose of discriminating against plaintiff or any of its customers, but were made in good faith to meet similar terms offered by defendant's competitors; and that defendant violated no duty or obligation to plaintiff in reinstating guarantee terms and re-entering contract balances or by the price decline of sugar.

Plaintiff's contention is that defendant was guilty of discrimination in price between purchasers under the January 4 contracts. We experience some difficulty in comprehending just what it is that plaintiff claims and in what manner defendant discriminated. In its brief plaintiff says that the issue involves "(a) refusal of cancellation rights in February-March and their granting on May 26, 1937; (b) price reductions on January 4 contracts deliveries under guarantee reinstatement of May 12; (c) relieving buyers who did not take delivery by March 31 of carrying costs—storage, interest, insurance, etc.; (d) enabling such buyers to get sugar at 4.70¢ and 4.50¢."

As we understand it, the conduct which plaintiff charges resulted in discrimination arose out of defendant's alleged misrepresentation with respect to cancellation rights under the contracts, that is, defendant's failure to require all its customers to withdraw January 4 contract balances prior to March 31, the re-entry of such contract balances under guarantee terms, and the cancellation of such balances in May. Plaintiff argues that defendant's announcements were, in fact, notice to the trade that contract balances had to be withdrawn before March 31, which it did, to its disadvantage in comparison with other customers, its competitors. It also says that even if it be assumed that plaintiff was under no obligation to take the sugar, it is no defense that plaintiff "owed no duty contractually or otherwise" to defendant to take the sugar.

[Contracts Amended]

Before proceeding to discuss plaintiff's contention it is well to say that parties to a contract always have the right, by agreement or their course of conduct, to waive the requirements of their contract. And it has been held that one of the parties to the contract cannot by a long course of conduct lead the other party to believe that it will not insist upon a strict performance of a duty imposed by the contract, and then without notice insist upon strict performance. Hubshman v. Louis Keer Shoe Co., 129 F. 2d 137, 140. What facts will constitute a waiver is a matter of law, but whether the facts exist in any given case is a question of fact. Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Sanford, 200 Ill. 126, 130, and Baxter v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 318 Ill. 369. We think there was competent evidence warranting the conclusion that by the course of conduct between the parties, the January 4 contracts had been amended as found by the court.

It cannot be gainsaid that before plaintiff may maintain its suit it must establish that defendant has violated the Robinson-Patman Act, and only discriminations that lessen or tend to prevent competition between customers or between sellers are prohibited. Section (2) (a), 15 U. S. C. A. § 13 (a), and Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 106 F. 2d 667, 676. There must be proof that a seller has charged one purchaser a higher price for like goods than he charged one or more of the purchaser's competitors. Federal Trade Commission v. Morton Salt Co., 334 U. S. 37, 45.

It is clear that plaintiff was not obligated to withdraw sugars under the January 4 contracts within 30 days, and that plaintiff withdrew the sugars voluntarily. It is also clear that no secret terms or concessions had been extended by defendant to any customer holding a January 4 contract. Plaintiff was subjected to no inducements that were not accorded to every other customer. All of defendant's customers were treated alike. All terms applicable to these contracts were made in good faith and publicly announced to meet similar terms offered by defendant's competitors, and all contract holders were privileged to take advantage of the terms so announced. The announcements contained no misrepresentation of fact, nor any suggestion that contract balances be withdrawn; they were made in good faith to meet identical terms previously offered by defendant's competitors and not for the purpose of discriminating against plaintiff, and specifically stated that customers should determine for themselves whether it was in their interests to withdraw contract balances. The announcements did not constitute a promise or representation that guarantees would not be reinstated. There was no proof that defendant charged one purchaser a higher price for the sugar than it had charged plaintiff under similar circumstances, and there was no evidence that the announcements lessened or tended to prevent competition between defendant's customers. In this situation, we think the District Court was justified in holding, under the first count of the complaint, that defendant was not guilty of discriminating in price between different purchasers under the January 4 contracts.

Under the second count, the conduct which plaintiff charges resulted in discrimination was defendant's classification of customers as manufacturers and distributors, the offer of contracts only to the manufacturing trade, i. e., the claimed elimination of plaintiff as a distributor of defendant's sugar, and the repricing of these contracts.

We state the facts pertaining to this count. As already noted, plaintiff is a distributor. A sugar distributor is in a position to change his prices promptly to reflect changes in prices and costs, but manufacturers who have contracted to sell the output of their plants for some periods in advance, must speculate on the costs of sugars required in their manufacturing operations, unless, at the time they sell their merchandise they are able to determine their costs of sugar during the period of manufacture. Thus, manufacturers occupy a situation different from the position of the distributing trade. While the 30-day contract is adapted to the requirements of the sugar distributor, manufacturers have objected to the 30-day contract form because the seller had the right to discontinue deliveries at the end of 30 days.

Various attempts had been made by certain refiners and other sugar sellers over the years to devise some form of contract which would meet the requirements of manufacturers. To meet the needs of the manufacturing trade, defendant on November 9, 1936, offered the trade a contract for the delivery of sugar at a fixed price throughout 1937. The contract was known as a "Manufacturer's Contract," and under it the customer was required to specify definite quantities and periods for the delivery of the sugar, and the price was higher than the price at which 30-day contracts were offered to the distributing trade. The contract did not carry any guarantee against decline in price, and buyers were required to obligate themselves not to re-sell the sugar and agree to use the sugar solely for their own manufacturing purposes. Without the covenant, sugars sold to manufacturers could have been resold by the manufacturers in competition with sugars offered by the distributing trade, but defendant took precautions to insure observance of the covenant obligating the manufacturer not to resell the sugar. No part or portion of the sugar sold under the contract was ever resold.

The sugar under the "manufacturer's contract" was offered at a basis price of 4.70 cents. At that time 30-day contracts were offered at 4.65 cents. November 11, a basis price of 4.80 cents became effective for 30-day contracts. November 16 the basis price for manufacturers' contracts became 4.85 cents and thereafter remained at least 5 cents higher than the basis price for 30-day contracts, until the manufacturers' contracts were withdrawn from the market in May, 1937.

On May 26, 1937, to meet terms offered by its competitors, defendant repriced deliveries under the manufacturer's contract to eliminate carrying charges and to extend to customers holding those contracts the same terms as had been extended to customers buying 30-day contracts on the January 4 move, and offered all such customers the privilege of cancelling. The announcement did not place manufacturer's contract holders in a more favorable position than that enjoyed by holders of 30-day contracts entered on the January 4 move.

Plaintiff's president testified that it was hard for him to estimate what real damage was done to plaintiff and when asked whether he knew what damage plaintiff sustained as a result of the matters referred to in the second count, he testified: "In a general way, no, because I do not know to whom you (defendant) gave these contracts, whether you gave them to customers of mine (plaintiff's) and cut me (plaintiff) out of a possible profit because of no opportunity of doing business with them or not." Thereafter it was stipulated that plaintiff made no claim to damages for loss of business or for loss of customers. And there was no proof of any damage caused by the fact that plaintiff was not eligible for the manufacturer's contract.

The court concluded that defendant's classification of its customers as manufacturers and distributors was reasonable and lawful; that there was nothing in the terms announced by defendant on May 26 which was discriminatory; that defendant had not violated § 2 of the Robinson-Patman Act, or any part thereof, and that plaintiff had not been injured in its business or property as the result of any act or omission of defendant.

To be sure, under certain circumstances a seller of personal property cannot restrict the future alienation of the property, but if the restrictions are reasonable they will be upheld. See 5 Williston, Contracts (Rev. Ed. 1937) at pages 4604-5; Wilder Mfg. Co. v. Corn Products Refining Company, 236 U. S. 165; and Fosburgh v. California & Hawaiian Sugar Refining Co., 291 Fed. 29. We fail to see, under the facts in this case, where and in what manner the effect of the covenant requiring the manufacturer to agree that he will not resell the sugar but will use it for manufacturing purposes, was harmful to competition, or in restraint of trade. It seems to us that whatever restraint there was, was reasonable. It prevented manufacturers from re-selling the sugars delivered under the contract in competition with the distributing trade. Plaintiff should not complain of that fact.

We pass now to consider plaintiff's claim that the offer of the contract only to the manufacturing trade eliminated plaintiff, to his injury, as a distributor of defendant's sugar.

In support of its argument, plaintiff relies on Federal Trade Commission v. Morton Salt Co., 334 U. S. 37, and Elizabeth Arden, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 156 F. 2d 132. We have studied these cases, but we are not convinced they support plaintiff's position.

The issue in the Morton Salt case was whether the seller, the salt company, had charged one purchaser a higher price for the salt than it had charged one or more of the purchaser's competitiors. The Commission found that the competitive opportunities of certain merchants were injured when they had to pay the salt company more for their goods than their competitiors had to pay. Here the manufacturers paid more for the sugars than was paid by plaintiff as a distributor, and had the manufacturer's contract been made available to the distributing trade, plaintiff would not have bought sugars under the contract to supply its regular business requirements.

In the Arden case, the Commission concluded that petitioners had violated § 2(e) of the Act because petitioners had not accorded demonstration service to purchasers who were in competition with purchasers to whom they did furnish such service. This is not our case. Here there was no discrimination between competing purchasers in connection with the offer by defendant of the manufacturer's contract to the manufacturing trade.

In the instant case there is no proof nor is it claimed that any distributor-competitor of plaintiff bought sugar from defendant under the manufacturer's contract, or that the contract effected any competitive injury between customers competing in the distribution of the sugar. However, plaintiff makes the point that the Act applies to sales of commodities to manufacturers using them, identically as it applies to other purchasers, and to discriminations whose effect may be to injure, destroy or prevent competition with any person who grants such discrimination, and argues that the manufacturer's contract was offered for the purpose of diverting to defendant the business of manufacturers using sugar.

To be sure, the statute requires no more than that there shall be no discrimination in favor of "one purchaser against another purchaser * * * of a commodity bought for resale * * * by contracting to furnish or furnishing * * * any services or facilities connected with the * * * sale, * * * of such commodity so purchased upon terms not accorded to all purchasers on proportionally equal terms." But, of course, discrimination by a seller of a commodity cannot lessen competition between customers under the Act unless the discrimination is between customers competing in the distribution of the commodity, Corn Products Refining Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 144 F. 2d 211, 214, affirmed 324 U. S. 726, 734, and Samuel H. Moss v. Federal Trade Commission, 148 F. 2d 378. That is to say, the parties must be in competition with each other. There is nothing in the Act that prevents a seller of a commodity from eliminating middlemen from its distributive system and selling its commodity directly to consumers if it wishes to do so; and if it chooses it may distribute a part of its commodity direct and a part through wholesale distributions. Jarrett v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 131 F. 2d 674; Elizabeth Arden Sales Corp. v. Gus Blass Co., 150 F. 2d 988. See also General Shale Products Corp. v. Struck Construction Co., 37 F. Supp. 598, affirmed 132 F. 2d 425, cert. denied, 318 U. S. 780.

Finally we reach the contention that defendant violated the Act when on May 26 it repriced manufacturers' contracts and permitted cancellation of undelivered balances.

The announcement merely relaxed the terms of the manufacturers' contracts. Hence in view of what we have already said, it will be enough to say that we agree with defendant that any relaxation of the terms of the manufacturer's contract was not a violation of the Act. The differences in the terms offered manufacturers and those offered distributors as revised by the announcement were justified by the same considerations that we have already pointed out, and this is dispositive of plaintiff's contention. We conclude that the court was right in holding that defendant had not violated § 2 of the Act or any part thereof.

The court found that plaintiff had abandoned count three and concluded that it had not proved a breach of contract as alleged in that count. We have not discussed that count or any evidence claimed to sustain it because the plaintiff has not raised any question concerning it. Plaintiff, however, has argued other points mostly subsidiary to the ones already discussed. These we have considered, but since they do not change our conclusions they need not be discussed.

In No. 9159, defendant appealed from the part of the judgment directing it to pay one-half of the $9,130 fees and charges of the master. The judgment was predicated on the recommendation of the master that:

> "A substantial part of the time necessarily spent in hearings herein, was in reviewing the Defendant's business transactions over a number of years in order to properly construe its January 4th, 1937, contract with the Plaintiff; which contract, although appearing definite in its terms, Defendant contends is a mere option at the election of the purchaser * * *
> "While the Master does not presume to suggest to the Defendant the provisions its contract should contain, nevertheless, if the three words 'at purchaser's option' were contained in the Defendant's 30-day contract it would have avoided the necessity of reviewing approximately twenty years of the Defendant's business dealings under the same form of contract, to establish by custom and usage the fact that the contract in question is a mere option."

It thus appears that although the master had found plaintiff's charges completely groundless and defendant's conduct in the accused business dealings wholly innocent and carried on in good faith, nevertheless, because he considered defendant responsible for the difficulty and complexity of the proofs of that innocence and good faith, he charged half of the expense of such proofs to defendant.

While there is no question that, under Rule 54 (d) (Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A. following § 723 c), which provides: "Except when express provision therefor is made either in a statute of the United States or in these rules, costs shall be allowed as of course to the prevailing party unless the court otherwise directs; * * *" the court has discretion over the allowance of costs, we think the facts disclosed did not justify the exercise of that discretion. As we understand it, the denial of costs to the prevailing party or the assessment of partial costs against him is in the nature of a penalty for some defection on his part in the course of the litigation as, for example, by calling unnecessary witnesses, bringing in unnecessary issues or otherwise encumbering the record, or by delaying in raising objection fatal to the plaintiff's case. Highway Const. Co. v. City of Miami, 126 F. 2d 777; Royal Metal Mfg. Co. v. Art Metal Works, 130 Fed. 778; Harland v. Bankers' and Merchants' Tel. Co., 32 Fed. 305; In re Swartz, 130 F. 2d 229; Commentary, 5 F. R. S. 54d. 143. A party, although prevailing, would be denied costs for needlessly bringing or prolonging litigation.

In our case, the master's only criticism was that defendant should have incorporated a three-word provision in its contract, thereby avoiding the necessity of reviewing twenty years of business dealings to establish its defense. However, there appears to be no indication of any bad faith or deliberate confusion on defendant's part, hence, we are of the opinion that, in the absence of some showing of bad faith or the deliberate adoption of a course of business dealings calculated to render litigation pertaining thereto unnecessarily prolix and expensive, the penalty of denial or apportionment of costs under Rule 54(d) should be imposed only for acts or omissions on the part of the prevailing party in the actual course of the litigation, except that where it is clear that the action was brought in good faith, involving issues as to which the law is in doubt, the court may in its discretion require each party to bear its own costs although the decision is adverse to plaintiff. See Bliss v. Anaconda Copper Mining Co., 167 Fed. 1024, 1028. In our case, since the judgment was not for each party to bear its own costs, but rather to pay half of the fees and charges of the master, and since that judgment in fact amounted to a penalty on defendant for prolongation of the litigation, the judgment was erroneous.

The judgment of the District Court in No. 9158 is affirmed, and that part of the judgment involved in No. 9159 taxing to defendant one-half of the costs of the proceedings before the master is reversed.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. No. 48C 1599. June 15, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Production of Evidence as to Operating Expenses Ordered—Injunction Suit by Theatre Operator—Relevant Facts.—In an antitrust suit brought by a motion picture theatre operator for injunctive relief against an operator of a theatre circuit, books, accounts and records revealing the admission revenues, feature film costs, rebates and allowances of film rentals and all other operating expenses were ordered to be produced since the inspection was in regard to relevant facts.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1650.251.

For the plaintiff: Seymour F. Simon, Chicago, Illinois.

For the defendants: Miles G. Seeley, Bryson P. Burnham of Mayer, Meyer, Austrian & Platt, Edward R. Johnston, Samuel W. Block, Jacob I. Grossman & Alfred B. Teton, Matthews & Springer, Rosenberg, Stein & Rosenberg, all of Chicago, Illinois.

Memorandum

JOHN P. BARNES, Judge: On May 18, 1949, the plaintiff, Benal Theatre Corporation, filed its written motion entitled "Motion for Order on Defendant Balaban and Katz Corporation to Produce for Inspection and copying or Photographing Designated Documents, Papers, Books, Accounts and Records," wherein it said:

"Now comes the plaintiff in the above entitled cause, by its attorney, and respectfully represents to the Court:

"1. This is a suit for injunctive relief brought by the plaintiff corporation under the antitrust laws of the United States.

"2. Plaintiff operates the motion picture theatre in the City of Chicago known as the Ridge Theatre and located at 1550 West Devon Avenue.

"3. The defendant Balaban and Katz is the operator of a circuit of motion picture theatres in the City of Chicago and adjoining suburbs. Its wholly or partially owned subsidiaries operate a large number of theatres in the States of Indiana and Illinois outside of Chicago. Among the theatres operated by said defendant Balaban and Katz Corporation are those hereinafter named.

"4. The plaintiff claims that because of alleged violations of the antitrust laws to which it was subjected, it was not given the opportunity to license motion pictures for exhibition in the Ridge Theatre on early and preferred runs in the City of Chicago. Counsel for plaintiff believes that defendants will attempt to justify the practices which they have followed in licensing pictures on early and preferred runs to Balaban & Katz and not to the Ridge on the ground that the theatres operated by Balaban & Katz were able to pay the defendant distributors more money for their pictures than the plaintiff could pay for their exhibition at the Ridge, and that said Balaban & Katz theatres paid the defendant distributors high film rental. It is, therefore, relevant and material for the plaintiff to know how much the defendant Balaban & Katz did pay the defendant distributors for pictures and also to be able to show that the Ridge Theatre, when playing on an early and preferred run, could afford to pay the defendant distributors as much for their pictures as Balaban & Katz theatres paid, and that the prices at which the defendant distributors licensed pictures to Balaban & Katz were ridiculously low.

"5. The books and records requested concern several theatres whose run has been improved during the past several months by the defendant distributors, and the plaintiff desires to show that an earlier run is preferable because it increases the profit of the theatre whose run is advanced.

"6. The film rental information requested duplicates to some extent information previously furnished by the defendant distributors by way of interrogatory answers. It is desired to check the accuracy of the information furnished by comparing it with the Balaban & Katz records.

"7. Plaintiff also claims that the defendant Balaban & Katz buys pictures from the defendant distributors for all of its theatres as a circuit, and the film rental which the defendant Balaban & Katz agrees to pay is then allocated to various theatres in the circuit. For that reason, plaintiff desires to show that the film rental at which pictures were licensed to various Balaban & Katz theatres by the defendant distributors did not bear any relation to the gross receipts which those theatres normally enjoyed, and that adjustments or lower film rentals were granted to Balaban & Katz in certain situations to compensate for higher film rentals paid in competitive situations.

"8. Plaintiff also desires to show that Balaban & Katz juggled runs in its theatres at will to best suit its rental arrangements with its lessors

"Wherefore, the plaintiff respectfully moves that the defendant Balaban & Katz be ordered to produce for inspection or copying or photographing by the defendant or its attorney, the following:

"A. All books, records and accounts of Balaban & Katz and its wholly and partially owned subsidiaries reflecting or containing entries with respect to admission revenues, other income, feature film costs, other film costs, advertising expenses, salaries and charges, licenses, taxes, repairs, supplies and materials, heat, power and light, rent, interest, insurance, adjustments, modifications, rebates or allowances on film and all other expenses in connection with the acquisition and operation of the following named theatres since February 1, 1942: (naming 25 theatres)

"B. If said books, records and accounts shall show, or it shall otherwise appear, that any item of income or expense or any rebate, adjustment or allowance on film rental credited or charged to any of the above named theatres during said period was a proration or allocation of income or expense involving other theatres or enterprises owned or operated by Balaban & Katz, then all such further books, records and accounts as may reflect or contain entries with respect to the total amounts of such prorated income or expense.

"C. All books, records and accounts of the defendant Balaban & Katz and its wholly or partially owned subsidiaries reflecting or containing entries with respect to admission revenues, feature film costs and other film costs and modifications, adjustments, rebates and allowances of film rentals in connection with the operation of all theatres operated by Balaban & Katz and its wholly or partially owned subsidiaries since February 1, 1942."

Attached to the motion is an affidavit of counsel for the plaintiff wherein he says:

"that he is attorney for plaintiff herein; that he is charged by his client with the responsibility for the conduct of this case; that he has studied the pleadings and is familiar with the issues thereby raised; that he is experienced in the preparation and trial of causes involving similar issues of law and of fact and that in his opinion inspection of the books, records and other documents enumerated in the foregoing motion is essential to the proper preparation for trial of the claims made by plaintiff. He further says that upon the request of the accounting firm of Touche, Niven, Bailey and Smart, which, he is informed and believes, has been employed by all defendants in this action, he has voluntarily consented to an inspection by said accountants of books and records of similar character to those whose inspection by plaintiff is requested by this motion."

On May 23, 1949, the motion was argued orally by counsel for the respective parties. The transcript shows that the following proceedings were had on that day:

"BY THE CLERK: No. 48 C 1599, Benal Theatre against Paramount.

"BY THE COURT: Proceed.

"BY MR. SIMON: May it please the Court, one category of documents that I wish to inspect are books which show admission revenues received by Balaban & Katz.

"BY THE COURT: Show what?

"BY MR. SIMON: Books which contain entries regarding admission fees received by——

"BY THE COURT: Admission?

"BY MR. SIMON: Admission, yes, sir.

"——admission revenues received by Balaban & Katz, and its subsidiaries; and books which show the cost of film at Balaban & Katz theatres, and any modifications, adjustments, rebates and allowances on film rentals received by Balaban & Katz or its subsidiaries.

"The reason we want to inspect those books to get that information is threefold.

"First, we expect that it will show that the greater number of theatres in a given area which play a picture on an early run the larger the gross receipts, the combined gross receipts of the theatres that play that picture are, and therefore the higher film rentals the distributor of that picture can expect.

"The second reason that we want this is to check the accuracy of certain answers to interrogatories which have been previously submitted to us on film rentals paid.

"The third, and most important reason —and this is the principal reason, your Honor, is this: It is our claim that when Balaban & Katz buys a picture it buys it as a circuit; it buys it for all of its theatres at one time.

"Now, when it makes a deal with the distributor and allocates film rental to various theatres, it may allocate a higher film rental than ordinary to the theatres which are in the vicinity of the plaintiff's theatre, the Ridge Theatre. And we want to find out whether Balaban & Katz is compensated for that by a lower film rental in another theatre somewhere else where it has no competition—a lower film rental than would ordinarily be expected there, or by rebate, modification, adjustment and allowance on film rentals either in the theatres near the Ridge or in some other theatres that the picture is played.

"Those are the reasons that we want that type of information, your Honor.

"In addition to that, we have asked for an audit on certain specific named theatres in Chicago, and some of the suburbs adjoining Chicago, in Evanston and in Berwyn.

"The reason we want to make this audit is to show, first, that a theatre makes more money in the City of Chicago when it plays on an early run than when it plays on a late run.

"Second, the defendants, as they have in other cases, are going to come into court and say that they sell Balaban & Katz because Balaban & Katz is a fine customer, they enjoy doing business with Balaban & Katz, they have had pleasant business relations with Balaban & Katz over the years.

"We hope to show by this audit that the leading Balaban & Katz theatres in the city pay an unreasonably low percentage of their receipts to these distributors as film rental, considering the operating expenses of those theatres. And in view of that we think that it is reasonable to expect that in the absence of a conspiracy and in view of that condition the distributors of motion pictures would encourage us to bid for their pictures—would want us to bid for their pictures, instead of telling us, as the situation has been, 'There is no way you can bid; Balaban & Katz is our customer, we sell them all pictures for exhibition first, and the only way you can buy these pictures is to show them after Balaban & Katz get through playing them.'

"The third reason we want to make the audit of these specific named theatres, your Honor, is to show that Balaban & Katz juggles the runs of its theatres—pushes the runs of theatres up or puts the runs of its theatres back in order to best suit its arrangements with its lessors; that is, where they have a percentage lease with a lessee the run of the theatre may be held back, and if the time comes when that lease arrangement with that lessor is changed so that they no longer pay the lessor a percentage of the gross receipts, then we find that the run of the theatre is advanced, because the extra income that comes to Balaban & Katz from that increase in run can be kept by Balaban & Katz instead of their having to share it with the landlord.

"Several weeks ago the defendants asked me to permit them to send auditors to inspect our books. And I have consented to that. And for at least the past two weeks they have been down at our offices making the type of inspection of our books that we want to make of the books of the defendant, Balaban & Katz.

"BY MR. JOHNSTON: May it please the Court, this is not a suit for damages. This is a suit for injunction, merely.

"The basis, or alleged basis, for an injunction is a conspiracy—a present conspiracy, a conspiracy existing at the time of the filing of the bill, and a threat, of course, of the continuance of that alleged conspiracy.

"It seeks merely an injunction to prevent the defendant distributors of motion pictures from preventing the plaintiff, which is a local theatre, a neighborhood theatre out on West Devon Avenue, from obtaining a prior run, or broader run of pictures in competition with the neighborhood theatres in the neighborhood of the Ridge Theatre.

"That is the issue presented by this bill and by the answers which will be filed to the bill.

"What the plaintiff is seeking in this case is this: He is asking your Honor to enter an order under Rule 34 which will permit an examination of the books of every Balaban & Katz theatre, whether located in Illinois, whether located in Ohio, or elsewhere.

"The bill alleges that there are fifty Balaban & Katz theatres in Chicago; that there are seventy outlying theatres in the State of Illinois, operated by subsidiaries; and some in the State of Ohio, and I believe in some other states.

"The order which is presented to your Honor, and the request which is made that we be required to submit to an investigation on that sort of an issue, an issue for an injunction based upon a conspiracy which affects only that local theatre in its right to compete against the theatres in its immediate vicinity—an investigation of the books of Balaban & Katz in these one hundred and twenty-odd theatres throughout this great territory.

"Not only what film rentals are being paid, but this order asks for all of the details of cost of Balaban & Katz in the operation of every one of these one hundred and twenty theatres—what they pay for rent; what they pay for light; what they paid for heat; and what they pay for every item of expense in connection with the operation of these theatres.

"Now, if the Court please, these rules were not designed for any such purpose as that. As your Honor knows well, they were designed to liberalize the rules of obtaining evidence in order to speed the trial of cases.

"They were not designed, and there is nothing in the rules which permits any such wholesale investigation of the books and records of a competitor, as the plaintiff seeks in this case.

"The limits of materiality under the allegations of this bill would be to determine what film rentals were paid by Balaban & Katz to these defendant distributors by the theatres in this small, local competitive area where the plaintiff's theatre operates. That might be material, what film rentals were paid. That might have something to do with the question of the alleged conspiracy or the impact of the alleged conspiracy.

"But what possible relevancy to the issues submitted in this suit does it have to find out what Balaban & Katz pays one of its large theatres in the City of Chicago, or one of its central theatres, or two or three of its outlying theatres on the north side which does not compete with this small neighborhood theatre, or what its rentals or other expenses are in connection with the operation of those theatres?

"Your honor, it is simply preposterous. It has no relevancy. And it does not come within this rule, which is that there must be relevancy to the subject matter.

"It is done clearly, not for the purpose of obtaining information for this suit; it is done for a purpose—one purpose, and that is to attempt to sufficiently annoy Balaban & Katz, one of these defendants, by subjecting all its books for all of these theatres to a series of examinations so as to force Balaban & Katz in some way to settle, or to agree to a settlement of this suit.

"The other purpose is that this same attorney has ten of these cases pending; he has brought ten of these cases in this Court against the same general group of defendants, for the same general relief, and in some cases making large claims for damages. And this general spread of information is for the purpose of aiding the plaintiff's counsel, not only in these pending cases, but in the starting of other cases that are being commenced now about once a week; and in fact the thing has become a regular racket since the decision in the Bigelow case.

"But not this sort of order, the sort of order that is sought here. We have no objection to an examination of our books as to the merits of this case, on the question of whether there was, or is, a present conspiracy. But not going away back. And mind, he is asking to go back to 1942, a seven-years' examination. On no possible theory can that be material.

"There, of course, are allegations in the bill about prior conspiracies of other groups of respondents, some of whom are involved here and some not.

"And as your Honor knows, the question which you Honor will decide is, was there a conspiracy? And is there now a conspiracy existing at the time this bill was filed, which prevents this plaintiff from obtaining its rights with respect to the purchase of film? Not what was done in the past, which has nothing whatever to do with the question of an existing conspiracy. Yet he is asking to go back to 1942, and for a period of seven years to examine the books of the hundred and twenty theatres scattered throughout this particular western territory.

"I cannot think of anything which would seem to me to be more clearly a perversion of what was intended by these rules.

"Your Honor is entirely familiar with it. The language now of course refers to the language for clarification to 26 (b). And 26 (b) of course makes it clear that the matter must be something relevant to the general subject matter of the inquiry of the suit, something which will either produce evidence or open up evidence to disclose facts which would aid the plaintiff either in prosecuting his suit or in aiding him in defending against the defense presented by the defendant respondents.

"I submit to your Honor that this sort of an order does not come within a million miles of that, and not only would be a most intolerable burden upon this one defendant. But mark what the plaintiff says in his petition.

"The reason he is asking this is because all these distributors—not these defendant distributors—are going to claim that they get more film rental when they sell to theatres in the immediate vicinity of his theatre than if they sell to his Ridge Theatre. And yet he is seeking this information from Balaban & Katz, which is his competitor in that local area, because it has a theatre or two in that general vicinity which can be said to compete with his theatre.

"That is the scope and nature of the relief which is sought.

"I submit to your Honor that when the Supreme Court passed on Rule 34 in the Hickman v. Taylor case (329 U. S. 495), which your Honor knows is probably the most exhaustive discussion of Rule 34, they used this language:

"'Examination into a person's files and records,'—

Of course, that was an individual situation, and not a corporation:

"'— * * * including those resulting from the professional activities of an attorney, must be judged with care. It is not without reason that various safeguards have been established to preclude unwarranted excursions into the privacy of a man's work. At the same time, public policy supports reasonable and necessary inquiries.'

"The same thing, as your Honor knows, runs all through the decisions mostly of the District Courts, because very few of these cases have gone up on appeal with respect to the examination of books and records. And if the examination is of the books and records of the competitor, the court will, as the Supreme Court says in this case, proceed with care to not compel the disclosure of books and records which may not have any relevancy to the general subject matter of the inquiry or to the lawsuit.

"The Court should take into account the fact that this plaintiff's counsel here is bringing one of these suits on the average once a week, or once every two weeks, by a new plaintiff, seeking this same sort of relief.

"If we are to be subjected to this sort of thing it becomes an intolerable burden, the sort of thing which the court certainly had in mind in Rule 30 (b) when it said the court should have the right in its discretion to protect a defendant against the unreasonable application thereof through such examination or discovery of documents.

"And I submit, your Honor,.there is no suggestion here for permitting this plaintiff to do more than examine and determine from the books pertaining to this immediate neighborhood—and he has indicated what those theatres are in that immediate vicinity out there, to find out what film rentals they paid to these various distributors, which may have some relevancy. But beyond that he has no right to go. And it would be a gross imposition, I say, to require any such discovery as he is now seeking in this case.

"I thank you."

"BY MR. SIMON: Your Honor, I should like to say——"

"BY MR. JOHNSTON: Let me just say this. This defendant did not ask for an examination of the plaintiff's books. Some of the distributors did. But we haven't asked for any. But that would be perfectly proper anyway."

"BY MR. SIMON: I should like to take just a minute or two, your Honor, to comment on what I consider a personal attack that Mr. Johnston has made upon me and upon my integrity.

"It is true that I have filed a lot of these cases. I assume the reason for it is that I have gained some familiarity with the motion picture business and with the way motion pictures are sold, with the way the defendants have conducted the motion picture business. But I think it ill becomes counsel for the defendant Balaban & Katz and Paramount, of whom the Supreme Court has spoken in the terms it spoke in its decision of last spring in U. S. v. Paramount, to accuse counsel and clients who are now suing that defendant to compel it to comply with the spirit of the opinion of the Supreme Court, of operating a racket.

"The reason that all these suits have been filed since that Supreme Court opinion is that the Supreme Court found that there was a conspiracy to monopolize trade and commerce; they found that there had been a violation of the antitrust laws; and at least four of the defendants in that connection, Mr. Johnston's clients, Paramount, and Balaban & Katz, Warner Bros., Universal, Columbia and United Artists have made no attempt to even comply with the Supreme Court's opinion and with the spirit of that opinion. They still tell you, your Honor, as they always have in the past when we ask to be able to license their pictures—and this is not only the Ridge Theatre itself, every independent theatre in the City of Chicago except those that have brought lawsuits, and every one, they all told them, and they tell each of these theatres, 'Go away, we sell to Balaban & Katz. We don't want to sell you. We are not interested in permitting you to compete. We don't care what you are paying for these pictures. Balaban & Katz is our customer. And when Balaban & Katz gets through playing them you can play them in the hierarchy of operation that we have always followed in Chicago' —the old playing position which the Supreme Court held to be illegal in the Jackson Park case.

"And that is why, as I have said to your Honor, this Court is flooded with these lawsuits.

"Apparently they will think they have a God-given right, so that when someone challenges their right to play pictures counsel comes in and accuses those people of running a racket.

"We have been all through this, your Honor, on the questions which Mr. Johnston has raised, when he says that this case ought to be confined to the north side of Chicago, and that we should not go into the south side of Chicago. We had that question up before your Honor, and your Honor ruled that it was material what the distributors received for pictures in south side theatres.

"Since that time these interrogatories have been answered, and I believe that they prove the point that I predicted they would prove at the time of the argument, that Mr. Johnston's own client, when it sells the Jackson Park Theatre, or the Piccadilly Theatre or the Tivoli Theatre to pay day and date on the south side the first run gets more money from those pictures as a distributor than it might when it is sold to its own theatre, the Tivoli, exclusively.

"Mr. Johnston says that the thing that is at issue here is what the theatres around the Ridge paid for pictures. I assume that he means the Uptown, the Granada, the Northtown—and I agree that that is the thing at issue, your Honor. But we want to find out what in fact those theatres pay for pictures; the matter of what the books of a circuit like Balaban & Katz show that these theatres pay for pictures may be just a matter of bookkeeping. There is nothing to prevent them from paying fifty or sixty percent of their gross receipts to Warner Bros. for the Uptown, the Granada, or the Northtown Theatres, and then coming in here and saying, 'Look, we paid $8,000 for this picture at the Northtown. You can't possibly offer Warner Bros. that price. That is why they sell us.'

"We want to make this inspection, your Honor, to make sure that these prices are bona fide film prices, and that somewhere else in the circuit they do not counterbalance that eight thousand dollars off and get the pictures at five percent of the gross receipts or at ten percent of the gross receipts.

"And actually, the check that I want to make here is for the purpose of satisfying ourselves and satisfying the Court that the film rentals paid at these theatres are bona fide film rentals which are paid throughout the Balaban & Katz circuit, and not just in a competitive situation where litigation is pending so that they have a pretty picture to come into court with and to offer in evidence at the trial of the case.

"I think Mr. Johnston also has misread the motion. I have asked for details of expenses, such as rent and costs other than film costs, only for certain specifically named theatres in the city. Outside of those specifically named theatres the only item of costs as I stated before that I want are the expenses of feature film costs and other film costs and modifications and adjustments and refunds and allowances on film rental, in addition to their admission revenues. I do not care about any of the other costs."

"BY THE COURT: I will take the papers and I will let you know what I think about the matter within a week."

"BY MR. JOHNSTON: If I might say, counsel is in error: We are operating under a decree, and we are following that decree. The decree has been entered in the Paramount case."

The defendant Balaban & Katz Corporation then filed a paper entitled "Objections of Defendant Balaban & Katz Corporation to Plaintiff's Motion for Order on said Defendant to Produce for Inspection and Copying or Photographing Designated Documents, Papers, Books, Accounts and Records," wherein it said:

"Balaban & Katz Corporation, one of the defendants in the above-entitled cause, by its attorneys, hereby respectfully represents to this Court, in opposition to the motion for an order on Balaban & Katz Corporation to produce for inspection and copying or photographing certain designated documents, papers, books, accounts and records, the following:

"1. This is a suit for injunctive relief brought by the plaintiff corporation under the anti-trust laws of the United States. It alleges, as it must, a present conspiracy involving Balaban & Katz Corporation and a number of defendant distributors. It is further alleged that this conspiracy presently is intended to and does deny to the plaintiff certain rights to purchase competitively feature motion pictures for exhibition in the Ridge Theatre in the playing position to which the plaintiff considers that the Ridge Theatre is entitled. The allegation of future damage is also included, as required by the statute.

"2. The plaintiff has served upon the various distributor defendants, and Balaban & Katz Corporation, a large number of interrogatories, answers to which interrogatories are, in whole or in part, in the files of this Court. Said interrogatories contain, for various pictures in various theatres, details as to film rental paid by the particular exhibitor for the particular picture in each theatre. In the case of pictures played under contracts calling for rental to be determined by a percentage of gross receipts, the answers to the interrogatories also set forth the gross receipts of the theatre for the week or weeks in which the particular picture so licensed was exhibited.

"3. Plaintiff's motion here objected to is for discovery under Rule 34. It demands, first of all the right to make complete audits for the following twenty-five theatres for the years since February 1, 1942: (name 25 theatres)

"(a) Although plaintiff has been requested to supply defendant Balaban & Katz Corporation with the names of theatres with which the plaintiff considers the Ridge Theatre to be in substantial competition, plaintiff has not done so. Plaintiff's excuse, given orally, has been that it is uncertain whether both the Granada and the Northtown Theatres are in substantial competition with the Ridge, or only the Granada Theatre. Plaintiff in the instant motion demands intimate details for a period of seven years for twenty-five theatres, covering not only the competitive area surrounding the plaintiff's theatre, but also including theatres in Evanston and on the far south and west sides of Chicago;

"(b) Although plaintiff's complaint alleges a present conspiracy threatening plaintiff with future damage, the instant motion demands details for a period of seven years in the past. As the plaintiff's complaint shows, the method of licensing motion pictures for exhibition in the City of Chicago has changed since December, 1947, over a year prior to the filing of this suit. The manner of licensing pictures has, since December 1, 1947, been in accordance with the decree of this Court in the case entitled 'Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures Corporation, Inc.' (Complaint, para. 25);

"(c) The details of income and expenses demanded by plaintiff, including rentals paid for particular theatres, are not for the purpose of preparing its case or defense in the instant matter. They are for the purpose of harassing the defendant Balaban & Katz Corporation, and for aiding plaintiff's counsel in the prosecution of the many other suits which have been filed in this District, or which plaintiff's counsel threatens to file;

"(d) The plaintiff's demand for the audits referred to in paragraph (a) of the motion (page 3) has no relevancy whatever to the case which plaintiff's complaint attempts to allege.

"4. Plaintiff's motion, in addition to the demand for the audit of twenty-five theatres, further demands an audit of all books, records and accounts for 'other theatres or enterprises owned or operated by Balaban & Katz' (Para. (b), page 3). It is true that the further audit is to be demanded only if the audit of the twenty-five theatres discloses 'or it shall otherwise appear,' that any item of income or expense or any rebate, adjustment or allowance on film rental credited or charged on the books of any of the twenty-five theatres prove to be a proration or allocation involving other theatres of the Balaban & Katz circuit. It is obvious that plaintiff will be able to claim that it at least 'otherwise appears' that a proration is involved in some item of income or expense and thus demand, under the order, a complete audit of all of the books and records of Balaban & Katz Corporation for all of its 120 theatres.

"5. Even if limited solely to the twenty-five theatres named, the audit demanded goes far beyond any discovery to which plaintiff is properly entitled and is a clearly unwarranted excursion into the privacy of the Balaban & Katz operation. This is particularly true where, as here, the demand is made on the part of a competitor of Balaban & Katz and by an attorney whose constant harassment of the distributors and exhibitors makes clear the purpose for which the audit is sought.

"6. The motion here objected to further requests all admission revenues and film rentals for all of the Balaban & Katz theatres. Plaintiff alleges in the complaint that 120 theatres at a minimum are involved in this demand. Clearly, the film rental and admission revenues in theatres other than those in the immediate competitive area of the plaintiff theatre are in no sense material and relevant. The sole question presented by the complaint is whether or not a conspiracy existed at the time of the filing of the complaint, and now exists, which denies to the plaintiff the rights to which it would otherwise be entitled. The motion for a discovery of 'admission revenues, feature film costs and other film costs and modification, adjustments, rebates and allowances of all film rentals in connection with the operation of all theatres operated by Balaban & Katz and its wholly-owned or partially-owned subsidiaries since February 1, 1942' is so extensive as to label it for what it is—an unwarranted excursion into the privacy of the operation of the Balaban & Katz theatres.

"7. Plaintiff's motion states that all of this information is necessary in order to counter what plaintiff argues will be a defense put up by the defendants, i. e., the amount of film rentals that Balaban & Katz was able to pay the defendant distributors. This issue is one solely involved in the amount of rental paid by the theatres in the immediate competitive area of the Ridge Theatre, which film rentals plaintiff has already obtained from the defendant distributors by way of interrogatory. There is no reason for plaintiff to demand this information from the defendant Balaban & Katz Corporation, the sole exhibitor defendant in the case and the immediate competitor of the plaintiff.

"8. Plaintiff further states in support of its motion that it requires the information 'to check the accuracy of the information furnished by the defendant distributors in their interrogatory answers.' If this is honestly what plaintiff desires, appropriate methods of limited inquiry are available to it without the broad scale demands for discovery which, by their very area, disclose themselves as improper utilization of the Federal Rules.

"Wherefore defendant Balaban & Katz Corporation by its attorneys respectfully moves that the motion for discovery be denied, or, in the alternative, that it be limited solely to film rentals and admission revenues in the theatres in the immediate competitive area of the Ridge Theatre, which theatres the plaintiff be required to name."

Attached to the Objections is an affidavit of counsel for the defendant Balaban & Katz Corporation, wherein he says:

"1. He is counsel for Balaban & Katz Corporation, one of the defendants in the above-entitled matter and as such is charged with the preparation of its defense.

"2. He has read the motion of plaintiff for discovery, to which motion objections have been filed by Balaban & Katz Corporation and has read the objections of Balaban & Katz Corporation to said motion; that in his opinion said motion is improperly based on the facts and the law for the reasons set forth in said objections.

"3. He has read the objections to said motion filed on behalf of said Balaban & Katz Corporation and that the statements therein are true and correct."

Subsequently, the plaintiff filed another paper which it entitled "Plaintiff's reply to Objections of Defendant Balaban & Katz Corporation to Plaintiff's Motion for Order on said Defendant to Produce for Inspection and Copying or Photographing Designated Documents, Papers, Books, Accounts and Records," wherein it said:

"Counsel for Balaban & Katz Corporation (herein called 'B & K'), conceded in oral argument that the data requested by plaintiff with regard to theatres in the immediate competitive area of plaintiff's theatre, the Ridge, was relevant. This data is meaningless, however, unless plaintiff is given the opportunity to determine whether bookkeeping entries showing film rentals paid by B & K theatres in the immediate competitive area of the Ridge represent bona fide film rentals paid. B & K operates a large circuit of theatres and buys the same pictures from the same distributors for most of these theatres. It would be a simple matter, therefore, for B & K and the distributors to show as matters of bookkeeping record that B & K theatres around the Ridge paid certain prices for film and at the same time grant film rental rebates to other B & K theatres or license film to other B & K theatres at reduced rentals or at prices which bore an unreasonably low relation to the gross receipts of such other B & K theatres. That is a simple matter of taking it out of one pocket and putting it in another. To check whether this was done, plaintiff is required to examine the film rentals paid by all B & K theatres and the admission receipts of those theatres.

"Plaintiff feels that prior to the trial of this case the 'precaution' of making an examination to determine whether bookkeeping entries in the defendants' books represent bona fide film rentals must be taken, particularly in view of the recent comments of the United States Supreme Court in U. S. v. Paramount Pictures, et al., 68 S. Ct. 915, about the character and integrity of the defendants in that case, who are also defendants in this action.

"The Supreme Court said at 68 S. Ct. 925, in referring to the defendant film companies:

'Those who have shown such a marked proclivity for unlawful conduct are in no position to complain that they carry the burden of showing that their future clearances come within the law.'

"Again, at 68 S. Ct. 924, in denying the defendants, in granting clearances, the right to take into consideration what is reasonably necessary for a fair return to the licensor, the Supreme Court said:

'That is too potent a weapon to leave in the hands of those whose proclivity to unlawful conduct has been so marked.'

"Again, at 68 S. Ct. 932, the Supreme Court referred to the defendants as 'those who had the genius to conceive the present conspiracy and to execute it with the subtlety which this record reveals.'

"That is the principal reason plaintiff requests the opportunity to examine the books and records of B & K and its subsidiaries containing entries with respect to admission revenues, film costs and modifications, adjustments, rebates and allowances of film rentals. In addition, this examination will enable the plaintiff to check the accuracy of certain film rental figures which have already been furnished by way of interrogatory answer, and will enable the plaintiff to show that, as the plaintiff contends, it is to the economic advantage of a motion picture distributor to encourage a large number of theatres in a given area to play its pictures on an early run instead of limiting that run to a small number of B & K theatres as they have done heretofore.

"In addition to the examination outlined above, plaintiff is requesting permission to make an audit of the records of 25 specifically named B & K theatres in Chicago and suburbs adjacent to Chicago. Counsel for plaintiff is certain that the defendants, at the trial of this case, will attempt to show that even though the plaintiff has been deprived of the opportunity of obtaining first run pictures, it has not been damaged by such deprivation. The audit requested with respect to the specifically named theatres will answer this defense by showing that the earlier a theatre plays pictures in relation to other theatres in its vicinity, the more money that theatre makes. In addition, counsel for plaintiff feels certain that the defendants will attempt to justify their practice of licensing early and preferred runs of pictures to B & K on the theory that B & K was a splendid customer which paid them generous film rentals. Plaintiff expects that the audit it desires to make will show that B & K was not a good customer, but rather, a very poor customer, and that its theatres which played on early and preferred runs enjoyed exorbitant profits in which the distributors were not permitted to share because the monopoly position of B & K forced the distributors to sell B & K at film rentals which bore no reasonable relation to the profits which B & K was able to make from the showing of their pictures. Finally, plaintiff expects to show by this audit of the records of the specifically named theatres that B & K was able, because of its monopoly, to juggle runs in its various theatres to best suit its arrangements with its landlords. That is, a theatre which was leased by B & K at a percentage rental was played in a position inferior to the playing positions of theatres which B & K owned or which B & K leased at a straight rental figure.

"B & K objects to this examination because it covers theatres on the south and west sides of Chicago. We have already been through that argument once in this case in connection with the objections of the defendant Paramount, which is represented by the same counsel as B & K, to interrogatories propounded by plaintiff relating to south side theatres, and Your Honor ruled that the information requested was relevant and ordered the defendants to answer the interrogatories. The answers to those interrogatories, which have since been submitted, show what counsel for plaintiff at the argument on the objections to the interrogatories predicted they would show, namely, that Paramount as a distributor gets more film rental from the first run exhibition of its pictures on the south side of Chicago by licensing them to the Tivoli, Jackson Park and Piccadilly Theatres to play simultaneously, than Paramount got prior to the entry of the Decree in this Court in the Jackson Park case, when it limited the first run license on the south side to the Tivoli Theatre. For example, the highest film rental Paramount received from the Tivoli Theatre in the year 1947 was $4,364.00 on the picture CALIFORNIA. In the year 1948, the combined film rental it received from the Jackson Park and Tivoli on UNCONQUERED was $6,159.00 and the combined film rental it received from the Tivoli, Jackson Park and Piccadilly on EMPERORS WALTZ was $7,186, and on SORRY, WRONG NUMBER, $7,324. The interrogatory answers filed by the other defendant distributors show the same thing, namely, that the Decree which this Court entered in the Jackson Park case was to the economic advantage rather than the economic disadvantage of the distributors. It at least partially freed them from the shackle-hold of the B & K monopoly and permitted them to sell their pictures on early runs on the south side to other exhibitors than B & K. Yet, on the north side of Chicago, to which the Decree in the Jackson Park case does not apply, the defendant distributors continue to do business in the same old way and at the same old stand. On the north side, they still limit the early run of pictures to the B & K theatres.

"Much has been said by counsel for B & K, both in oral arguments and in their written objections, about the motives of counsel for plaintiff in presenting this motion. As a matter of fact, the charges made by counsel for B & K, if true, might even warrant disciplinary action by this Court against counsel for plaintiff, and it therefore surprises counsel for plaintiff that attorneys who have as eminent and respected a standing at this Bar as counsel for defendants, would make such charges, particularly under oath, without mature and careful consideration, and without well-founded proof. The charges are not only vicious untruths, but also are absurdly unrealistic.

"In the oral argument, counsel for B & K stated that the purpose of the motion was to harass his client into making a settlement of this matter. In view of this statement, it is only fair to advise the Court that counsel in this matter have discussed settlement at great length, and approximately two weeks ago all counsel agreed that there was no possible basis for settlement and that the case would have to be tried. Counsel for plaintiff, having already spent considerable time in settlement discussions, does not expect to devote any more time to such discussions, since such time would be at the expense of his trial preparation.

"Then, counsel for B & K claim that the purpose of the examination which plaintiff seeks to make is so that plaintiff's counsel will be aided in the prosecution of other suits which have been filed in this district or which plaintiff's counsel threatens to file. The examination which plaintiff is requesting permission to make will require the employment of trained accountants at considerable expense. Those accountants have already been engaged by plaintiff, subject to the Court's ruling on this motion, and they are being paid by plaintiff. It is not absurd to believe that plaintiff would go to the expense of employing accountants to make an examination of defendants' books for the purpose of assisting plaintiff's counsel in the prosecution of other matters in which plaintiff has no interest?

"Sometime ago the defendants requested that their accountants be permitted to examine the plaintiff's books and records. Counsel for plaintiff, knowing your Honor's desire that the parties to an action be given access by discovery to all matters which may reasonably be required in preparation for trial or to be offered in evidence, did not feel warranted to taking the time of the Court to object to the request, and, therefore, consented to the examination. For the past two weeks, plaintiff's books have been made available to those accountants and working space has been provided for them in plaintiff's office. Plaintis desires that its counsel be as thoroughly and carefully prepared to present its case and to meet all defenses which may be raised, as are counsel for defendants. For that reason, we desire to make the inspection requested in advance of trial, so that it will be unnecessary for plaintiff at the trial to request the production of the same records and then take the time of this Court and counsel and the parties to make an examination of them in the Courtroom."

Finally, the defendant Balaban & Katz Corporation filed a paper which it entitled "Defendant Balaban & Katz Corporation Answer to Plaintiff's Reply to Objections of Balaban & Katz Corporation to Plaintiff's Motion for Order for Inspection," wherein it said:

"Plaintiff has filed a reply to the objections of defendant Balaban & Katz Corporation to plaintiff's motion for an order on said defendant to produce for inspection and copying or photographing designated documents, papers, books, accounts and records. Because of the manner in which Balaban & Katz Corporation's original objections were presented to this Court, it is necessary to assume that plaintiff has stated in its reply its position in support of its motion.

"Plaintiff first argues in support of its demand for all film rentals that it seeks to determine whether or not the film rentals paid by the theatres 'around the Ridge' represent bona fide film rentals. To determine this, plaintiff argues, it must see what other Balaban & Katz theatres paid for film and must determine whether or not any rebates were granted by the distributors. Such an argument is merely an admission by plaintiff that the information which it demands by way of examination of Balaban & Katz' books, its exhibitor competitor, could be as readily obtained by interrogatories to the distributor defendants. As pointed out in the objections of Balaban & Katz already filed with the Court, the distributor defendants have been interrogated as to the film rentals paid by Balaban & Katz in most of the theatres in the period in question.

"Plaintiff flatly states, at page two of its reply, 'that is the principal reason plaintiff requests the opportunity to examine the books and records of Balaban & Katz and its subsidiaries containing entries with respect to admission revenues, costs and modifications, adjustments, rebates, and allowances of film rentals.' Such a 'principal reason' does not in any way sustain plaintiff's right to examine the books and records of its competitor.

"In support of both its claim for the right to inspect film rental figures and the further claim of right to make an audit of twenty-five theatres, plaintiff also argues that it will show 'it is to the economic advantage of a motion picture distributor to encourage a large number of theatres in a given area to play its picture on an earlier run instead of limiting that run to a small number of B & K theatres as they have done heretofore.' (Reply, p. 3.) This argument directly negatives the argument plaintiff has previously made, based upon certain language of the Supreme Court in its opinion in U. S. v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., et al., 334 U. S. 131 to the effect that clearances may be granted solely for the protection and economic advantage of the exhibitor. Moreover, the evidence which plaintiff cites in support of its claim for right to audit is misleading, since it attempts to compare one theatre in one year to two or more theatres in a second year. Plaintiff fails to take into account the subsequent runs that would otherwise have been enjoyed by the distributors in the theatres which, in the second year, played on earlier runs. Obviously, the economic complications of motion picture distribution and exhibition cannot be simplified by a comparison of two or three pictures in two or three theatres in any limited period. If the profits of the distributors are to be the test of reasonableness of clearance and runs, then it must be the totality of receipts from all runs of all theatres rather than the receipts from any single run in any one or more theatres.

"It is difficult to determine from plaintiff's reply what are the supporting reasons for its claim of right to make a detailed audit of twenty-five theatres operated by its competitor Balaban & Katz throughout the City of Chicago and its suburban areas. If plaintiff intends to support its outrageous demand by relying upon the plaintiff's right to prove that 'the earlier a theatre plays pictures in relation to other theatres in its vicinity, the more money that theatre makes.' (Reply, p. 3), it has admitted the point made by Balaban & Katz Corporation in its objections. Clearly, the complications of motion picture exhibition are such that at most a theatre can only be compared in terms of revenue potentials with other theatres 'in its vicinity' which are similar to it in size, appointments, ease of access, etc. Plaintiff's demand for a broad scale audit of twenty-five theatres covering the entire area of the City of Chicago and its suburbs stamps such motion as an unwarranted intrusion into the privacy of the business operation of its exhibitor competitor. As was pointed out in the objections of Balaban & Katz Corporation, plaintiff must be limited in its demand for information from its competitor to those theatres which are in substantial competition with plaintiff's theatre and whose appointments, location and ease of access are at least comparable.

"Plaintiff further relies, in support of its outrageous demands, upon this Court's ruling in connection with certain interrogatories directed to distributor defendants. The interrogatories directed to distributor defendants did not in any way raise the same question that is squarely presented to this Court by the broad scale demand for investigation into the books and records of a competitor contained in the instant motion. A court must be jealous to guard a business against unwarranted excursions into the privacy of its operations by a competitor, particularly where other sources are available for all of the information that may in any way be material and relevant for the instant case, or even may be considered to lead to the acquisition of material and relevant information. So a court might direct a distributor to disclose film rentals from theatres far removed from the plaintiff's theatre but refuse to permit that plaintiff to make a broad scale audit of its competitior's books when it admittedly seeks by such audit only confirmation of the data already obtained.

"All of the other points set forth in plaintiff's reply have already been covered. It may be pertinent to note that the argument concerning the rentals paid by Balaban & Katz for the use of its theatres is so obviously an excursion into the privacy of the Balaban & Katz operation by a competitor as to stamp clearly the nature of this motion. By no stretch of the imagination can the relations between Balaban & Katz and its landlords effect the rights of the plaintiff in the instant case. It could only aid the plaintiff as a competitor of Balaban & Katz, or other competitors of Balaban & Katz."

Law suits such as that at bar almost invariably promptly become bitter controversies wherein everything that either side asks for by way of preparation for trial is strenuously opposed by the other side. Since these suits do become bitter and since the bitterness does not become less with the age of the controversy, it behooves the court to dispose of the suit as speedily as possible consistent with the real rights of the parties.

Such opportunity of observation as the writer has had has convinced him that a liberal construction of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure providing for pre-trial discovery brings about a speedy disposition of law suits. A liberal construction of the rules not only saves the time of the court, of counsel and of the parties by shortening the time required for trials but also contributes to bring about settlements. After the evidentiary facts have been spread upon the record and both sides have had opportunity to consider them, the parties, knowing how much or how little they really have to quarrel about, are more likely to settle their controversy.

By the motion now before the court the plaintiff asks for the discovery of many facts. But the mere fact that it does ask for the discovery of many facts is no reason, in and of itself, why it should be denied the discovery of all or any part of the facts requested. That the discovery of many facts is sought is a reason that the motion should have careful consideration by the court. It has had that careful consideration. The court has considered the complaint and the answers and other papers that have been filed, together with the papers and arguments above recited at length.

The real question before the court under the rule is, Has the moving party made a showing that the facts requested are relevant? The court thinks it has. Many facts are relevant because of the magnitude of the defendant Balaban & Katz Corporation. If the defendant owned and operated but one theatre the facts which might be relevant and which, accordingly, could be compelled to be disclosed would be relatively few. The fact that the plaintiff must be compelled to pay someone to make the examinations sought is, in a sense, a guarantee that needless investigations will not be made. But even if this were not so, the court would be constrained to grant the discovery requested for the simple reason that the facts sought are relevant.

The plaintiff's motion may be granted. Such an order has this day been made.

[¶ 62,451] United States v. Universal Milk Bottle Service, Inc. et al.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio, Western Division. No. 7399 Cr. June 30, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Retail Milk Business—Price-Fixing Agreements—Instrastate Conspiracy Affects Interstate Commerce.—In a criminal action charging dairy companies with conspiracy to fix milk prices in violation of the Sherman Act, motions to dismiss the indictment for failure to state an offense were denied. It was held that the allegations of the indictment set forth facts to show a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce. The court further held that if the conspiracy with which the milk distributors were charged resulted in reducing the quantity of milk purchased by consumers, thus reducing the quantity of milk purchased by distributors from producers outside the state, then there was no question but what interstate commerce might be affected by what may have been a purely intrastate matter.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1630.201.

For the plaintiff: Robert H. Winn, Special Assistant to the Attorney General; Ray J. O'Donnell, United States Attorney; Robert E. Marshall, Assistant United States Attorney.

For the defendants Universal Milk Bottle Service, Inc., The Coors Brothers Co., The J. Weber Dairy Co., H. Miller Dairy Co., Inc., The J. H. Fielman Dairy Co., H. Woebkenberg Dairy Co., The Hyde Park Dairy Co., Cincinnati Milk Exchange: Robert N. Gorman of Gorman, Silversteen & Davis, Cincinnati, Ohio.

For the defendant The Matthews-Frechtling Dairy Co.: Nichols, Wood, Marx and Ginter, John J. Luhrman, of counsel, Cincinnati, Ohio.

For the defendant The Cooperative Pure Milk Ass'n: Orville A. Troy, Kenneth D. Troy, of Basler, Strauss & Troy, Harry S. Kasfir, S. Arthur Spiegel, all of Cincinnati, Ohio.

For the defendant The J. H. Berling's Dairy Products Co.: Michael Lacinak, Cincinnati, Ohio.

For the defendant Cedar Hill Farms, Inc.: Robert G. McIntosh, Cincinnati, Ohio.

[Review of Proceedings]

NEVIN, Chief Judge: At the April term, 1948, the Grand Jury of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio (Western Division) returned an indictment (filed September 24, 1948) against the above-named defendants charging them with having violated the provisions of Section 1, Title 15 U. S. C., commonly known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.

On October 12, 1948, the several defendants, each represented by its own counsel, filed motions to dismiss the indictment for the various reasons and upon the various grounds set forth in each motion respectively. Separate motions were also filed on the same date for a "Bill of Particulars."

At the same time some of the defendants severally filed a motion "For Inspection of Documents" and on September 24, 1948, the Government filed an "Application for Order Impounding Certain Documentary Evidence." The (several) motions for inspection of documents and the Government's "Application" have heretofore been disposed of, in the one instance by agreement of counsel, and in the other by an Order of the Court.

The cause is now before the Court, therefore, on the motions of the respective defendants to dismiss and for a Bill of Particulars.

I.

The Several Motions To Dismiss the Indictment

Briefs in support of and contra the granting of the motions to dismiss, as well as affidavits and documentary evidence have been filed and submitted. In addition, counsel have presented their views somewhat extensively by way of oral argument.

At the outset of the oral arguments, Judge Gorman [1] stated:

> "Every defendant has filed a motion to dismiss and they are all practically upon the same ground, that is, that the indictment doesn't state an offense against the laws of the United States and more particularly you might say on the ground that the indictment alleges a purely intrastate conspiracy but it does not show any substantial economic effect on interstate commerce. We contend that under the Sherman Act there must be a showing of a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce where it is alleged that only an intrastate conspiracy existed."

Defendants further contend that the indictment runs counter to the Order of the Secretary of Agriculture and for that reason the Court has no jurisdiction; that there is no allegation of intent, that the indictment is contradictory and ambiguous to such an extent that trial on it would deprive defendants of their rights under the Fifth and Sixth Amendments; that it is wholly lacking in the clarity and particularity requisite to inform defendants of the nature of the cause as required by the Fifth and Sixth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States; that the motions to dismiss should be sustained because the indictment only charges a conspiracy to raise, fix and maintain the retail and wholesale price of milk in Hamilton County, Ohio, and that the indictment fails to state facts constituting a conspiracy to restrain interstate commerce in that the interstate commerce "comes to rest" and hence the continuing commerce is intrastate, and therefore, the commerce involved is purely intrastate.

The Government submits its argument and authorities based on what it terms as two "doctrines" under either one or both of which it asserts the Motions to dismiss should be overruled insofar as they relate to or depend upon the premise either that "there must be a showing of a substantial economic affect on interstate commerce" or that the interstate commerce referred to in the Indictment "comes to rest." These "doctrines" are (a) The "affecting commerce" or "affectation" doctrine and (b) The "flow of commerce" or "in commerce" doctrine.

The "Affecting Commerce" Doctrine

In support of their contention that "there must be a showing of a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce where it is alleged that only an intrastate conspiracy existed" (which defendants assert is the fact here) all of the defendants rely upon the case of U. S. v. French-Bauer, Inc., et al., 48 Fed. Supp. 260. That case arose in this district. Defendants submit that as it stands unreversed, it is binding upon, or at least, should be followed by this Court in its determination of the present motions.

[1] All told, there are thirteen defendants. Judge Gorman and his associate counsel are counsel for nine of the defendants, to-wit: Universal Milk Bottle Service, Inc., The Coors Brothers Company, The J. Weber Dairy Company, H. Miller Dairy Co. Inc., The J. H. Fielman Dairy Company, G. H. Berling, Inc., H. Woebkenberg Dairy Co., The Hyde Park Dairy Company, and Cincinnati Milk Exchange.

With reference to the foregoing case, counsel for defendant, The Matthews-Frechtling Dairy Company, say:

> "There is, as Judge Ford said, no allegation of fact to indicate a direct and substantial restraint upon interstate trade. We, therefore, submit as controlling authority the case of United States v. French-Bauer, Inc., et al., 48 Fed. Supp. 260. This decision by Judge Ford is, to our minds, unanswerable by the United States of America."

Counsel for defendant, The Co-operative Pure Milk Association, submit that the indictment does not allege any fact or any act which directly or substantially affects interstate commerce or the avowed intention, purpose or necessary effect of which was the accomplishment of that result and that the Court in the French-Bauer case held that such allegations were absolutely necessary if the indictment was to stand as against a Motion to Dismiss, such as we have here.

Counsel for defendant, Cedar Hill Farms, Inc., after citing Industrial Association v. U. S., 268 U. S. 64, as bearing decisively upon the question of "Impact upon Interstate Commerce" or the "affecting commerce" doctrine adopts and approves (without further discussion) the arguments presented by Judge Gorman in his brief.

Counsel for defendant, The J. H. Berling's Dairy Products Company, states that in his opinion "the indictment in The United States v. French-Bauer case was more far-reaching and more in particular detail than the indictment now under attack and that upon the authority of that case "this (present) indictment should be dismissed."

In the French-Bauer case, French-Bauer, Inc., and others were indicted for engaging in a price-fixing conspiracy in violation of the Anti-Trust Laws. The cause came on before the Court on a Motion to Quash the Indictment, which motion the Court sustained. In the course of the Decision, the Court stated: (Page 260)

> "The conspiracy charged in this indictment is directed to the fixing of prices upon fluid milk which is not moving or intended to move in interstate commerce. The authorities teach that the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 1-7, 15 note may reach such a conspiracy, but only if the acts charged are such as directly and substantially affect the commerce in the commodity between the states," and the Court held that there were no factual allegations in the indictment before it sufficient to show direct and substantial impact upon Interstate Commerce.

It is agreed that the indictment in the instant case is identical with the one before the Court in the French-Bauer case, except that in the present indictment there has been inserted Paragraph 24, which was not in the indictment in the French-Bauer case. As to this, the record shows:

> "The Court: (addressing Mr. Winn, of Counsel for the Government) I was interested first to know whether you agree with the statement that this indictment is identical, at least, to all intents and purposes, with the one before Judge Ford, (in the French-Bauer case) excepting the insertion of this paragraph 24. Mr. Winn: I think that is a fair statement. I wouldn't say the indictment was identical with the prior indictment except for paragraph 24. However, the indictment is to all intents and purposes—The Court: Is it true it is identical so far as any application of the law is concerned? Mr. Winn: I think it is identical with the 1942 indictment but for the provisions of paragraph 24."

Paragraph 24 of the present indictment reads as follows:

> "24. Increases in prices charged by distributors in the Cincinnati Area for milk sold to consumers and other purchasers have had and have the effect of reducing the volume of milk purchased by said consumers and other purchasers, thus reducing the quantity of milk purchased by said distributors from producers in Kentucky, Indiana and Ohio."

Defendants assert that this allegation is nothing more than a legal conclusion and that in law it adds nothing to the indictment that was before the court in the French-Bauer case; that even with this addition, the present indictment does not charge an offense against any of the defendants.

The Government, on the other hand, submits that it is a factual allegation, that the factual statement is that the increases charged by the distributors for milk sold to consumers have had, and have the effect of reducing the volume of milk purchased by such consumers and other purchasers "thus reducing the quantity of milk purchased by said distributors from purchasers in Kentucky, Indiana and Ohio."

Counsel for the Government point out that the indictment in the French-Bauer case alleged no effect upon interstate commerce as a result of an alleged intrastate conspiracy and urge that by the inclusion of paragraph 24 the objection which the Court found to the indictment in the French-Bauer case is overcome.

The Court agrees with the Government's contention that the allegations of Paragraph 24 are factual and are not mere legal conclusions. Under the familiar rule the facts as alleged are admitted, on the pending motions, to be true, for the purposes of this decision.

The "affecting commerce" or "affectation" doctrine was first enunciated by Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1.

In Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U. S., 111 (decided shortly after the French-Bauer case) the Court says (PP. 120-123):

> "At the beginning Chief Justice Marshall described the federal commerce power with a breadth never yet exceeded. Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 194-195. * * * It was not until 1887, with the enactment of the Interstate Commerce Act, that the interstate commerce power began to exert positive influence in American law and life. This first important federal resort to the commerce power was followed in 1890 by the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and, thereafter, mainly after 1903, by many others. These statutes ushered in new phases of adjudication, which required the Court to approach the interpretation of the Commerce Clause in the light of an actual exercise by Congress of its power thereunder. When it first dealt with this new legislation, the Court adhered to its earlier pronouncements, and allowed but little scope to the power of Congress. United States v. Knight Co., 156 U. S. 1. * * * Not long after the decision of United States v. Knight Co., supra, Mr. Justice Holmes, in sustaining the exercise of national power over intrastate activity, stated for the Court that 'commerce among the States is not a technical legal conception, but a practical one, drawn from the course of business.' Swift & Co. v. United States, 196, U. S., 375, 398. It was soon demonstrated that the effects of many kinds of intrastate activity upon interstate commerce were such as to make them a proper subject of federal regulation. In some cases sustaining the exercise of federal power over intrastate matters the term 'direct' was used for the purpose of stating, rather than of reaching, a result; in others it was treated as synonymous with 'substantial' or 'material'; and in others it was not used at all. Of late its use has been abandoned in cases dealing with questions of federal power under the Commerce Clause."

In support of their contention that the indictment must show that a claimed intrastate conspiracy had a direct and substantial effect on interstate commerce, some (but not all) of the defendants cited and relied upon U. S. v. Womens Sportswear Manufacturers Association, 75 Fed. Supp. 112. As to this Judge Gorman states:

> "Briefly our principal point is that a purely intrastate conspiracy is alleged, and not an interstate conspiracy. Under the law an intrastate conspiracy can only be prosecuted under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act when there is a showing that the intrastate conspiracy had a direct and substantial effect on interstate commerce. Facts must be alleged setting forth the impact on interstate commerce and not merely conclusions of law. First, this indictment does not show such a direct and substantial effect as is necessary to base a valid charge. Such allegations are essential it has been held in many cases, including the recent one of United States v. Sportswear Mfg. Assn., 75 Fed. Supp. 112 (D. C. Mass.) decided December 10, 1947, and now on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States."

Other counsel, notably counsel for the Cooperative Pure Milk Association, assert that they at no time relied upon the Womens Sportswear case, saying:

> "We believed that the case was clearly distinguishable at the time when the ruling was adverse to the Government and we still feel that the case is distinguishable now that the courts have decided in favor of the Government."

The District Court in the Womens Sportswear case held that the prayer for injunction and other relief should be denied, with judgment for the defendants.

In the course of its decision, the court stated (pages 117-118):

"In summary, there is no evidence of any intent on the part of the defendants who had no direct and immediate connection with or control over interstate commerce, to burden interstate commerce. There was no evidence of any direct and immediate restraint upon interstate commerce resulting from the defendants' activities, from which an illegal intent can be inferred."

That is the way the case stood at the time the briefs and arguments were submitted in the instant case. Since that time, the Womens Sportswear case has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States and by that court, reversed. U. S. v. Womens Sportswear, 336 U. S., 460.

In its opinion, the Court, (pages 463-64) say, among other things:

"It seems clear that the intent and effect of the agreement is substantially to restrict competition and to control prices and markets. * * * The trial court appears to have dismissed the case chiefly on the ground that the accused Association and its members were not themselves engaged in interstate commerce. This may or may not be the nature of their operation considered alone, but it does not matter. Restraints, to be effective, do not have to be applied all along the line of movement of interstate commerce. The source of the restraint may be intrastate, as the making of a contract or combination usually is; the application of the restraint may be intrastate, as it often is; but neither matters if the necessary effect is to stifle or restrain commerce among the states. If it is interstate commerce that feels the pinch, it does not matter how local the operation which applies the squeeze."

If, as alleged in Paragraph 24 of the indictment, the conspiracy with which the defendants are here charged results in "reducing the volume of milk purchased by said consumers and other purchasers thus reducing the quantity of milk purchased by said distributors from producers in Kentucky, Indiana and Ohio," then there can be no question but what "it is interstate commerce that feels the pinch."

The indictment herein specifically states (Par. 27) that the defendants conspired to raise, fix and maintain prices; that (Par. 28) they agreed upon and fixed prices; that they agreed to uniform discounts and allowances to wholesale purchasers; that they adhered to the prices and discounts agreed upon; that (Par. 24) increases in prices have had the effect of reducing the quantity of milk purchased by defendants from producers in Indiana and Kentucky; and that (Par. 30) the conspiracy has had the effect of restraining trade and commerce in milk among the several states.

Price fixing is illegal per se. U. S. v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150. The fixing of prices as alleged in the indictment necessarily operates as a direct and substantial restraint on the interstate commerce herein involved and in the indictment referred to.

"Substantial economic effect on interstate commerce" does not mean the effect on a specific amount of interstate commerce. It does not run to the quantity that is involved, though in some given case that might be an added factor to be taken into consideration.

As claimed by the Government in argument, the interstate commerce involved may be ever so small. It is not the substantial quantity; it is the substantial effect on interstate commerce. The question is not how much money may be involved or how little the price to the purchaser may be affected.

As stated by the Court in the Filburn case (Page 127) "That appellee's own contribution to the demand for wheat may be trivial by itself is not enough to remove him from the scope of federal regulation where, as here, his contribution, taken together with that of many others similarly situated, is far from trivial. Labor Board v. Fainblatt, 306 U. S. 601, 606 et seq.; United States v. Darby, supra, at 123."

Basing its conclusion on the alllegations of the indictment presently before it, the Court is of the opinion and so finds that it does allege facts, even assuming, a "purely intrastate conspiracy" (as claimed by defendants) to show a "substantial economic effect" on interstate commerce and upon the ground, asserted by all of the defendants, that it does not, their respective motions to dismiss are each and all not well taken, and should be overruled.

The "Flow of Commerce" or "In Commerce" Doctrine

The Government contends that the sales by the defendants occur in the course of interstate commerce, saying:

"The flow of fluid milk from producers in Kentucky and Indiana through the defendants to consumers in the Cincinnati Area, described in the indictment, is a continuous day by day flow. Being a perishable commodity, fluid milk cannot be stored or warehoused until a ready purchaser happens along. Immediate sale is essential. It is obvious that the milk on hand must be sold and delivered each day by the distributors to make room for the milk going through the defendants' plants on the following day. Since 'commerce among the states is not a technical legal conception, but a practical one, drawn from the course of business' (Swift and Co. v. U. S. (1905) 196 U. S. 375, 398), it would seem that the mere description of the flow establishes its interstate nature until it has been delivered by the distributors to consumers in the Cincinnati area. The pertinent decisions of the Supreme Court fully support this view. Swift and Co. v. U. S. Supra. * * * The intention and expectation of a seller and a buyer that the commodity sold would be shipped in interstate commerce is a valid test in determining whether or not the sale is a transaction in interstate commerce, even though completed before the actual physical interstate transportation occurs. U. S. v. Reading Co., 226 U. S. 324, 367; Lemke v. Farmers Grain Co., 258 U. S. 50, 53, 54; Interstate Natural Gas Co. v. Federal Power Commission, 331 U. S. 682, Mandeville v. Crystal Sugar Co., 334 U. S. 219. * * * Sales of milk by producers in Kentucky and Indiana to the defendant distributors are made with the intention and expectation of both parties that the milk would be transported to Ohio and there immediately sold by the distributors. The price to be paid to the producers by the distributors depends upon the amount of that milk which is resold by the distributors to wholesale and retail customers in Ohio, and the price is not determined until after that resale. The resale in Ohio is as integral a part of the interstate commerce as is the sale by the Kentucky and Indiana producers to the distributors."

The Government asserts that the Interstate Commerce alleged in paragraphs 21, 22, 23 and 25 of the indictment, is the flow of interstate commerce which was originally intended to and does continue through the processing plants of the defendants and their distributors, to the stores and to the purchasers and consumers of milk and that such a price fixing conspiracy affecting the price of milk at wholesale and retail, as here alleged, is a conspiracy in connection with the flow of that commerce and is per se, a violation of the Sherman Act.

In the course of the oral argument, counsel for the Government stated "I am basing my appeal to this court to uphold this indictment under the commerce theory more on the cases that have been decided since the French-Bauer decision than anything else" and in this connection, counsel cited U. S. v. St. Louis Dairy Co., 77 Fed. Supp. 853, (decided May 14, 1948) and U. S. v. Happy Valley Farms, Inc., et al., (unreported) but decided by the District Court of the Eastern District of Tennessee on July 20, 1948. Later, counsel called attention to Standard Oil Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, — Fed. (2d) —, (C. C. A. 7, decided March 11, 1949.)

In its decision in the St. Louis Dairy case, the court states, (page 859):

"We are not unaware of the apparent conflict in our conclusion with that of the District Court for the Southern District of Ohio in United States v. French-Bauer, D. C. 48 F. Supp. 260. * * * The French-Bauer opinion apparently disagrees with the rule, as we understand it, that price-fixing is per se a violation of the Sherman Act."

In the Standard Oil case the court says:

"It is not disputed that the petitioner is engaged in commerce, but it is vigorously insisted that commerce ended at the River Rouge plant and the bulk plants in the Detroit area and that the petitioner's transactions from there on, were wholly intrastate. With this, we are unable to agree. The break that occurred at River Rouge was a break in transportation but not in the constant stream of commerce that flowed from the Whiting Refinery to the petitioner's customers in Michigan. * * * The modern concept of commerce is one which gives full sweep to the commerce clause of the Constitution within the limits of the implementing statute, a liberal view of the Congressional purpose as expressed in the statute, and a realistic view of what business is doing as it moves across State lines to accomplish its purpose. The late cases support the view that the petitioner's operations are in commerce from the refinery to its customers. Walling v. Jacksonville Paper Co., 317 U. S. 564; Binderup v. Pathe Exchange, 263 U. S. 291, 309; Mid-Continent Petroleum Corporation v. Keen, 157 Fed. 2d 310, 314; Republic Pictures Corporation v. Kappler, 151 F. 2d 543, 545; Walling v. American Stores Co., 133 Fed. 2d 840."

Defendants insists that the cases relied upon by the Government do not support its claim that sales to consumers in Hamilton County, Ohio, are interstate commerce and that the Government's "in commerce" argument "is not sustained by the decisions."

Counsel for defendants point out in some detail wherein, in their opinion, the cited cases are distinguishable from the instant case, saying:

> "The Government cites Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375. That decision is based on the fact that the cattle which were shipped in from various states to the Chicago stockyards had not come to rest in Chicago but were still in the stream of interstate commerce because there was an 'expectation' that the meat would continue on its interstate journey and would be sold in states other than the State of Illinois. The word 'expectation,' is the language of the Supreme Court in the opinion. The decision is based on the fact that it was expected that the cattle would continue on their interstate journey. * * * In the instant case the Government is not trying to 'reach back' to steps 'prior' to the transportation; instead it is trying to reach ahead to steps after the transportation. It is trying to reach a processed article at a time when there is no purpose of transporting the product in interstate commerce," and further that the recent (Standard Oil) case, for the reasons which they assign, is "not applicable."

The Court, however, agrees with the claim of the Government that today's practical concept of interstate commerce dictates that commodities in interstate commerce remain in that status until they reach the point where the parties originally intended that the movement should finally end. If, as contended by the Government, the distribution and sale of milk at wholesale and retail by the defendants is in interstate commerce, or is an integral part of the interstate flow from the farms of Kentucky and Indiana producers to consumers in Ohio, the point where the parties originally intended that the movement should end, then there can be no doubt but that the conspiracy of the defendants to fix prices at which such sales shall be made constitutes a violation of the Sherman Act.

The Government is correct in its contention that a "practical concept" of interstate commerce must and does lead to the conclusion that the distribution of milk in the Cincinnati area both from the standpoint of time and continuity is so closely and directly related to the interstate flow of milk and so much an inseparable part thereof as to bring this alleged conspiracy within the condemnation of the Sherman Act.

In view of all of the foregoing, the Court is of the opinion and so finds that both upon reason and under the decisions, the Government's "flow of commerce" or "in commerce" argument is sound and sustained. Under this "doctrine" also, therefore, the indictment is immune as against defendants' motions to dismiss.

Other Grounds Asserted by Defendants in Support of Their Motions To Dismiss

As heretofore stated in addition to their contention that "under the Sherman Act there must be a showing of a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce, where it is alleged that only an intrastate conspiracy existed" defendants set out other grounds on which they submit their motions to dismiss should be sustained.

In his brief (pages 2-3) Judge Gorman says:

> "Secondly, milk purchased by dealers or handlers from producers is regulated by the provisions of Order No. 65 promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture under the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937 (U. S. Code Title 7 Sec. 601 et seq.). This court is required to take judicial notice of that Order No. 65, which is attached to the motion to dismiss. Under that Order No. 65 the Secretary of Agriculture so regulates milk, exempting the price paid to producers from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust act, that an examination of the order will show that the statements in paragraph 24 of the indictment are palpably false and untrue. * * * In addition, the indictment fails in several other respects to state an offense. There are inconsistent averments which if given an ordinary construction rebut the inference that an offense was committed."

In this connection, defendants insist that the Court does not have jurisdiction to consider the charges made in the present indictment because of the Order of the Secretary of Agriculture, claiming that the action upon the part of the Secretary of Agriculture "cannot be impeached or infringed upon in these proceedings" and that any "challenge to the findings of the Secretary of Agriculture must be addressed to him."

Defendants contend that the Government is here asking "the court to intervene in a field which has already been pre-empted by the Secretary of Agriculture — a field reserved for him by Congressional Act."

As asserted by the Government, according to the foregoing claims of the defendants, the Order of the Secretary of Agriculture serves as a buffer which insulates the defendants from any possibility of violating the Sherman Act. This is not, and cannot be true.

It is true, as the Government points out, that the stated purpose of the Order is to "insure" an adequate supply of milk, but nothing contained in the indictment is inimical to, or runs against, or attempts to impeach or infringe upon this Order.

This Order affects and relates to prices paid to the producers, and has nothing to do with prices charged by distributors to wholesale and retail customers. These prices should be determined by competition and not by conspiracy.

The charge in the instant case is a conspiracy to fix prices, contrary to the Sherman Act. Nothing in the Order or the Act upon which the Order is based, authorizes or grants immunity from the Sherman Act for a conspiracy to fix prices of fluid milk sold at retail and wholesale in the Cincinnati area.

The Secretary of Agriculture has authority to determine and adjust minimum producer prices so as to promote and provide for an adequate supply of milk but he has no authority to take any action concerning a conspiracy to increase distributors' selling prices, with a resultant lessening of demand for fluid milk.

The Court has jurisdiction of this cause.

Finally, defendants claim that the indictment is wholly lacking in the clarity and particularity requisite to inform them of the nature of the charge made against them.

The indictment pleads the charge in sufficient detail to inform defendants that they are charged over a two-year period, which is the period referred to in the indictment, with having "engaged in a combination and conspiracy to raise, fix and maintain prices for the sale in the Cincinnati area of milk produced in the States of Kentucky, Indiana and Ohio, which combination and conspiracy in fact has been, and is now, in restraint of the herein before described trade and commerce."

In the (unreported) case of U. S. v. Happy Valley Farms, Inc., (herein above referred to) the indictment was couched in practically the same language as the one here under consideration.

In that case in response to the same contention as have asserted by defendants, the Court made the following statement:

> "Suffice to say, the indictment is adequate, both as to form and substance. It states adequately the venue of the crime charged, as being within the jurisdiction of this court. The crime is adequately alleged to have been a continuing conspiracy. The criminal participation of the defendants is sufficiently averred in the indictment. The elements of the crime are not only charged substantially in the language of the statute, but the means whereby the conspiracy is and has been formed and carried on and the details thereof adequate to identify the specific combination and conspiracy, and to enable the defendants to prepare for trial, and to protect them against a new prosecution in event of an acquittal are likewise all set forth with particularity and definiteness. 'Now, specifically, the indictment is not vague and indefinite; it is not duplicitous. As I say, it clearly charges a restraint of interstate trade and commerce, and an offense under the Sherman Act.'"

The foregoing statements are applicable in the instant case and the court adopts the language there used, as its decision on the question of lack of clarity and particularity in the indictment. The indictment under consideration is neither vague nor indefinite.

Upon consideration of the motions of the several defendants to dismiss the indictment, the Court is of the opinion and so finds that each of the motions is not well taken and that each and all of them should be, and they are each and all, overruled.

II

Motions for Bill of Particulars

Motions were filed on October 12, 1948, by and on behalf of each of the several defendants for Bill of Particulars. It is claimed by defendants that a Bill of Particulars should be granted to enable them to prepare for trial; to sustain a plea of former jeopardy, and in order that "the ends of justice and orderly procedure may best be served."

It is a well established rule that it is not the function of a bill of particulars to provide evidence, nor will such a bill be ordered where the information sought is within the knowledge of the defendants, or is information which they have equal opportunity with the Government, to discover.

It appears from the briefs and arguments in support of the respective motions for Bill of Particulars, that all of the defendants' requests are for data or information that fall within the foregoing rule.

Upon consideration of the motions for Bill of Particulars, together with the allegations of the indictment itself, the Court is of the opinion and so finds that defendants' motions for "Bill of Particulars" are each and all not well taken and that they should be and they are, each and all, overruled.

The Court has caused to be entered in this case appropriate Orders overruling the Motions to Dismiss and the Motions for Bill of Particulars with regard to each and all of the defendants respectively.

[¶ 62,452] United States v. Maryland & Virginia Milk Producers Association, Inc., et al.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. No. 10045. Argued April 18, 1949. Decided June 17, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combination of Milk Producers and Distributors—Indictment Sufficient—Price-Fixing Agreement.—An indictment charging an association of milk producers, its secretary-treasurer and seven milk distributor corporations with conspiracy to eliminate and suppress competition in the sale of milk was held to state a cause of action under Section 3 of the Sherman Act and an order dismissing the indictment was reversed. The Court ruled that the indictment which contained, among others, allegations that distributors had agreed to buy their full supplies from the association and that the price at which distributors bought and resold milk had been fixed by agreement, need not contain allegations as to the amount of interstate trade affected by the conspiracy or that prices were maintained at non-competitive levels.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1630.201.

For the appellant: Herbert A. Bergson, Assistant Attorney General and George Morris Fay, United States Attorney, of Washington, D. C.

For the appellees Maryland and Virginia Milk Producers Ass'n, Inc., and B. B. Derrick: William E. Leahy, of Washington, D. C., with whom Elwood H. Seal, William J. Hughes, Jr., of Washington, D. C., and Robert R. Smyers were on brief.

For the appellee Safeway Stores, Inc.: Arthur B. Hanson, of Washington, D. C., with whom Elisha Hanson, of Washington, D. C., was on brief.

For the appellee Chestnut Farms-Chevy Chase Dairy Company: Roger J. Whiteford, John J. Wilson, and Jo V. Morgan, Jr., all of Washington, D. C., were on the brief.

For the appellee Thompson's Dairy, Inc.: Samuel O. Clark, Jr., of Washington, D. C., was on the brief; Raymond Sparks and Wm. V. T. Justis, of Washington, D. C., entered appearances.

For the appellee Richfield Dairy Corporation: W. Gwynn Gardiner, of Washington, D. C., was on the brief: James M. Earnest, of Washington, D. C., and Edgar A. Wren entered appearances.

For the appellee Simpson Bros., Inc., t/a Wakefield Dairy: John F. Hillyard, of Washington, D. C., was on the brief.

For the appellee Alexandria Dairy: William Blum, Jr., of Washington, D. C., was on the brief.

For the appellee Harvey Dairy, Inc.: Ralph W. Powers, of Washington, D. C., was on the brief.

For the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation as amicus curiae: Marion R. Garstang and Harry J. Scharnikow were on the brief.

Before EDGERTON and WILBUR K. MILLER, JJ., and JAMES W. MORRIS, District Judge sitting by designation.

EDGERTON, J.: The government appeals from an order dismissing an indictment charging conspiracy to restrain trade in milk and milk products in the District of Columbia, and between the District and adjoining States, in violation of Sec. 3 of the Sherman Act, 26 Stat. 209, 15 U. S. C. § 3. The government first appealed directly to the Supreme Court, which remanded the case to this court pursuant to 34 Stat. 1246, as amended, 18 U. S. C. § 3731. United States v. Maryland & Virginia Milk Producers Ass'n, Inc., et al., 335 U. S. 802.

The paragraphs of the indictment indicated by the figures in parentheses make substantially the following statements. The appellees are an incorporated Association, the members of which are about 1,500 Maryland and Virginia milk producers who supply 80 per cent of the milk sold to distributors in the Washington metropolitan area (20); the Secretary-Treasurer of this Association (9); and seven corporations that distribute milk and its products to consumers and other purchasers in the District of Columbia. These distributors buy and resell 86 per cent of all milk supplied to the Washington metropolitan area (21). Appellees have conspired to eliminate and suppress competition in the sale of milk to these distributors, in its purchase by them, and in its resale by them to consumers and other purchasers (35). For those purposes (36, 37) appellees have done these things. Appellee distributors have contracted with appellee Association that they will buy no milk from producers or others who are not members of the Association, but will buy only from the Association, as far as it is able to supply their needs, which it agrees to do as far as it can (36 (a) (b)). Appellees have agreed to fix the prices at which the distributors will buy milk (36 (g)) and also the prices at which they will resell it (36 (m)). They have agreed on a classification of milk for price purposes according to use (36 (f) (g)). They have agreed that appellee distributors will remove from the market "excess" milk, i. e. any milk the Association has for sale in excess of the amount these distributors can resell at the prices agreed upon (36 (n) (o)). They have agreed that the Association will prevent and eliminate competition from distributors not parties to the conspiracy by inducing them not to cut prices, attempting to deprive price-cutters of adequate supplies of milk, interfering with the transportation of milk to them, furnishing milk to appellee distributors at reduced rates for use in taking away contract business from price-cutters, and driving them out of business (36 (p)). They have agreed that the Association will not supply milk, to any distributor not agreeing to buy his full supply from the Association, at prices as low as those charged to appellee distributors (36 (d)). The conspiracy has been successful: "the defendants by agreement and concerted action have done the things which, as hereinbefore alleged, they conspired to do." (37)

> "Price-fixing agreements are unlawful per se under the Sherman Act and . . . no showing of so-called competitive abuses or evils which those agreements were designed to eliminate or alleviate may be interposed as a defense. . . . If the so-called competitive abuses were to be appraised here, the reasonableness of prices would necessarily become an issue in every price-fixing case. In that event the Sherman Act would soon be emasculated; its philosophy would be supplanted by one which is wholly alien to a system of free competition . . . Any combination which tampers with price structures is engaged in an unlawful activity. Even though the members of the price-fixing group were in no position to control the market, to the extent that they raised, lowered, or stabilized prices they would be directly interfering with the free play of market forces. The Act places all such schemes belond the pale . . ."

Accordingly the government need not show or allege that prices have been "raised and maintained at 'high, arbitrary and non-competitive levels.'" United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150, 218, 221, 222. "Also it is unreasonable, per se, to foreclose competitors from any substantial market." International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392, 396. Therefore "full supply contracts", however legal they may be in other circumstances, cf. Pick Mfg. Co. v. General Motors Corp., 299 U. S. 3, are illegal when made for the purpose of eliminating and suppressing competition. Complete monopoly is of course unnecessary; "the amount of interstate trade . . . affected by the conspiracy is immaterial in determining whether a violation of the Sherman Act has been charged in the complaint." United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U. S. 218, 225.

Although the Capper-Volstead Act, 42 Stat. 388, 7 U. S. C. 291, and the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 730, 731, 15 U. S. C. 17, give some privileges to combinations of agricultural producers, a combination of producers and distributors to eliminate competition and fix prices at successive stages in the marketing of an agricultural product is not privileged. United States v. Borden Co., 308 U. S. 188; Allen Bradley Co. v. Local Union No. 3, 325 U. S. 797, 808. "Congress, as a part of its Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act, authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to issue orders regulating the handling of several agricultural products, including milk . . . As to milk, it sets up, § 8c (5), 7 U. S. C. § 608c (5), a rather complicated system of fixing prices to be paid to producers . . ." H. P. Hood & Sons v. Du Mond, 336 U. S. 525, 541. And the same Act, 50 Stat. 246, as amended, 7 U. S. C. 601 et seq., provides in § 608b (U. S. C. Supp. I) that with certain limitations "the Secretary of Agriculture shall have the power . . . to enter into marketing agreements with processors, producers, associations of producers, and others engaged in the handling of any agricultural commodity or product thereof" and "The making of any such agreement shall not be held to be in violation of any of the antitrust laws of the United States, and any such agreement shall be deemed to be lawful." But these provisions expressly involve orders of the Secretary of Agriculture and agreements to which he is a party. Since neither the fixing of prices according to use nor any other feature of the conspiracy charged in this indictment is covered by any such order or agreement, these statutory provisions are immaterial. United States v. Borden, supra, at 199-202.

In our opinion, therefore, the court erred in dismissing the indictment as not setting forth sufficient facts to constitute a conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit No. 192, October Term, 1948. Docket No. 21206. Argued March 14, 1949, Decided July 19, 1949.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Motion Picture Exhibition Business—Refusal to License First-Run Pictures—Treble Damage Suit Dismissed.—A suit for treble damages, brought by successive owners of an independent theatre alleging that they sustained operating losses because major distributors had refused to license first-run films to them, was dismissed and the dismissal affirmed on appeal when it was found that the troubles of the theatre were due more to its location, condition and quality of patronage than to any acts of the distributors. Maintaining exclusive outlets for the exhibition of their films and participating in a move-over arrangement for first-run films was held not in itself illegal unless a conspiracy to keep the independent operator out of the business of exhibiting first-run motion pictures was found by the jury to exist. But the jury did not so find, and the alternative they chose was properly offered to them in the court's charge.

Section 5 of the Clayton Act—Final Termination of Litigation—Previous Findings of Illegality Inadmissible.—Evidence to prove a conspiracy, consisting of findings and conclusions of a district court in a previous government action condemning the joint interests of the distributors, was held inadmissible as not a final judgment or decree as defined by Section 5 of the Clayton Act. Although basic findings of illegality made by the district court had been accepted by the United States Supreme Court, that Court had remanded the case for further relief, so that the litigation had not reached final termination as required by the statute.

[Syllabus]

Action by Fifth and Walnut, Incorporated and Albert J. Hoffman against Loew's Incorporated, Marcus Loew Booking Agency, Inc., RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., Paramount Pictures, Inc., Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, Warner Bros. Pictures Distributing Corporation, Columbia Pictures Corporation, United Artists Corporation, and United Artists Theatre Circuit, Inc., for damages and injunctive relief for violations of the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U. S. C. A. §§ 1, 2, 15, 26, injuring plaintiffs in their operation of the National Theatre in Louisville, Kentucky. From a verdict and judgment for the defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

[Grounds of Appeal]

CLARK, Circuit Judge: This appeal by plaintiffs from a defendants' verdict and judgment in a private action for damages and injunctive relief under the antitrust acts, 15 U. S. C. A. §§ 1, 2, 15, 26, comes to us on quite narrow issues of law. Plaintiffs claim two grounds for reversal: (1) the court's refusal of certain requests to charge, and certain language in the charge itself; and (2) the exclusion of certain of the adjudications in United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., D. C. S. D. N. Y., 70 F. Supp. 53, affirmed in part and reversed in part, 334 U. S. 131, which are alleged to be admissible under § 5 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 16. The basis of the action is the loss sustained by plaintiffs in the operation of the National Theatre in Louisville, Kentucky, by reason of the claimed conspiracy among defendants to refuse to this theatre the licensing of desirable moving picture films for show there. Jurisdiction was obtained in the Southern District of New York over the nine defendants now parties, and thereafter they moved for dismissal on the ground that Louisville was the more convenient place for trial. This motion was denied, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 76 F. Supp. 64, largely because of the delay in seeking the relief. There followed the lengthy jury trial whose unsuccessful outcome brings the plaintiffs here on appeal.

[Review of Facts]

The individual plaintiff, Albert J. Hoffman, and the corporate plaintiff, Fifth and Walnut, Incorporated, successively operated the National Theatre, in Louisville, from September 3, 1943, to December 9, 1943, and from December 10, 1943, to July 11, 1946, respectively. There were four regular first-run theatres [1] operating in that city during the period in suit: the Rialto, the Strand, the Loew's-United Artists, and the Mary Anderson. The Fourth Avenue Amusement Co. operated the Rialto and the Strand, which were the only first-run outlets in Louisville for feature films distributed by defendants RKO Radio Pictures, Inc.,

[1] "Runs are successive exhibitions of a feature in a given area, first-run being the first exhibition in that area, second-run being the next subsequent, and so on, and include successive exhibitions in different theatres, even though such theatres may be under a common ownership or management." United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 334 U. S. 131, 144, note 6.

Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, and Paramount Pictures, Inc. The Loew's-United Artists Theatre was operated by the Louisville Operating Co., a corporation indirectly controlled, in equal shares, by defendant Loew's Incorporated and defendant United Artists Theatre Circuit, Inc. This theatre exhibited practically all the first-run features released by Loew's Incorporated and by defendant Columbia Pictures Corporation, and the majority of the first-run features distributed by defendant United Artists Corporation. (There is no connection between the two defendants United Artists Theatre Circuit, Inc., and United Artists Corporation other than the similarity of name.) The People's Theatre Company operated the Mary Anderson Theatre. It was the exclusive first-run outlet for pictures distributed by defendant Warner Bros. Pictures Distributing Corporation. A fifth theatre, the Brown Theatre, served as a move-over first-run theatre [2] under a joint agreement of the Fourth Avenue Amusement Co., the Louisville Operating Co., Inc., and the Broadway and Fourth Avenue Realty Co., which last organization owned the theatre. The profits from its operation were divided equally among the parties to the agreement, which also provided that "the same admission price shall be charged for such films as the price charged * * * in the first run theatres of such parties at the times when such films shall be exhibited at the Brown Theatre."

[Argument on Appeal]

The evidence dealing with the move-over arrangement is the basis for plaintiff's exception to the charge and to the denial of certain requests to charge. This arrangement was alleged to be one of the constituent conspiracies involved in the general conspiracy between and among the named defendants, and the exhibitors, who were not so named, since they were not amenable to the process of the district court.

It is of the essence of plaintiffs' argument that "but for the fact that a Jury had to pass upon the question of damages," a directed verdict would have been required. This contention, which we must reject, is the basis for their objections to the charge and the refusals to charge. Obviously what the plaintiffs are doing is to confuse evidence of conspiracy, to be evaluated by the jury, with demonstrated proof, to be accepted as final by the court. It was not the move-over arrangement itself that was condemned in United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 334 U. S. 131, 159, 160, but rather the discriminatory fashion in which move-over privileges were accorded by distributors to "large affiliated and unaffiliated circuits" and not to "small independent exhibitors." Plaintiffs make no claim here that they were denied the opportunity to move what first-run pictures they did receive over to the Brown.

[Practices Held Legal Apart from Conspiracy]

Likewise, the joint operation of the Brown Theatre by one independent exhibitor and a subsidiary of one of the defendants (Loew's) was a type of activity which would not be unlawful unless a conspiracy to monopolize or restrain commerce by means of that activity was found by the jury to exist as to some of the defendants in the present action. The condemnation of joint interests in the decision in United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., D. C. S. D. N. Y., 70 F. Supp. 53, is not to be regarded as a declaration that joint ownership as such is illegal. It was made in a suit between the United States and various distributors and exhibitors on the basis of the particular facts of that case, and the presence of some of the defendants in the two actions did not relieve the plaintiffs in the present action from the necessity of satisfying the jury that a conspiracy existed. Of course, no one could reasonably contend that every joint ownership of a theatre, irrespective of all surrounding circumstances, is a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act; and no such decision has ever been made. Nor did the price-fixing clause in the agreement require any special attention from the judge in his charge or afford any basis for a recovery of damages in the present action. Not only was the testimony of the plaintiffs' manager Janecky that he fixed his own prices, but the only complaint was that plaintiffs were deprived of first-run pictures by a conspiracy against them among the defendants. We cannot see how price-fixing in this case between some of the defendants and the owner of the Brown Theatre if it involved any illegality—which may be doubted—affected the plaintiff's claim to damages for failure to obtain pictures.

Lastly, there was no inherent wrong in the uniform practice at the Brown Theatre of taking the picture that had earned the highest gross on its first run in Louisville and arranging standard terms (20 per cent of box-office receipts up to $3,250, and 50 per cent of receipts above that figure) with all distributors. Although the operating agreement required that no better terms be given any other distributor than were accorded to Loew's, it cannot be assumed that such an agreement would restrain competition among the distributors for the move-over facilities of the Brown. All of the pictures simultaneously on first-run exhibition in Louisville competed for the move-over privilege on the basis of their comparative box-office records.

[Charge to Jury by Trial Judge]

Plaintiffs stress the fact that use of the Brown Theatre, which had been standing vacant for some time before it was reopened under the move-over arrangement, decreased, pro tanto, the demand for first-run exhibition space, since by taking the more popular pictures from first-run theatres before their first-run potentialities had been exhausted, the move-over made possible more frequent changes in the first-run bills. But so to hold is not to condemn the arrangement as in restraint of competition. The district court correctly assessed the significance of the evidence with regard to the move-over when it said in the charge:

> "There has been considerable testimony in this case regarding:
> 'a) The move-over pictures to the Brown Theatre from Loew's and the Rialto theatres;
> 'b) The alleged uniform terms paid by the operator of the Brown move-over theatre to the various distributors;
> 'c) The licensing of a second run in Louisville to the Kentucky Theatre by most of these defendants; and
> 'd) The licensing of a third run to the Uptown Theatre by most of these defendants.'
> "This evidence was admitted solely to show the uniform conduct of the defendant distributors in licensing their pictures in Louisville, which the plaintiffs contend was another phase or part of the alleged combination and conspiracy of the defendants to monopolize and control the exhibition of pictures in the City of Louisville."

The court then went on to charge, in the language specifically objected to here by plaintiffs:

> "Each distributor had a right acting independently and not in concert, or pursuant to any combination or conspiracy in violation of the anti-trust laws, to license a move-over run to the operator of the Brown Theatre.
> "Illegality would only arise if you found from the evidence that the plan and method of operating the Brown Theatre as a move-over theatre, put into effect in 1936, was part of a plan or scheme among certain of the defendants and certain operators of first-run theatres in Louisville to monopolize the showing of first-run pictures or to restrain or control the business of exhibiting first-run pictures in Louisville."

Plaintiffs' objection to this portion of the charge is based on the notion that by participating in the move-over arrangement, to which only one of the defendants was a formal party, the distributor defendants all joined in a conspiracy in restraint of competition. But unless the move-over arrangement was intended, by itself or as part of a more inclusive plan, to keep plaintiffs out of the business of exhibiting first-run motion pictures, it was not in itself illegal and any or all the defendants were entitled to participate in it. This is not to say that the jury could not have found, particularly against the background of the motion picture industry as it is now known,[3] that the move-over arrangement was part of such a conspiracy. But the jury did not so find, and the alternative which they chose was properly offered to them in the court's charge.

Having correctly indicated the applicability of the evidence on the move-over, the district court was justified in rejecting plaintiffs' disputed requests to charge. Certain of these are erroneous; the others are superfluous in the light of the charge actually given. Thus of the six in issue, the first four are instinct with the notion that the move-over arrangement might offend against the antitrust laws without regard to its effect, actual or potential, on plaintiffs' theatre. This is shown by the first one, as follows:

"I charge you, as a matter of law, that if you find that Exhibits 87 and 87-A which are the agreements between Fourth Avenue Amusement Co., Broadway and Fourth Avenue Realty Co., and Louisville Operating Co., Inc. for the operation of the Brown Theatre and the renewal thereof restrain competition in first-run exhibition in Louisville, that this is direct evidence and not circumstantial evidence of an illegal conspiracy between the parties to it."

That "direct" is intended to have greater force than merely as a contrast to "circumstantial," to mean at least "convincing," if not "complete," is shown by the next charge to the effect that, if the distributor defendants participated in the move-over arrangement and it constituted a restraint of competition in first-run exhibition in Louisville, then "this is direct evidence and not circumstantial evidence of an illegal conspiracy and if you should find such illegal conspiracy to have been put into effect you are to return a verdict for the plaintiffs and against all of the defendants who participated therein." And the next two requests have the same vice of seeming to foreclose jury consideration, and to direct the verdict, as to the most important and decisive issue in the case.

If, however, less was contemplated by the writer of these charges, and they were designed only to state the rather obvious proposition that, if the agreement was an unlawful restraint of competition, then it was evidence from which an inference of an illegal conspiracy could have been drawn against those having knowledge and participating—as appears to be the intent of the remaining two in dispute—then the matter was amply covered in the charge. Thus the following adequate and succinct statement to the jury puts the matter better than these not overclear requests:[4]

"If you find that the defendant distributors each had its first-run customer in Louisville and made no effort to license its pictures on a first-run to any other theatre in Louisville, and if you find that the operators of the Rialto, Loew's-United Artists, Mary Anderson, Strand and Brown theatres in Louisville each had a fixed source of supply of first-run pictures from certain of the defendant distributors and did not seek to license the pictures of any other distributor on a first-run, then from such circumstances you may infer that this arrangement was the result of an unlawful conspiracy to monopolize the exhibition of first-run pictures and restrain trade or commerce in the exhibition of first-run pictures in the City of Louisville, to the exclusion of the plaintiffs from the exhibition of first-run pictures in Louisville."

[Section 5 of the Clayton Act]

The second ground on which plaintiffs appeal raises an important and interesting question of law. Section 5 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 16, provides:

"A final judgment or decree rendered in any criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto: Provided, This section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken."

Under the provisions of this section, plaintiffs made an offer of proof consisting of certain of the Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law of the Expediting District Court in United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., D. C. S. D. N. Y., 70 F. Supp. 53,[5] and of the opinion and mandate of the United States Supreme Court, 334 U. S. 131, affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding the proceedings to the Expediting Court. The court, however, ruled the evidence inadmissible, as not a final judgment or decree within the statutory meaning.

[Litigation Must Be Terminated]

There is of course no question that the cases have not even yet reached their final termination. Upon remand, certain of the defendants entered into consent decrees with the government; as to the others, lengthy hearings and deliberations are being had.[6]

[4] The last request here in issue—No. 47—is particularly unclear and seems to suggest again that the Brown Theatre move-over arrangement must be found inherently illegal.

[5] For a full record of the case, reference should also have been made to the extensive opinion for the Expediting Court, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 66 F. Supp. 323.

[6] Thus see McDonough and Winslow, supra note 3, at 401, 404-408.

The strongest position of the plaintiffs is that the Supreme Court has accepted the basic findings of illegality and has sent the cases back for more complete relief; in short that the error found was of the nature to make the final result more favorable than otherwise to the plaintiffs' position. Several questions are suggested by the issue thus framed, such as whether the material is in reality relevant to the local controversy here presented (i.e., whether the estoppel between the parties which determines the prima facie character of the evidence has a legal bearing on the Louisville situation) or, if any of the proceedings are admissible, how much and what portion of them are to be set before the jury. We do not consider these, however, since upon as careful consideration as we can make we find ourselves in agreement with the trial judge that the government suit has not reached the stage where it can properly be considered within the statutory terms. We think this answer is indicated upon both legal and practical grounds.

While the issue has not been finally and authoritatively determined, yet both the statutory wording and the existing precedents require a definite terminus of the litigation. Thus the statute explicitly requires "a final judgment or decree" and does not refer, for example, to a final decision—a point of contrast made recently in the Supreme Court with respect to appealable orders. Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., June 20, 1949, 69 S. Ct. —.[7] It must obviously be so far final that the rules of estoppel by judgment apply. Restatement, Judgments, § 41 and comments a, d, and e, § 68 and comment s, 1942. And since a second sentence of the statute provides that when such a proceeding is instituted by the United States the running of the statute of limitations on private rights of action based on any matter therein complained of "shall be suspended during the pendency thereof," it would seemingly follow that the suit should no longer be "pending." Acting on these principles and in the light of the statutory history Judge Nordbye ruled in a persuasive opinion that a decree in a case on appeal is not admissible, Twin Ports Oil Co. v. Pure Oil Co., D. C. Minn., 26 F. Supp. 366. He has made a similar ruling as to this very Paramount case after the original opinion below, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 66 F. Supp. 323, had been filed. Duluth Theatre Corp. v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., D. C. Minn., 72 F. Supp. 625. See also Dickinson v. Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp., D. C. W. D. Mo., No. 4728, March 7, 1949; Barnsdall Refining Corp. v. Birnamwood Oil Co., D. C. E. D. Wis., 32 F. Supp. 308. And we have held, in a fairly analogous case, that a decision of the Federal Trade Commission which had not become automatically the judgment of the Court of Appeals was not admissible. Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co. v. American Bowling & Billiard Corp., 2 Cir., 150 F. 2d 69,[8] certiorari denied 326 U. S. 757, citing Proper v. John Bene & Sons, D. C. E. D. N. Y., 295 F. 729. While the statute is broadly remedial, yet it is obviously drastic in its consequences. It cannot too fairly be applied to cases where the action of the court may still remain in doubt. Amended F. R. 54(b), F. R. C. P., now emphasizes the tentative nature of district court rulings which are subject to revision up to their final determination. Here we have not yet even a tenative ruling after the remand.

The practicalities of the situation also point the same way. The problem will of course appear in acute form only in jury cases. In non-jury cases—and even in jury cases so far as the law is concerned—the decisions of the Supreme Court, whether or not affirming final judgments, will be controlling precedents, even though practically it may not be easy to separate law and fact. At any rate, sophisticated lawyers and judges will understand what the status of the government case is. But it will certainly not be easy to explain that (as in all fairness would be necessary, were the evidence to be admitted) to a jury of laymen. Thus, it may be substantially true that the government was more successful than its opponents in the appeal to the Supreme Court, and yet the question of how much

[7] Stressing the language of 28 U. S. C. A. § 1291, allowing appeals "from all final decisions of the district courts," Mr. Justice Jackson says: "It is obvious that, if Congress had allowed appeals only from those final judgments which terminate an action, this order would not be appealable." 69 S. Ct. at page —.

[8] Thinking that the amended Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 45(g), applied to make the Commission order effective without the entry of an enforcing decree of the Court of Appeals, a majority of the court first ruled the evidence admissible, 150 F. 2d at page 72; but when it was shown that this statute did not affect the Commission's orders in enforcing the antitrust acts, all the court agreed in the exclusion of the evidence. 150 F. 2d at page 74.

and to what extent still remains. For example, the Supreme Court struck out the District Court's requirement that films be licensed on a competitive bidding basis, although it said, "The competitive bidding system was perhaps the central arch of the decree designed by the District Court." 334 U. S. at page 166. And since the elimination of this feature might affect the cases in ways other than those expressly mentioned, it declined to limit the freedom of the District Court on remand to reconsider the adequacy of the decree to only those parts it had specifically indicated. Under the circumstances the wisdom of limiting admissibility to a final and definitely settled decree seems clear. While it may be that some cases might arise in which the action of an appellate court had gone so far as clearly to dispose of practically all the issues involved in a suit by the United States against defendants who are later being sued by a private party, and that in such an extreme situation the decree and findings in the latter suit would be admissible, the issues here left open by the Supreme Court seem to us so complex and vague that the District Court was justified in not allowing in evidence the decree or findings sought to be introduced by the plaintiffs.

[Conduct and Result of Trial Upheld]

We conclude that the trial was fair and the result, while not a necessary one, was nevertheless quite within the evidence. The plaintiffs offered evidence justifying inferences of joint action among the defendants, but the defendants offered vigorous controverting evidence as well as testimony to indicate that the troubles of plaintiffs' theatre were due more to its location, condition and quality of patronage than to their acts. The plaintiffs had chosen to submit their case to a distant tribunal where jurors could be as little influenced by matters of local prejudice as would be possible anywhere. Having so chosen and received a full and proper trial, they must abide by the result.

In the United States District Court for the District of Delaware. Civil Action No. 891. June 10, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Treble Damage Action Transferred—Physical Location of Theatre Considered—Location of Head Office Not a Controlling Factor.—A treble damage suit brought by an independent exhibitor of motion pictures against major film producer-distributors was transferred to a Colorado forum where the business of both parties was actually carried on. An important part of the case, that of assessing the theatre's size, equipment and location, could best be carried out if the trial were held in Colorado. Although the film companies' head offices were not in Colorado oral testimony would be taken from company employees staffed near the particular theatre involved.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.291.

For the plaintiff: John Van Brunt (Killoran & Van Brunt) of Wilmington, Delaware, and Thurman Arnold and L. A. Nikoloric (Arnold, Fortas & Porter) of Washington, D. C.

For the defendants Loew's, Inc. and RKO Pictures, Inc.: Richard F. Corroon (Southerland, Berl & Potter) of Wilmington, Delaware, and Richard P. Heppner, Roy W. McDonald and C. Stanley Thompson (Donovan, Leisure, Newton, Lumbard & Irvine) of New York City.

For the defendant Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp.: Daniel O. Hastings and Ayres J. Stockly (Hastings, Stockly, Walz & Wise) of Wilmington, Delaware.

[Nature of the Action]

RODNEY, District Judge: The nature of this suit was indicated in a previous opinion upon objections to interrogatories. See Cinema Amusements v. Loew's, Inc., et al., D. C. Del., 1947, 7 F. R. D. 318. Subsequent thereto both parties have made certain motions. Plaintiff has moved under Rule 15(d), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A., for leave to serve and file a supplemental complaint. Defendants have moved under Rule 30(b) to vacate or modify a notice of the taking of certain depositions made by plaintiff.

Subsequent to the above motions but prior to their disposition by the court, the defendants moved pursuant to 28 U. S. C. A. Sec. 1404(a) to transfer this action to the United States District Court for the District of Colorado. Disposition of the previous motions mentioned above has been withheld because if the defendants' motion to transfer were granted it would seem preferable that such motions be determined by the court trying the case. The disposition herein of the motion to transfer therefore renders unnecessary any further consideration by this court of the previous motions.

Plaintiff, suing civilly for treble damages under the Sherman Anti-trust Act and the Clayton Act, is an independent exhibitor of motion pictures in Denver, Colorado, operating in particular in that city the Broadway Theatre. Plaintiff substantially alleges that defendants, along with other major producer-distributors, have unlawfully conspired and combined to monopolize the exhibition of all desirable feature motion pictures in the United States by acquiring ownership or control of the vast majority of first and subsequent run theatres in the major cities of the United States and giving lower film rentals and priority of "runs" and exhibitions to such theatres and by using their power over copyrights to force independents to transfer control or profits of their theatres to the major producers. Plaintiff complains more particularly of the alleged conspiracy as it affects plaintiff in the operation of its Broadway Theatre in Denver, Colorado.

A jury trial has been demanded by plaintiff in accordance with the Rules. The action is at issue and counsel for both sides are apparently ready for early trial except for additional preparation which might be required by the disposition of the motion to serve and file the supplemental complaint and the motion to vacate or modify the taking of depositions.

The Supreme Court of the United States has determined, in United States v. National City Lines, 1949, — U. S. —, 17 U. S. L. W. 4459, that a civil action under the anti-trust laws, such as the instant action, may be transferred by the United States District Courts pursuant to 28 U. S. C. A. Sec. 1404(a) upon a finding by such courts that the conditions of said section have been met. See also United States v. E. I. duPont de Nemours and Co., D. C. D. C., 1949, 83 F. Supp. 233; Note, 58 Yale L. J. 482 (1949).

Section 1404(a) provides that "For the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice, a district court may transfer any civil action to any other district or division where it might have been brought." 28 U. S. C. A. Sec. 1404(a).

Plaintiff does not dispute that the instant action could have been brought in the District of Colorado. Nor is it disputed by defendants that venue may be properly laid in the instant action here in the District of Delaware.

The venue section of the anti-trust laws provides that suit thereunder against a corporation "may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business." 15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 22. Two of the corporate defendants are organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware and are found and transacting business in the State of Delaware. The other corporate defendant is organized and existing under the laws of the State of New York but is found and transacts business in the State of Delaware. All three of the corporate defendants transact business and may be found in the State of Colorado. Plaintiff is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Colorado.

If transfer is otherwise authorized and warranted, therefore, it is clear that the District of Colorado is a proper district to which this action may be transferred under Section 1404(a).

Plaintiff urges first that transfer may not be had where the corporate defendants are domiciled in the state of the forum or where plaintiff sues in a forum which satisfies all three alternative requirements of the venue section of the anti-trust laws[1] as to a majority of the defendants. Plaintiff's contention is predicated upon the assumption that Section 1404(a) is merely a codification of the doctrine of forum non conveniens, under which doctrine plaintiff urges its contentions are correct.

It is true that the criteria in Section 1404(a) justifying transfer are substantially identical with those which justify dismissal under the doctrine of forum non conveniens. Section 1404(a) authorizes transfer "for the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice;" forum non conveniens required dismissal when the convenience of the parties and the ends of justice necessitated such action.[2] The Reviser's Notes to Section 1404(a) state that it was "drafted in accordance with the doctrine of forum non conveniens, permitting transfer to a more convenient forum, even though the venue is proper." And it has been judicially stated that consideration of a motion under Section 1404(a) by the district court would be had in the light of the rules for the application of the doctrine of forum non conveniens as laid down by the United States Supreme Court. See Schoen v. Mountain Producers Corp., 3 Cir., 170 F. 2d 707, 715, cert. denied, 336 U. S. 937.

While the substantial factors to be weighed in determining a motion under Section 1404(a) may be similar to those involved in a consideration of forum non conveniens, yet it seems clear that transfer under Section 1404(a) is something more than and somewhat different from dismissal under forum non conveniens. In the first place, the procedure to be followed in affirmatively invoking the two remedies is drastically different. Under Section 1404(a) a case is not dismissed but merely transferred to the more convenient forum; under forum non conveniens a case is dismissed and must be instituted anew in the more convenient forum, carrying with it the inherent and jeopardous hazard of being barred therein by the statute of limitations. The danger of having the action barred in such a manner was one of the principal reasons for Mr. Justice Black's dissent in Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 1947, 330 U. S. 501, 516.

The doctrine of forum non conveniens has been held inapplicable to cases instituted under "special venue" statutes, such as actions arising under the Federal Employers' Liability Act and the anti-trust laws.[3] Such types of cases may be transferred under Section 1404(a), however. Ex parte Collett, 1949, — U. S. —, 17 U. S. L. W. 4453; United States v. National City Lines, 1949, — U. S. —, 17 U. S. L. W. 4459. In this respect, then, the two remedies are also different.

Forum non conveniens still exists independently from Section 1404(a), at least in connection with those cases instituted in federal courts when the more convenient forum is in a foreign jurisdiction. DeSairigne v. Gould, S. D. N. Y., 1949, — F. Supp. —, 17 U. S. L. W. 2435. The court in the cited case observed that if forum non conveniens were limited by virtue of being codified into Section 1404(a) the federal courts would be stripped of their inherent power to refuse jurisdiction in such cases. See Canada Maltin Co., Ltd. v. Paterson Steamships, Ltd., 1932, 285 U. S. 413, 422-23. In this respect, therefore, the two remedies are also independent of each other.

Even if Section 1404(a) were nothing more than a codification of forum non conveniens, this (Third) Circuit has held that transfer under Section 1404(a) may be had where a majority of the defendant corporations are domiciled in the forum. Schoen v. Mountain Producers Corp., 3 Cir., 1948, 170 F. 2d 707, 714, cert. denied, 336 U. S. 937.[4] Indeed, following the Schoen decision this court has ordered transfer under Section 1404(a) in a case where the defendant corporation was domiciled in Delaware. Makela v. The Wilson Transit Co., C. A. 1151, Feb. 17, 1949 (opinion unreported).

Plaintiff relies principally upon Tivoli Realty, Inc. v. Interstate Circuit, Inc. et al., 5 Cir., 1948, 167 F. 2d 155, cert. denied 334 U. S. 837, for its other contention that forum non conveniens cannot be invoked when a majority of the defendants satisfy all three requirements of the "special venue" statute of the anti-trust laws, i. e., when a majority of the defendants are inhabitants of the forum, are found in the forum, and trans-

[2] Koster v. Lumbermen's Mutual Co., 1947, 330 U. S. 518, 527. This has been the test from the earliest application of the doctrine, as is pointed out in an excellent treatment of the doctrine in Note, 34 Va. L. Rev. 811 (1948).

[3] B. & O. R. Co. v. Kepner, 1941, 314 U. S. 44 (Fed. Em. Lia. Act); U. S. v. Nat. City Lines, 1948, 334 U. S. 573 (anti-trust laws).

[4] The United States Supreme Court, in Koster v. Lumbermen's Mutual Co., 1947, 330 U. S. 518, 527-528, stated:

"Under modern conditions corporations often obtain their charters from states where they no more than maintain an agent to comply with local requirements, while every other activity is conducted far from the chartering state. Place of corporate domicile in such circumstances might be entitled to little consideration under the doctrine of forum non conveniens, which resists formalization and looks to the realities that make for doing justice."

This would indicate that domicile of defendant is not conclusive in application of forum non conveniens.

act business in the forum. I am of the opinion that the cited case does not entirely support this contention. In the first place in the cited case the doctrine of forum non conveniens was not urged upon the court of the forum but rather upon the court of another forum in support of an application there for an injunction restraining plaintiff in the original suit in the first forum from taking any further action in such suit. The attempt to invoke forum non conveniens for such purpose was denied in view of another well-recognized doctrine under which federal district courts are not inclined to interfere by injunction with prior suits in other federal districts where the inequity is based solely upon inconvenience. For this reason, the court in the cited case held "as a matter of comity" that no injunction should issue against the plaintiff in a suit in another forum.

It would seem that the court in the cited case went further, however, and held that forum non conveniens was inapplicable in any event because there were not two federal forums in which the entire group of defendants was answerable to process and because venue was laid under a "special venue" statute. In the instant case, as pointed out above, there are at least two federal forums in which all three defendants are answerable to process, and the recent National City Lines decision by the Supreme Court removes "special venue" as an objection to transfer. So even if Section 1404(a) were merely a codification of forum non conveniens, the Tivoli case would not appear to be controlling,[5] and the other cases cited by plaintiff in this connection go no further.

There thus appears to be no objection in law to transfer in the instant case under Section 1404(a), and it remains to be determined only whether the facts before the court in the supporting and opposing affidavits and in the statements of counsel justify transfer within the standards set forth in said section.

Convenience of Parties

Plaintiff is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Colorado with principal offices in Denver and apparently no offices in Delaware. The theatres which plaintiff owns and/or operates are located in the Denver area in Colorado, and the particular theatre involved in this case is the Broadway, which is located in "downtown Denver." Obviously the books, records and documents belonging to plaintiff would be located in Denver or its proximity.

Defendants R. K. O. and Loew's, Inc. are corporations organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware with their principal offices outside such State, apparently in New York City. Defendant Fox is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of New York with principal offices apparently in New York City. All three defendants, doing business on a nationwide scale, maintain branch offices in Denver for the transaction of business in that area, and their records and documents concerning such transactions are virtually all located in Denver, as are, of course, their employees who transact such business.

Plaintiff points out that the "home" or "central" office of each of the defendants is in New York City, that the principal officer of each defendant in this case—the general sales manager—is located at such "home" or "central" office, that negotiations and contracts for the exhibition of films become binding only upon the approval of the principal officer at the "home" or "central" office, and that the employees of each of the defendants located in the Denver branch offices act merely as forwarding agents with respect to such negotiations and contracts and are charged only with routine administrative duties. From those facts, plaintiff contends that the really important representatives of the defendants in this case are the general sales managers located in New York City, which of course is much nearer

[5] The court in the Tivoli decision, 167 F. 2d 155, 157, does state that prima facie it is not oppressive or vexatious under forum non conveniens to sue a corporation within the judicial district that meets not only one but all three of the venue requirements of the "special venue" statute of the anti-trust laws. This dictum raises only a prima facie case in favor of plaintiff, and defendants contend that even if the statement has any materiality it does not hurt them because they naturally would have a prima facie burden to overcome if venue can be properly laid in this district, as they admit it can.

In the instant case, all three of the defendants may be found in and transact business in both Colorado and Delaware, so two of the "special venue" requirements are satisfied in both States. The mere fact of incorporation in Delaware is not in itself necessarily persuasive, as indicated by the Supreme Court in Koster v. Lumbermen's Mutual Co., supra, footnote 4.

Wilmington than Denver, and that such representatives would of necessity be the ones to speak on behalf of the defendants in this case.

Defendants agree that certain of their "top officials" are located in New York City and that technically a license application by an exhibitor for a motion picture film normally does not become a binding contract until it is approved in the Home Office. Defendants state that the Home Office officials, however, merely establish broad sales policies and that in their specific decisions they must and do rely upon the knowledge and recommendations of the employees in the field. Defendants state that approval by the Home Office of a license application rests upon and is guided and governed by the knowledge, advice and recommendation of the employees staffed near the particular theatre involved and who carry on the normal day-to-day selling and negotiating in the various localities. Defendants also state that Denver falls with their Pacific Division and it is probable that certain of their managing officials from such Division will be called.

Defendants point out that to date all discovery proceedings, which have been extensive, have taken place in Denver, have involved records and persons, including their employees, located in Denver or its close proximity, and have in at least six instances involved the United States District Court in Denver. They contend that burdening the parties with applications and appearances before two different courts results in inconvenience to both parties.

Plaintiff states that most of its evidence will be in documentary form based upon records and books which are located in Denver but which have been photostated, and the photostats are in Washington in the possession of plaintiff's counsel. Because of the documentary nature of plaintiff's case, plaintiff states that it will not need information from the general sales managers of the defendants and thus explains its failure to examine any of them in discovery proceedings. Plaintiff also points out that transfer will inconvenience it by requiring transportation of all the photostats from Washington to Denver.

Defendants urge that the importance plaintiff places upon the location of the defendants' general sales managers is destroyed by plaintiff's actual failure to examine the managers in discovery proceedings. Defendants, of course, argue that pre-trial discovery proceedings involving the managers has been unnecessary because they only acted upon the advice and recommendation of field employees in Denver and are relatively unimportant and should be so considered upon this motion.

Plaintiff, on the other hand, argues that the field employees cannot be important because defendants have examined them in only a cursory way upon pre-trial discovery proceedings. In answer to this, defendants indicate that such employees will be called in person at trial and thus extensive pre-trial procedure to obtain evidentiary matter was unnecessary as to such employees.

Of the three important representatives of plaintiff who will apparently testify at trial, two live or reside closer to Wilmington than to Denver and the third resides in Denver. There is some contradiction in the affidavits as to whether one of the first two lives or resides closer to Wilmington, but plaintiff should be in a better position to know the facts and its affidavit is accepted. The difference in distance as between Denver or Wilmington from the residence of either, however, is not great.

Defendants have estimated that trial in Wilmington will burden them with an expense of between $9,000.00 and $11,000.00 in bringing witnesses here for trial and maintaining them until they are no longer needed at trial. Defendants also point out that their pertinent records located in Denver will have to be transported here if transfer is not granted as requested.[6] It is, of course, common knowledge that anti-trust litigation involves voluminous records and documents, especially for defendants. See, e. g., United States v. E. I. duPont deNeMours & Co., D. C. D. C., 1949, 83 F. Supp. 233.

The foregoing indicates that insofar as convenience of parties is concerned, transfer

[6] The expense of defending anti-trust suits, even in forums convenient to defendants, can well be appreciated. The Government, in fact, has found such expense to be a weapon in its hands which can be used with telling effect. "Indeed, it has been the unvarying experience of the Antitrust Division that a pending prosecution has the same effect in breaking up restraints of trade as a conviction—that even the acquittal makes the defendants draw a breath of relief and resolve never to undergo such an expensive hazard again." Arnold, The Bottlenecks of Business, (1st ed. 1940) p. 210; see Comment, 49 Yale L. J. 284, 290 (1939).

should be ordered. Denver is clearly more convenient for defendants, and no evidence indicates that plaintiff has as much connection with Wilmington as even the defendants have. The proximity of plaintiff's counsel to Wilmington would appear to be plaintiff's only real tie to Wilmington insofar as convenience is concerned.

Convenience of Witnesses

The convenience of the two respective forums to witnesses at trial necessarily is somewhat speculative at the present time, since the court is not possessed of definite information as to the precise witnesses to be called. Certain matters in this connection do seem relatively definite, however.

Of twenty-four depositions taken in this action to date, all of which have been taken in Denver, twenty-two of the deponents are residents of Denver or its surrounding area, one is a resident of Indianapolis, Indiana, and the other is a resident of San Francisco, California. If these witnesses are to testify in person, and defendants maintain that the presence of at least some of them at trial will be essential, then clearly the overwhelming majority will be greatly convenienced by trial in Denver.

It cannot be assumed that all of the depositions were taken with a view to subsequent introduction into evidence at trial. Defendants state that much of the matter elicited through the depositions was relevant for discovery purposes but not as evidential matter to be introduced at trial. Plaintiff states that its depositions were taken upon the assumption that they were to be used at trial, but it appears that many of defendants' objections of irrelevancy to questions posed by plaintiff in the depositions were met with the reply that such questions were relevant for discovery purposes.

The six new depositions which plaintiff desires to take all involve deponents who live in Denver, and the above observations seem equally applicable to them.

The defendants state that they may call the managers of their Pacific Coast Divisions as witnesses, and these persons live on the West Coast.

The only witnesses which the record indicates that the defendants might call from the East are the sales managers in the respective Home Offices in New York City, but the defendants, who are naturally in a position to know the manner of presenting their defense, have deposed that the testimony of such persons, even if used, would be largely formal as to their administrative duties. And it is stated in the affidavit that defendants have not yet decided to use these persons as trial witnesses.

Plaintiff, on the other hand, states that it will call one witness who lives in Florida, one who lives in Indianapolis, Indiana, which is only some 150 miles closer to Wilmington than to Denver, and one who lives in Denver. Plaintiff also states that it has chosen certain other persons who live near Wilmington to testify and that such persons have been chosen especially with trial in Wilmington in mind. The number or names of these latter witnesses are not given, but it is said that if the action is transferred as requested plaintiff will either have to provide transportation for these witnesses to Denver, take their depositions, or find new witnesses near Denver to testify in their stead.

The inconvenience which would be caused these few witnesses for plaintiff by trial in Denver does not appear to offset appreciably the great inconvenience which would be caused other and apparently more numerous witnesses, including some of plaintiff's, by trial in Wilmington. The record indicates that a great number of witnesses who live in the Denver area will testify at trial, and the two or three-day trip by train to Wilmington if trial is had here will be a distinct inconvenience to them which could be eliminated by trial in Denver.

It clearly appears that convenience of trial witnesses would be greatly served by transfer of the case to Denver.

Interest of Justice

Manifestly the most important criterion in determining the advisability of transfer is the "interest of justice." In most cases, if the convenience of the parties and witnesses will be served by transfer it usually follows that justice will also be served by transfer.[7] This does not necessarily follow, however, and irrespective of the convenience

[7] While the statute (1404(a)) in language provides, "For the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice," a case may be transferred, yet it has been considered that the "interest of justice" is a reason not only separate and distinct from the convenience of parties and witnesses but a necessary resultant factor from such conveniences. See Schoen v. Mountain Producers Corp., 3 Cir., 1948, 170 F. 2d 707, 714; Reviser's Notes to Sec. 1404(a).

to parties and witnesses, I am of the opinion that whether or not transfer will be ordered should be governed in large measure by the effect of transfer upon the "interest of justice."

Plaintiff has argued that because it is given a wide remedial choice of venue by Congress, its selection of venue, if within the broad limits granted by Congress, is conducive to the interest of justice and should not be disturbed unless there is a showing that plaintiff has abused its choice.

With reference to this contention, the nisi prius court in United States v. National City Lines,[8] stated that,

> "The legislative history of the revision of the Judicial Code shows that the intent of Congress was to overcome the absolute choice in cases of this character."

The purpose of the wide choice of venue given to plaintiffs in anti-trust litigation was certainly to further the interest of justice by enabling plaintiffs to obtain redress in forums in which they can afford to sue, usually that of their own residence.

The requirement in Section 1404(a) that transfer be in the "interest of justice" provides a check against possible abuse of venue without disturbing the purpose behind the wide choice of venue given by Congress to anti-trust plaintiffs. Manifestly, no court would ever find transfer to a forum which is financially out of reach of an impecunious plaintiff to be in the "interest of justice." See Note, 58 Yale L. J. 482, 489-490.

In the instant case plaintiff has not taken advantage of the wide choice of venue given to it by Congress and brought suit in the forum of its own residence and at the locale of the alleged injuries, as it could have done, but instead has sought redress in a forum a long distance therefrom.

A review of all the facts and circumstances in this action convinces me that transfer of the action to Denver would be greatly in furtherance of the "interest of justice."

It should first be observed that the cause of action asserted by plaintiff is of a federal nature and is not dependent upon any particular or peculiar local state law. No question of applying the Erie doctrine and no peculiar local law with which this court might be assumed to be intimately familiar appears to be involved in the action.

The controversy here involves a particular locality and area. It is true that a nation-wide conspiracy among defendants is alleged by plaintiff, but in order to recover plaintiff must also prove injury to itself as a result of action of defendants pursuant to the nation-wide conspiracy. See Tivoli Realty v. Paramount Pictures, D. C. Del., 1948, 80 F. Supp. 800, 805-806. On this latter phase of the case, which is the real issue in the action, the peculiar geographic and economic conditions in the city of Denver, especially with respect to the theatre situation, are extremely important.

The business and property of plaintiff which must be injured, and against which it must be shown defendants have conspired, before plaintiff can recover in this suit is located in "downtown Denver." Plaintiff contends that its Broadway theatre is comparable or superior in equipment, appointments, convenience and desirability to the largest and best first-run theatres in the Denver area and thus is entitled to first-run and similar privileges. Defendants contend to the contrary and assert that the denial of such privileges is reasonable from a business viewpoint and is not the result of any conspiracy among defendants. Manifestly an important phase of the case will be the relative suitability and desirability of the various theatres in the Denver area, and this in turn will depend upon the respective attractiveness, equipment, accessability, size, location and other similar qualities of such various theatres.

Trial in this action in Denver, with the jury composed of persons residing in the Denver area, will obviously serve the administration of justice. A view of the various premises involved may well be appropriate, and only with trial in Denver can such a view be had.

On the other hand, if trial is had in Wilmington, the necessary artificiality of the evidence in connection with the comparable superiority of the various theatres would almost make a mockery of the jury system and the purpose behind it.

"Jury duty is a burden that ought not to be imposed upon the people of a community which has no relation to the litigation. In cases which touch the affairs of many persons, there is reason for holding the trial in their view and reach rather than in remote parts of the county where they can learn of it by report only. There is a local interest in having localized controversies decided at home." Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 1947, 330 U. S. 501, 508-509.

The convenience of the parties and witnesses, and the interest of justice, will be greatly served by transfer of the case as requested. Defendants have asked for transfer from a forum distant from plaintiff's residence and the locale of the alleged injuries to a forum which is the plaintiff's residence and includes the locale of the alleged injuries. Indeed, it would seem that defendants have sought to give to the plaintiff what Congress gave to it in the broad venue provisions of the anti-trust laws, viz., a forum within easy financial reach of plaintiff.

An order may be submitted transferring the action as requested.

[¶ 62,455] Opinion of the Attorney General of Georgia.

Addressed to Alan Kemper, Director of the State Department of Public Welfare, by the Attorney General, June 14, 1949.

Robinson-Patman Act

Applicability to Governmental Body—State Institution Acting in Proprietary Capacity.—The proposed operation of a Factory for the Blind by the Government of the State of Georgia, where products would be manufactured which later would be sold to other states, to the federal government, and to private persons in interstate commerce, is considered a proprietary or business function of the state, as contrasted with a governmental function, and would constitute a legislative divestiture of the state's sovereignty making it subject to the restrictions of the Robinson-Patman Anti-Discrimination Act in the same manner as though it were a private person engaged in such manufacturing and selling.

See the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212.445 and the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.261.

[Questions]

I am pleased to acknowledge Honorable J. M. Forrester's letter of May 26, 1949 in which he requests by opinion as follows:

"This Department has set up and plans to begin operations immediately at the Factory for the Blind, as provided for in an Act of the General Assembly approved March 30, 1937 and as amended by an Act approved February 14, 1949, and the question has arisen: Are the operations of this State Institution when engaged in interstate business activities subject to regulatory measures by which the Federal Government controls and regulates business activities such as the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Robinson-Patman Act. Also, will you please advise in what particulars this Institution is subject to provisions of the Georgia Workmen's Compensation Act."

The request involves three specific questions which divide themselves as follows:

1. Is the Factory for the Blind subject to the provisions of the Georgia Workmen's Compensation Act?

2. Are the operations of the Factory for the Blind, when engaged in interstate business activities, subject to regulatory measures by which the Federal Government controls and regulates business activities, such as the Fair Labor Standards Act?

3. Are the operations of the Factory for the Blind, when engaged in interstate business activities, subject to regulatory measures by which the Federal Government controls and regulates business activities, such as the Robinson-Patman Act?

[The portion of the opinion concluding that the Factory for Blind Persons is subject to the Workmen's Compensation Act of Georgia and excluded from the Fair Labor Standards Act is omitted here, as not pertinent to the scope of these reports.]

[Applicable Law]

In regard to question three, I assume that you have reference to Section 13 of Title 15 U. S. C. A. which provides:

"(a) It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, where either or any of the purchases involved in such discrimination are in commerce, where such commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, and where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly received the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them: Provided, That nothing contained in Sections 12, 13, 14-21, 22-27 of this title shall prevent differentials which make only due allowance for differences in the cost of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the differing methods or quantities in which such commodities are to such purchasers sold or delivered: Provided, however, That the Federal Trade Commission may, after due investigation and hearing to all interested parties, fix and establish quantity limits, and revise the same as it finds necessary, as to particular commodities or classes of commodities, where it finds that available purchasers in greater quantities are so few as to render differentials on account thereof unjustly discriminatory or promotive of monopoly in any line of commerce; and the foregoing shall then not be construed to permit differentials based on differences in quantities greater than those so fixed and established: And provided further, That nothing contained in sections 12, 13, 14-21, 22-27 of this title shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona fide transactions and not in restraint of trade: And provided further, That nothing contained in sections 12, 13, 14-21, 22-27 of this title shall prevent price changes from time to time where in response to changing conditions affecting the market or the marketability of the goods concerned, such as but not limited to actual or imminent deterioration of perishable goods, obsolescence of seasonal goods, distress sales under court process, or sales in good faith in discontinuance of business in the goods concerned.

"(b) Upon proof being made, at any hearing on a complaint under this section, that there has been discrimination in price or services or facilities furnished, the burden of rebutting the prima-facie case thus made by showing justification shall be upon the person charged with a violation of this section, and unless justification shall be affirmatively shown, the Commission is authorized to issue an order terminating the discrimination: Provided, however, That nothing contained in sections 12, 13, 14-21, 22-27 of this title shall prevent a seller rebutting the prima-facie case thus made by showing that his lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or the services or facilities furnished by a competitor.

"(c) It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to pay or grant, or to receive or accept, anything of value as a commission, brokerage, or other compensation, or any allowance or discount in lieu thereof, except for services rendered in connection with the sale or purchase of goods, wares, or merchandise, either to the other party to such transaction or to an agent, representative, or other intermediary therein where such intermediary is acting in fact for or in behalf, or is subject to the direct or indirect control, of any party to such transaction other than the person by whom such compensation is so granted or paid.

"(d) It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to pay or contract for the payment of anything of value to or for the benefit of a customer of such person in the course of such commerce as compensation or in consideration for any services or facilities furnished by or through such customer in connection with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of any products or commodities manufactured, sold or offered for sale by such person, unless such payment or consideration is available on proportionally equal terms to all other customers competing in the distribution of such products or commodities.

"(e) It shall be unlawful for any person to discriminate in favor of one purchaser against another purchaser or purchasers of a commodity bought for resale, with or without processing, by contracting to furnish or furnishing, or by contributing to the furnishing of, any services or facilities connected with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of such commodity so purchased upon terms not accorded to all purchasers on proportionally equal terms.

"(f) It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, knowingly to induce or receive a discrimination in price which is prohibited by this section. Oct. 15, 1914, c. 323, § 2, 38 Stat. 730; June 19, 1936, c. 592, § 1, 49 Stat. 1526."

[Divesting of Sovereign Immunity]

In the case of Lowenstein v. Evans, et al., 69 Fed. Rep. 908, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals held:

"The act of July 2, 1890 (26 Stat. 209, c. 647), to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, is not applicable to the case of a state which, by its laws, assumes an entire monopoly of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. . . . A state is neither a 'person' nor a 'corporation' within the meaning of the act of Congress.

"Where a person brings an action under section 7 of the anti-trust law of July 2, 1890, against the officials of a state, to recover damages for acts done under authority of a state statute, which gives the state an entire monopoly of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, the state itself is a necessary party thereto, and consequently the federal courts would have no jurisdiction of the action."

In the case of State of Georgia v. Evans, 62 S. Ct. 972; 86 L. Ed. 1346, the Supreme Court of the United States held:

"The state of Georgia was a 'person' within sections 1-7 of this title, and could maintain action for treble damages for injuries sustained as result of alleged combination to fix prices and suppress competition in sale of asphalt which the state purchased for use in constructing public highways."

The Supreme Court further held in this case:

"The sovereignty of the state no longer exists with reference to the United States anti-trust Acts because they apply only to interstate commerce. U. S. Const. Art. 1 Sec. 8; Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States; 175 U. S. 211, 44, L. ed. 136, 20 S. Ct. 96; Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U. S. 197, 48 L. ed. 679, 24 S. If the Factory for the Blind confined its activities to the manufacture and sale of supplies to the departments of the State, its sub-divisions, and institutions, I am inclined to the view that it would not be subject to the provisions of Section 13 of Title 15 U. S. C. A. However, if the Factory for the Blind manufactures and sells products to the Federal Government, other States, and to individual and corporate dealers in said supplies, it would be my opinion that they would be engaging in interstate commerce in competition with private enterprise and would fall within the provisions of the above cited act for the reason that if the word "person" is to include a State as plaintiff, it must equally include a State as defendant, and for the further reason that the State divested itself of the sovereignty by its own legislation under which it assumes to act in a proprietary capacity. In other words, when the General Assembly enacted Section 6 of the 1937 Act authorizing the Factory for the Blind to manufacture and sell products beyond the borders of the State to other States, and to individual and corporate dealers in such supplies, it then left the field of governmental activities and entered the field of private enterprise through interstate transactions.

In the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Civil Action No. 2508-48. June 29, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Illegal Contracts—Enforcement of Agreements Contrary to Public Policy.—An amusement company attempting to enforce the agreement of a film exhibitor to accept a lease on a theatre building to be erected by the amusement company, is denied the aid of the court since the contract embodying the film exhibitor's obligation is part of a combination previously found to be in restraint of trade. The law gives no aid to agreements made contrary to public policy. Likewise, a real estate firm which entered the case to demand that the amusement company itself take up the lease under the terms of a separate contract, is denied its motion for summary judgment since the amusement company's obligation was by the terms of the contract conditioned upon certain acts of the film exhibitor which, by operation of law, that exhibitor is now forbidden to perform.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.503, 1660.101.

Memorandum

MATTHEW F. MCGUIRE, Judge: The plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment and that of the intervenor are both denied. What the plaintiffs seek here is to enforce the term of an agreement which is part and parcel of what has been held by the Supreme Court to be an unlawful combination in restraint of trade and illegal, therefore per se.

In such case the aid of the court is denied "not for the benefit of the defendant, but because public policy demands that it should be denied without regard to the interests of individual parties." Continental Wall Paper Co. v. Voigt & Sons, 212 U. S. 227, 262, 263, etc.

The motion of the intervenor Kass Realty Company, Inc. for summary judgment is denied as indicated for the same reason, and for the further reason that even if the contract in question were not tainted with the same illegality as that of the original one between the plaintiffs and the defendant Stanley, there is no obligation on Kogod under its terms to designate any site, and Stanley is incapable of doing so either alone or in conjunction with Kogod by operation of law.

Nor can it be argued that under paragraph 5 of the so-called Kass agreement, that in case of Stanley's inability to participate in the taking of the lease on the theatre to be erected, that K-B shall have the power and the privilege not only to take the lease but to designate the site, for the language is plain and unambiguous that K-B, with reference to the site has no rights except those it might exercise in connection with Stanley and since Stanley cannot function, then any exercise of right on the part of K-B would be invalid under the terms of the instrument —which in addition is purely executory.

This is the nub of the matter as I see it. All of the parties in this case it appears to me are hoist with their own petard: This leaves the matter in this posture. The motions for summary judgment as stated are denied, Stanely is left to comply with the terms of the New York decree, and both complaint and counter-claim are dismissed by the Court sua sponte.

[¶ 62,457] United States v. Cement Institute, et al.

In the United States District Court for the District of Colorado. Civil No. 1291. July 18, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Delivered Prices in the Cement Industry—Delivered Prices as a Restraint on Interstate Commerce—Effect of Prior Cease and Desist Order.—In an action brought under the Sherman Antitrust Act against fifty-seven corporations alleging that they conspired to fix high, unreasonable, identical and non-competitive prices in the sale of cement by selling on a delivered price basis, a motion to dismiss the complaint, on the grounds that the controversy had already been decided by the issuance of a Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order enjoining the same practices as set out in the complaint, was denied.

It was held that the Court had jurisdiction by virtue of the Sherman Act and that the existence of the Commission order which declared that quoting delivered prices was an unfair method of competition could not prevent the enforcement of the Sherman Act in this action the purpose of which was to declare that such practice constituted a restraint of interstate trade.

See Sherman Antitrust Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.208, 1610.222.

For the plaintiff: Peter J. Donoghue, Chief, Mountain States Office, Department of Justice, Antitrust Division; Max M. Bulkeley, United States Attorney, both of Denver, Colorado.

For the defendants: Grant, Shafroth & Toll; Lindsey, Larwill & Wolfe; Hughes & Dorsey; John R. Moran; Kenneth W. Robinson; Van Cise & Van Cise; George A. Crowder; Erskine R. Myer; Dines, Dines & Holme; Bannister, Weller & Friederich; Lewis, Grant Newton, Davis & Henry; all of Denver, Colorado.

Memorandum on Motion to Dismiss

J. Foster Symes, District Judge: This action was filed June 28, 1945 under § 4 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act (15 USCA § 4), investing the district courts with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of §§ 1 to 7 of that Act.

The matter is now before the court on the motion of 57 corporate defendants—including the Cement Institute—to dismiss the complaint for lack of jurisdiction as a court of equity, and that the action or controversy has become moot, and further, because defendants have forever been restrained by court decree and administrative order from committing the offenses charged in the complaint.

This reference is to a decree entered by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit on July 27, 1948, in Aetna Portland Cement Co. v. Federal Trade Commission et al., and an order to cease and desist of the Federal Trade Commission dated July 17, 1943, in the matter of the Cement Institute et al., which became final on July 9, 1948.

[Asserted Mootness of Question]

In support of the motion it is argued that the controversy is ended, and is no longer within the jurisdiction of the court, relying upon the holding of this court in Walling v. Shenandoah-Dives Mining Co.—affirmed in 134 Fed. (2d) 395, CCA 10th. In that case the Circuit Court of Appeals said, p. 396:

> "When in the course of a trial the matter in controversy comes to an end, either by an act of one or both of the parties, or by an operation of law, the question becomes moot and the court is without further jurisdiction in the matter."

Also upon the rule that upon a challenge to the jurisdiction of the court the burden of establishing jurisdiction is upon the Government.

On June 9, 1948 the Supreme Court of the United States issued its mandate to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit, sustaining the order of the Federal Trade Commission, dated July 17, 1943. Later the Circuit Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit entered its final decree, commanding obedience to the Federal Trade Commission order to cease and desist.

The gist of the complaint is that the defendants "have been and now are engaged in an unlawful combination and conspiracy to fix and maintain high, unreasonable, identical, and non-competitive prices on the sale by them of cement;" that they accomplish this by an agreement to sell, and by selling, "all the cement produced by them on a so-called multiple basing point system, on a delivered price basis only" on standard terms and conditions, and at net mill prices which are systematically varied "so that each may quote identical given prices at any given locality, regardless of differences in actual transportation costs."

The decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals directs that the moving defendants

> "do forthwith cease and desist from entering into, continuing, cooperating in, or carrying out any planned common course of action, understanding, agreement, combination, or conspiracy between and among any two or more of said respondents, or between any one or more of said respondents and others not parties hereto, to do or perform any of the following things:"

The defendants argue that the effect of the decree and order prohibits and stops each of the violations charged against the moving defendants in the present complaint.

The complaint, however, charges that the defendants "threaten to continue such offenses and will continue them," unless relief is granted, in spite of the fact that the Commission's order and the Circuit Court of Appeals decree both direct the moving defendants to "forthwith cease and desist from entering into, continuing, co-operating in, or carrying out any" combination or conspiracy of any type, such as charged in the complaint; that the decree and order have removed the threat of, or the continuance of, the conspiracy or its revival in the future.

It will be observed that the prohibitions embraced within the decree and order carry a double sanction, in that the violation of either is a violation of the other, and apply not only to the corporate defendants, but to the officers, agents, representatives and assignees, etc.

It is next argued that there is a presumption that the moving defendants since the entry of the decree and order, have not and will not engage in the practices complained of in the instant action, and in the light of this legal presumption there can be no reasonable expectation or fear that the alleged violations will be repeated in the future.

California v. San Pablo & Tulare Railroad Co., 149 U. S. 308, 314, is cited as laying down the rule of mootness. It states the rule to be :

> "* * * But the court is not empowered to decide moot questions or abstract propositions, or to declare, for the government of future cases, principles or rules of law which cannot affect the result as to the thing in issue in the case before it."

Counsel admit an injunction cannot be granted to restrain possible violations of law, and where in the course of proceedings in a litigated matter the controversy has come to an end, the question is moot and the court is not required to take any further action. Walling v. Lacy, 51 Fed. Supp., 1002 (Colo.) 1943.

Assuming for the purpose of the motion only that a conspiracy of a continuing nature once established may be presumed to continue until the contrary is shown, the question necessarily arises, what evidence is necessary to show abandonment, or the end of the conspiracy. It is argued that the presumption of continuance of the conspiracy in the case at bar is rebutted by the Circuit Court of Appeals decree and the Commission order enjoining the defendants from performing the practices complained of in the present action. It is a well-established principle of equity that an injunction is an extraordinary remedy and will not be granted on mere apprehension of future injury.

Counsel for the motion argue the decrees of the Circuit Court of Appeals and the Federal Trade Commission remove any danger of future violations of the kind charged against these moving defendants.

[Source of Jurisdiction]

The vital defect in their argument is that this action is brought under § 4 of the Sherman Act (15 USCA § 4), while the so-called Federal Trade Commission case—which is the basis of the Federal Trade Commission order, and decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit—charges violation of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, and § 2 of the Clayton Act.

In that proceeding the Federal Trade Commission issued a cease and desist order, ordering defendants to forthwith cease and desist from entering into, continuing, co-operating in, carrying out, any planned course of action, understanding, agreement, combination, or conspiracy between or among any two or more respondents * * * to do or perform certain things therein specified. Among the things enjoined was "quoting or selling of cement in accordance with the multiple basing point delivered price system or any other plan or system resulting in identical price quotations." The record discloses the Sherman Anti-Trust Act was not invoked in that proceeding.

An appeal was taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit, which set aside and vacated the cease and desist order. The Federal Trade Commission appealed to the Supreme Court, which on April 26, 1948, reversed the Circuit Court of Appeals, and directed that court to enforce the cease and desist order of the Commission, (Federal Trade Comm'n, v. Cement Institute, 333 U. S. 683).

The defendants now move to dismiss the instant case on the grounds mentioned, that this court lacks jurisdiction, because the controversy has become moot and lacks equity, and that the defendants have forever been restrained by the Commission and the Circuit Court of Appeals.

It is conceded that at the time this action was filed in June, 1945, this court had jurisdiction by virtue of § 4 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. Further, the Federal Trade Commission Act provides that jurisdiction granted to the Commission shall not prevent or interfere with the enforcement of the Sherman Act. See § 5 (e), 15 USCA § 45 (e) and § 11 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 USCA § 51). These statutory provisions seem to indicate authority on the part of the Government to carry on simultaneous proceedings under both acts. See Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U. S. 683, at p. 694:

> "We find nothing to justify a holding that the filing of a Sherman Act suit by the Attorney General requires the termination of those Federal Trade Commission proceedings."

The jurisdiction of this court in this case is derived directly from § 4 of the Sherman Act (supra), which not only confers jurisdiction, but imposes the duty to hear and determine the case. We find no authority holding that jurisdiction of this court depends on any presumption of continuance of the conspiracy, or that presumption of continuance of the conspiracy can be overcome by presumption that the defendants will fully comply with the cease and desist order. In other words, the net result is that the jurisdiction of this court is based solely upon a congressional mandate and not upon a balancing of presumptions.

True, the Government must establish by proof the jurisdictional allegations of the complaint, and every other material and essential fact, and at this stage of the proceedings it appears the complaint contains the necessary allegations to confer jurisdiction. Otherwise the defendants by mere charge of mootness, based on presumption, could require the court to try this case piecemeal, and compel production of proof of the continuance of the conspiracy before the Government was afforded opportunity to produce its proof of the formation and existence of the alleged conspiracy. See U. S. v. Sinclair Refining Co., 126 Fed. (2d) 827 (CCA 10th), and the following from Walling v. Helmerich & Payne, 323 U. S. 37, at p. 43, where the Supreme Court said:

> "* * * Despite respondent's voluntary cessation of the challenged conduct, a controversy between the parties over the legality of the split-day plan still remains. Voluntary discontinuance of an alleged illegal activity does not operate to remove a case from the ambit of judicial power." Citing cases.

To put it another way, we might observe that the Federal Trade Commission proceeding adjudicated the conduct charged in its complaint constituted unfair methods of competition under § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, while the object of this proceeding under the Sherman Act is to obtain an adjudication that the defendants' conduct constitutes a restraint of interstate trade and commerce, in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act.

Very briefly, the cease and desist order prohibits the respondents from concerted action among themselves, or with others, to use the multiple basing point system in the sale of cement, etc., while the relief sought in the case at bar is not only for an injunction against continued agreements among the defendants, but seeks a decree declaring that the quoting or selling of cement as prices calculated or determined pursuant to the multiple basing point system, constitutes a violation of the Sherman Act. It seeks the dissolution of the Cement Institute, and a prohibition against the organization of any other association with similar functions. In fact the Cement case, 333 U. S. 683 (supra), makes frequent reference to the Cement Institute as being one of the prime movers in the conspiracy in the Federal Trade Commission case.

[Nature of Relief Sought]

Much of the relief requested here has not been afforded to the Government in the cease and desist order, which does not in any way hold that the Sherman Act has been violated.

Next, the prayer for relief in the present case asks that the activities of the defendants be adjudged a violation of the Sherman Act, and will give rise to liabilities which are different from those imposed in the Federal Trade Commission proceeding. In fact an examination of the Commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law in the so-called Cement case, 333 U. S. 683 (supra), at p. 735 (set out in part in Mr. Justice Burton's dissent), shows that the defendants were found guilty of violation of the Clayton Act, the Robinson-Patman Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act, and not the Sherman Act.

It would seem the Federal Trade Commission Act was not designed to interfere with, or detract from the exercise of the authority and duty of the Attorney General to seek enforcement of the Sherman Act, as it especially provides that no order of the Commission, or judgment, shall in any wise relieve or absolve any person from liability under the anti-trust acts, which are defined as including the Sherman Act. See 15 USCA § 44, and § 11 of the Trade Commission Act (15 USCA § 51).

We therefore conclude that the Attorney General was acting within his authority when he directed the filing of the complaint pending in this court.

The Federal Trade Commission has no jurisdiction over, and cannot afford relief from, Sherman Act violations. Only Federal Courts have that authority.

[Motion Denied]

The motion to dismiss the complaint should be, and is, hereby denied.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Subpoenae Duces Tecum—Discovery—Reasonable Scope of Request for Production of Documents.—Stipulations entered into between a motion picture booking agency and an exhibitor limiting the use of and withdrawing certain motions for discovery of documents do not provide sufficient grounds to deny the issuance of subpoenae duces tecum, the purposes of the two devices being complementary but not identical. Objections to subpoenae are upheld where the theory of the complaint does not support or make reasonable a request for documents covering business operations over a great period of time.

Memorandum

RIFKIND, D. J. This is a motion by Marcus Loew Booking Agency as a defendant and by Louisville Operating Co., Inc., as a witness to quash subpoenae served upon them by plaintiffs to procure the production, at a deposition, of certain papers.

[Demands Not Inconsistent]

1. The first ground of objection is that the subpoenae are inconsistent with certain stipulations made between the plaintiffs and the defendants on the basis of which certain motions under Rule 34 were withdrawn. The subpoena under Rule 45 (b) and the discovery under Rule 34 serve complementary but not identical purposes. A stipulation concerning the first does not curtail the use of the second. 2 Moore's Federal Practice, § 34.01.

2. According to plaintiffs' counsel, the gist of the amended complaint is that the nine defendant motion picture distributors and the operators of the Loew's-United Artists Theatre, Rialto, Strand, Mary Anderson and Brown Theatres, all located in Louisville, Kentucky, have conspired to deprive plaintiffs as operators of the National Theatre of the opportunity to show first-run pictures. The scope of the subpoena duces tecum will be judged in relationship to the allegations supporting such a complaint.

[Reasonableness of Demands]

3. The subpoena addressed to the Marcus Loew Booking Agency, Inc.: Item 1. The objections to item 1 are without merit. Item 2. The showing made by plaintiff why the documents requested should extend back to the year 1927 is inadequate. On the basis of plaintiffs' affidavit it would appear that 1936 is a more reasonable and supportable date. Item 3. Plaintiffs' affidavit makes no showing why the requested documents should be produced for a period prior to January 1943. Item 4. No showing is made why the requested documents should be produced for a period prior to January 1943. Item 5. A subpoena is the appropriate means to secure the production of documents in existence and not for the preparation of new papers. Such information may be secured by interrogatories or by deposition.

4. The subpoena addressed to Louisville Operating Company: Item 1 fails to specify what years are demanded. As such it is too broad. Items 2 and 3. Plaintiffs' affidavit does not support the requested production for as long a period as 1927 to date; 1936 to date is a more reasonable and supportable period. Item 4. No showing is made why the requested papers should relate to the period prior to January 1943. Item 5. The objections to this item are without merit.

[Subpoenae Modified]

The subpoenae will be modified accordingly. Settle order on notice.

[¶ 62,459] Opinion of the Attorney General of Minnesota.

Addressed to James W. Clark, Commissioner, Department of Business Research and Development, by J. A. A. Burnquist, Attorney General, Charles E. Houston, Assistant Attorney General. July 5, 1949.

Minnesota Unfair Trade Practices Act

Unfair Trade Prices—Effect of Tax Statute in Determination of Cost of Doing Business.—A Minnesota statute imposing an additional tax upon the sale of cigarettes, and declaring that such additional tax shall not be considered part of the cost of doing business as that phrase is used in the state unfair practices act, does not have the effect of amending that act, being so limited by virtue of the constitutional provision that laws shall encompass only one subject, which is to be set forth in the title of the act. Since the title of the tax statute contains no reference to unfair trade practices, the statute does not in any manner alter the computation of costs of doing business required in arriving at a fair resale price for cigarettes.

Unfair Trade Practices—Evidentiary Effect of Eight Per Cent Mark-up Rule.—Language in the unfair trade statute stating that sale of an article by a retailer at less than net invoice price plus eight per cent shall be prima facie evidence of a violation of the act, does not impose a requirement that the eight per cent mark-up be applied in arriving at a fair price, but merely establishes an evidentiary rule, permitting a complainant, by showing a sale at a lesser price, to place upon the retailer the burden of proving compliance with the law.

See the Minnesota Unfair Practices Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8428, law text sections 325.01, 325.52.

Retailers and wholesalers engaged in business in Minnesota are prohibited by M. S. A. 325.04 from selling goods at less than cost for the purpose or with the effect of injuring competitors and destroying competition. Sec. 325.01, Subd. 5, defines cost to mean:

> "(1) The actual current delivered invoice or replacement cost, whichever is lower, not including customary cash discounts, plus the cost of doing business at that location by the vendor;
> "(2) Where a manufacturer publishes a list price and discounts, in determining such 'cost' the manufacturer's published list price and discounts then currently in effect plus the cost of doing business by the vendor shall be prima facie evidence of 'cost.'"

Subd. 6 of the same section defines customary cash discounts. Subd. 7 defines cost of doing business or overhead expense. That definition specifies that such cost of doing business includes taxes.

L. 1947, C. 619, Sec. 14, M. S. A. 297.02, imposed a tax on cigarettes. The 1949 law increased the tax. Sec. 297.02, supra, Subd. 5, reads:

> "The tax imposed by this section shall not be construed as a cost of doing business or an overhead expense under Minnesota Statutes 1945, Section 325.01, Subdivision 7."

You have for consideration these

Facts:

On the five popular brands of cigarettes, the manufacturer's list price is $7.78 per thousand. The trade discount is 10%. This leaves a net cost of $7.002 per thousand. One thousand cigarettes are put up in fifty packages, or five cartons of ten packages each. The United States tax is $3.50 per thousand. Such tax is included in the manufacturer's list price. The tax imposed by the 1947 act on ordinary cigarettes is $1.50 per thousand. The additional tax imposed by the 1949 act is $.50 per thousand.

The 1947 act in Sec. 1, Subd. 7, defines distributor to mean:

> "Any person engaged in the business of selling cigarettes in this state who brings, or causes to be brought, into this state from without the state any packages of cigarettes for sale;

"Any person who makes, manufactures, or fabricates cigarettes in this state for sale in this state;

"Any person engaged in the business without this state who ships or transports cigarettes to retailers in this state, to be sold by those retailers;

"Any person who engages in this state in the business of selling packages of cigarettes which he purchases unstamped from a licensee under this act."

The distributor who sells to independent retailers includes the state tax in the invoice price, the same as the manufacturer includes the United States tax in the manufacturer's price.

Some distributors sell direct at retail to the public.

You call attention to N. S. A. 325.52, the first paragraph of which reads:

"Any sale made by the retail vendor at less than eight per cent above the manufacturer's published list price, less his published discounts, where the manufacturer publishes a list price; or, in the absence of such a list price, at less than eight per cent above the actual current delivered invoice or replacement cost, for the purpose or with the effect of injuring competitors or destroying competition, shall be prima facie evidence of the violation of sections 325.2 to 325.07."

You submit to the Attorney General for his consideration the Question:

"Does the invoice price charged by the State of Minnesota for the evidentiary stamps to be affixed to the cigarettes before they can be sold constitute an additional cost of those cigarettes to the licensed distributor, which must be added to the manufacturer's list price, (less trade discounts), before computation of the mark-up required by the Unfair Trade Practices Act, Section 325.52, Minnesota Statutes, 1947?"

In commenting thereon, you restate the question as follows:

"The question resolves itself to this: Should the retail selling price of a carton of cigarettes having a manufacturer's list price less trade discounts, of $1.40 per carton, be $1.40 plus 40¢ state tax, plus 8% mark-up, or should it be $1.40 plus 8% mark-up plus 40¢ state tax in order to comply with the prima facie requirements of the statute. The difference, by carrying all fractions to the next cent, is 3¢ per carton or 3/10 cent per package."

Opinion:

Necessarily, we must first dispose of L. 1947, c. 619, Sec. 2, Subd. 5, M. S. A. 297.02, Subd. 5, supra. That subdivision states that the tax shall not be construed as a cost of doing business, or an overhead expense, under M. S. A. 325.01, Subd. 7. But when we refer to the title of the act, we find no suggestion of any amendment to Sec. 325.01, Subd. 7. The title of the act states that the act relates to a tax on the sale of cigarettes and then states some details in connection therewith, but there is not a remote suggestion that it relates in any manner to the law which prohibits the selling of goods below cost or the definition of the term "cost" as applied thereto.

The Minnesota Constitution in Art. IV, Sec. 27, states:

"No law shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title."

So, we have at the outset for consideration the question whether or not we are to consider Subd. 5, supra, as stating a rule for construction. If it is not law, we do not consider it.

The subject matter of C. 619, supra, is to impose and provide the machinery for the collection of a tax on cigarettes. It is not an act relating to fair trade practices. The enforcement of the fair trade act is not even remotely connected with the duties of the officers who enforce the cigarette tax law. The amendment of the fair trade law has no relevancy to the imposition of a tax on cigarettes and the collection thereof. See State v. Madson, 43 Minn. 438.

In Sverkerson v. City of Minneapolis, 204 Minn. 388, on page 393, the court said:

"* * * An amendatory act, as here, must remain not only within the title but also germane to the subject matter of the amended act."

In support of that proposition, the court cited Egekvist Bakeries, Inc., v. Benson, 186 Minn. 520. The conclusion is that Subd. 5, supra, must be disregarded in arriving at a conclusion on this problem. So, again reading Sec. 325.01, Subd. 7, to determine the cost of doing business, we see that included in such cost must be taxes paid.

We have two situations to consider. One situation is that the retailer buys from the distributor. The distributor pays the cigarette tax before he sells the cigarettes to the retailer. In that case the cost of the merchandise that the retailer pays is the invoice price of the goods, plus the tax. The eight per cent provision in Sec. 325.52 applies thereto. The other case to be considered is where the distributor buys the cigarettes from the manufacturer and the distributor himself is the retailer. The purchase price which the distributor pays to the manufacturer does not include the state tax, but the distributor pays the state tax before he sells the cigarettes to the consumer. In that case, the distributor's cost is the amount that he pays the manufacturer and the state tax on the cigarettes is taxes under Subd. 7, supra. So, in that case the distributor who is also a retailer has a smaller invoice cost (Sec. 325.01, Subd. 5) than the retailer who buys from a distributor. When a distributor is a retailer, the eight per cent is computed before the tax is added.

The question submitted contains an assumption which is not justified. The fair trade law does not require an eight per cent mark-up by the retailer. N. S. A. 325.52.

As has been stated in previous opinions, Sec. 325.52 is a mere rule of evidence. It is not a hard and fast rule. It shifts the burden of going forward with the evidence. It merely establishes a prima facie evidence rule. The real thing prohibited is selling below cost with the effect mentioned in the statute. See McElhone v. Geror, 207 Minn. 580.

[¶ 62,460] Fred Martin and Max Lanier v. Albert B. Chandler, individually and as Commissioner of Baseball, et al.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civ. 49-358. July 8, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Parties—Claimed Indispensability of Joint Tort-Feasor.—Baseball clubs and associations, which are sued in an action for damages and injunction, are denied their motion for dismissal wherein it is argued that the baseball commissioner, whose decision they are bound to abide by in regard to the eligibility of the plaintiffs to play professionally, is thereby an indispensable party but has not been served with process and is not before the court. One tort-feasor cannot claim the indispensability of another joint tort-feasor as a party to a suit in equity. A contrary rule would result in the self-immunization of parties to tortious agreements by the simple device of including as a party to such agreement a person outside the reach of the courts.

For the plaintiffs: John L. Flynn; James A. McKaigney and William R. Ferris, of counsel.

For the defendants: Willkie, Owen, Farr, Gallagher & Walton for Ford C. Frick et al.; Baker, Hostetler & Patterson for the Boston American League Baseball Co. et al.; Edgar P. Feeley for the National Exhibition Co.

[Nature of Action]

RIFKIND, D. J. This is a motion by some, but not all, of the named defendants to dismiss the first cause of action stated in the complaint upon the ground that "the defendant Albert B. Chandler is an indispensable party, has not been served * * * and may not be sued * * * in this District without his consent."

The complaint, filed on March 8, 1949, is in two counts. The first is brought under 15 U. S. C. A. § 26; the second is founded on 15 U. S. C. A. § 15. Together they seek to enjoin alleged violations of the anti-trust laws and to recover treble damages for the injuries sustained by plaintiffs by reason of such violations.

[Background]

More specifically, the complaint alleges that "the defendants have by entering into the Major League Agreement, the Major-Minor League Agreement and the National Association Agreement and by their concert of action in adopting and enforcing said Agreements and the Rules concomitant therewith engaged, knowingly and continuously, in a wrongful and unlawful conspiracy to monopolize and restrain trade and commerce among the States in violation of sections of the Sherman and Clayton Anti-Trust Laws, 15 U. S. C. A. §§ 1, 2, 3, 13 and 14, and the defendants by reason of said conspiracy and concert of action have denied and continue to deny the plaintiffs herein the opportunity to earn a livelihood in their profession and are causing the plaintiffs immediate and continuing and progressively irreparable damage." (Paragraph 47).

It is further alleged in the complaint that "The Major League and the Major-Minor League Agreements and the Rules adopted and enforced in accordance therewith prohibit any other than a standard or uniform contract to be entered into between the constituent clubs and players." (Paragraph 28.) "The said standard or uniform contract in both the Major and Minor Leagues must contain provisions (hereinafter referred to as the 'reserve clause') whereby a player in signing his contract for the ensuing season or seasons agrees not to sign a contract with or play for any Club at the expiration of the period of said contract other than with or for the Club which contracted with him, or its assignee. The infraction of this Rule is banishment from Organized Baseball." (Paragraph 29.)

Plaintiffs have been professional baseball players, the one from 1933, the other from 1935, until 1946. "In or about May, 1946, the plaintiffs were declared ineligible by the Commissioner to play in Organized Baseball for a period of five years because of their alleged disregard of the provisions of the Major League Agreement and the Major League Rules and particularly for violating the reserve clause of their respective contracts and for engaging in competition with ineligible players." (Paragraph 44.)

Subsequent to their suspension from organized baseball the plaintiffs sought to earn a livelihood by utilizing their professional ability as baseball players. In this object they failed because the Commissioner employing the powers vested in him under the provisions of the Major League Agreement, the Major-Minor League Agreement, the National Association Agreement and the concomitant Rules persuaded, induced and coerced clubs and players of Organized Baseball to refrain from engaging in performances to which the plaintiffs participated, under threat of suspending such clubs and players from Organized Baseball if they did so engage in such performances. (Paragraph 46.)

[Decision]

In substance the moving defendants contend that Chandler, the Commissioner of Baseball, is indispensable because they are bound, by the very agreements here challenged, to abide his decisions with respect to plaintiffs' eligibility to pay. That, however, is rather curious circular reasoning. It is hornbook law that one tort feasor, defendant in an action, may not claim that another, a joint tort feasor, is an indispensable party. 30 C. J. S. § 147; Kidd v. New Hampshire Tract. Co., S. Ct., N. H., 1903, 56 A. 465; Cole Silver Mining Co. v. Virginia & Gold Hill Water Co., C. C. D. Nev., 1871, 6 Fed. Cas. No. 2989.

That one charged as a member of a conspiracy to violate the anti-trust laws may not successfully claim the indispensability of his fellow conspirators is implicit in United States v. National Lead Company, et al., S. D. N. Y., 1945, 63 F. Supp. 513, affirmed, 1947, 332 U. S. 319, where but three of a total of twenty-two conspirators were made defendants, most of them being foreign corporations without the jurisdiction.

Broadly stated, the question presented by the motion is whether those conspiring to violate the anti-trust laws may immunize themselves against injunctive relief by vesting the power of direction and decision in an arbiter or industrial czar who is inaccessible to service of process. Such inaccessibility might be achieved, for instance, by locating his office and residence across the nation's borders. I know of no rule of law and no principle of equity which produces so bizarre a result.

In view of this conclusion it is unnecessary to decide whether jurisdiction may or may not be obtained of Chandler in this district.

[Dismissal Refused]

The motion to dismiss is denied. Defendants will answer in ten days.

In the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Civil Action No. 8947. Filed June 28, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Plumbing Fixtures and Fittings — Requirements Attached to Sales — Information Obtained from Customers Privileged.—In a civil action to enjoin a manufacturer of plumbing fixtures and fittings from requiring dealers who purchased fixtures from it to buy fittings as well, it was held that statements, invoices, records of sales and letters relating to the manufacturer's practices, given by the manufacturer's customers to agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation were privileged statements and need not be disclosed by the Government in response to interrogatories.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.341.

For the plaintiff: Stanley E. Disney, W. Wallace Kirkpatrick, Special Assistants to the Attorney General, both of Washington, D. C., Gerald A. Gleeson, United States Attorney, of Philadelphia, Pa., John H. D. Wigger, Baddia J. Rashid, Special Attorneys.

For the defendant: Charles I. Thompson, Lucius P. Chase, Ballard, Spahr, Andrews & Ingersoll, Philadelphia, Pa.

Sur* Plaintiff's Objections to Interrogatories and Sur Defendant's Motion to Compel Answers

[Nature of Action]

KIRKPATRICK, Ch. J.: This is a civil action brought by the United States, based upon the antitrust laws. The gist of the complaint is that the defendant, a manufacturer of vitreous china and enamel plumbing fixtures and sanitary brass fittings, has restrained commerce by requiring dealers and others purchasing fixtures from it to buy its fittings as well. The prayer is for injunctive relief only.

[Objections to Interrogatories]

The defendant has filed interrogatories and supplemental interrogatories, 22 in all. The plaintiff has answered all but three, to which it has filed objections, (5, 16 and part of 22). The objections are now before the Court together with a motion by the defendant, to compel answers.

[F. B. I. Investigation]

It appears that before the suit was brought the government through agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation made a nationwide investigation of the manner in which the plaintiff conducted its business, interviewing a large number of customers and other persons with whom the defendant dealt and obtaining from them and from other witnesses statements, both written and oral, together with originals and copies of invoices, records of sales and letters relating to the defendant's practices and business transactions. In substance, this is the information which is asked for in Interrogatory 5 and which the plaintiff objects to giving.

It is an important consideration that in the present case the government is not asserting a proprietary or financial claim, or resisting one as it was in O'Neill v. United States, 79 F. Supp. 827, and, therefore, the investigation was for a purpose entirely different from that in the O'Neill case. The United States brought the present suit in its sovereign capacity seeking to enforce the antitrust laws and the sanctions in these laws. The gist of the action is the alleged violation of a criminal statute.

The question of procedure raised by these objections has already been decided adversely to the plaintiff's contention by this Court, as has its objections based upon Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U. S. 495. See O'Neil v. United States, supra.

A fundamental issue is whether the information withheld is privileged matter within the meaning of Rule 26(b).*

* The interrogatories, of course, were filed under Rule 33 but that rule incorporates Rule 26 (b) by providing "Interrogatories may relate to any matters which can be inquired into under Rule 26 (b)." The language of Rule 26 (b) is "Unless otherwise ordered by the court . . . the deponent may be examined regarding any matter, not privileged, which is relevant to the subject matter," etc.

[Privileged by Public Policy]

It is unnecessary to deal with the plaintiff's contention that the information withheld is privileged by virtue of the Department of Justice's Order No. 3229 of May 2, 1939, issued under the authority of R. S. 161. In my opinion its disclosure is forbidden by much broader considerations of public policy, which Wigmore (Sec. 2374) calls a genuine privilege. This policy cannot be better stated than it was in an opinion of Attorney General Jackson, 40 Op. Atty. Gen., No. 8, April 30, 1941, as follows:

> "Moreover, disclosure of the reports would be of serious prejudice to the future usefulness of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. As you probably know, much of this information is given in confidence and can only be obtained upon pledge not to disclose its sources. A disclosure of the sources would embarrass informants—sometimes in their employment, sometimes in their social relations, and in extreme cases might even endanger their lives. We regard the keeping of faith with confidential informants as an indispensable condition of future efficiency."

Wigmore's statement is that the privilege "must be recognized for the communications made by informers to official prosecutors, because such communications ought to receive encouragement, and because that confidence which will lead to such communications can be created only by holding out immunity from a compulsory disclosure of the informant's identity."

In Arnstein v. United States, 296 Fed. 946, the Court, holding that the trial court had properly refused to require an Assistant District Attorney to produce signed statements made to him by a defendant who testified on behalf of the government, said,

> "The principle laid down . . . was that it is the duty of every citizen to communicate to his government any information which he has of the commission of an offense against its laws, and that a court of justice will not compel or allow such information to be disclosed, either by the subordinate officer to whom it is given, by the informer himself, or by any other person, without the permission of the government, the evidence being excluded, not for the protection of the witness or of the party in the particular case, but upon general grounds of public policy, because of the confidential nature of such communications."

If the answers of the plaintiff to the interrogatories to which it has responded be read it would seem that the government has already furnished the defendant with all the information, obtained through its investigation, that it could without encroaching upon the field protected by the rule of policy above stated. It will be noted that Interrogatory 5 specifically asks for the names and addresses of the persons contacted as well as their statements and documents furnished by them. These persons it may be assumed are confidential informants and directly within the scope of the policy.

I, therefore, rule that Interrogatory 5 need not be answered.

While I think the information asked for comes within the meaning of privileged matter as that expression is used in Rule 26(b) I also believe that, even if that expression did not cover it the Court, upon the broad ground of public policy stated above whether or not strictly a privilege, should still refuse to order the disclosure asked for.

There is nothing mandatory about the discovery provisions of the Rules. On the contrary, the purpose and intent is evident throughout to leave their application to the discretion of the trial court—not, of course, an absolute discretion but one controlled and governed, not only by statutory enactments and the well established rules of the common law, but also by considerations of policy and of necessity, propriety and expediency in the particular case at hand.

What has been said applies generally to Interrogatories 16 and 22 as well as to 5. In addition, 16 asks for "copies of any and all invoices, correspondence, and other documents procured from Kohler purchasers or any other person . . .". Although the originals are not asked for, it should be noted that the rule adopted by this Court and first stated in De Bruce v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 6 F. R. D. 403, requiring copies of witnesses' statements to be produced in answer to interrogatories under Rule 33, has never been extended to copies of documents of this kind which are integral parts of the res gestae of various business transactions. It was pointed out in the De Bruce case that while the statement of a witness about the facts of the accident might answer to the description of a "document," what was really asked for was a disclosure of facts and an identification of the source from which they have been obtained and that giving a copy of the statement is merely the most satisfactory way of disclosing the facts.

[Motion to Compel Answers Denied]

The ruling in this case does not conflict with that in O'Neill v. United States, supra, first, because the government is not asserting a proprietary or financial claim and, second, because the O'Neill case was decided chiefly on the basis that the Suits in Admiralty Act abrogated the privilege asserted in that case.

The plaintiff's objections are sustained.

The defendant's motion to compel answers is denied.

In the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. Civil Action No. 125-49. Filed July 22, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Pressure Pipe Industry—Consent Judgment—Patent Holding Company Ordered Dissolved.—In a civil suit charging conspiracy to monopolize and restrain trade in the cast iron pressure pipe industry, four corporations consented to a judgment which ordered a patent holding company dissolved after it had dedicated its patents to the public. The decree also terminated patent license agreements to limit the production, grades and quality of pipe. The companies were enjoined from entering any contract which would allocate customers or markets, restrict the import or export of pipe, or condition a license upon the understanding that the licensee not engage in research.

Final Judgment

FORMAN, District Judge: Plaintiff, the United States of America, having filed its complaint herein on the 16th day of February, 1949; the defendants having appeared and filed their answers herein to the complaint, denying the substantive allegations thereof; and all parties hereto by their attorneys herein having severally consented to the entry of this final judgment herein without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and without admission by any party in respect of any such issue;

Now, therefore, before any testimony has been taken herein, and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and upon consent of all parties hereto, it is hereby Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed as follows:

I

The Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter herein and of all of the parties to this judgment, and the complaint states a cause of action against the defendants, and each of them, under Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," as amended, commonly known as the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. Sec. 1)

[Terms Defined]

II

As used in this judgment, the following terms have the meaning assigned respectively to them below:

A) "Sand Spun" means the defendant Sand Spun Patents Corporation;

B) "License agreements" means each, every and all agreements and contracts, existing and by the terms thereof in full force and effect as of the date of this judgment, between defendant Sand Spun and other defendants, whereby licenses have been granted to manufacture, use and sell pipe under Sand Spun patents;

C) "Pipe" means centrifugally cast cast-iron pressure pipe for use in the conveyance of liquids and gases under pressure;

D) "Patent" or "patents" means United States Letters Patent and all reissues and extensions thereof;

E) "Sand Spun patents" means the United States Letters Patent and applications therefor, listed in Exhibit A attached hereto and made a part hereof, all of which are owned by Sand Spun.

[Application of Judgment]

III

The provisions of this judgment applicable to any defendant herein shall apply to each of its subsidiaries, successors, and assigns engaged in the production of pipe, and to each of its officers, directors, agents, and employees, and to each person acting under, through or for such defendant.

[Termination of License Agreements]

IV

The license agreements, as defined in this judgment, are, and each of them is, hereby terminated; and the defendants are hereby jointly and severally enjoined and restrained from any further performance in whole or in part of such license agreements, and from any further performance of any of the obligations assumed under or in furtherance of any such agreements. The defendants are hereby jointly and severally enjoined and restrained from, directly or indirectly, maintaining, reinstating or enforcing such license agreements.

[Attaching Conditions to License Enjoined]

V

The defendants herein are individually and jointly restrained from conditioning:

(1) a license or immunity granted under any patent; or

(2) a disclosure made of technical information or data; for the manufacture of pipe, upon the requirement that the other party to such transaction shall agree:

(a) to manufacture only pipe of specified kinds and sizes;

(b) to maintain any standards, grades or qualities of pipe;

(c) to cross license or assign any patent or patents or any inventions, or to disclose technical information or data developed, owned or controlled by said other party to any defendant;

(d) not to dispose of any invention, patent, mechanical device or process without first offering it to any defendant;

(e) not to engage in research or not to investigate or develop any invention, process, product, machine, mechanical device or any plan or method of manufacture, or to engage in any such research, investigation, or development only with the permission of any other person, or to forego any such research, investigation, or development if any other person agrees to undertake it;

(f) to maintain or adhere to any restrictions as to quantity of pipe produced;

(g) To pay a greater per tonnage or any other per unit royalty on any quantity of pipe produced than is provided for any smaller quantity;

(h) to maintain or adhere to any restrictions which limit the export of pipe from the United States;

(i) to pay any charge, royalty, or rental for the use of patents on pipe, based on the number of machines used in manufacturing such pipe;

(j) to sell any machine, mechanical device or other property, the sale of which to such other party has either been consummated, or, if not consummated, has been initiated by a person other than the granting or disclosing defendant, at the direction of, or only after first offering it to, any defendant, or only to specified persons;

(k) to assign only upon the consent of any person other than the licensor or only as an appurtenance to other property not related to the use of any such license or immunity.

[Restrictive Contracts Enjoined]

VI

The defendants are severally and jointly restrained from entering into, executing, maintaining or adhering to any contract, agreement, understanding or arrangement, directly or indirectly, with any manufacturer of pipe;

(a) to control, restrict, or allocate the production or distribution of pipe;

(b) to allocate customers, markets or fields for the manufacture, sale or distribution of pipe in the United States, its territories or possessions;

(c) to prohibit or restrict the sale of pipe for export from or import into the United States, its territories or possessions;

(d) to restrict or attempt to restrict the manufacture of pipe to any specified standards, sizes, grades or qualities;

(e) to assign exclusive rights to patents, not in existence at the time of assignment, relating to the production of pipe;

(f) to provide for the inspection of any records, files or other documents and papers of any manufacturer of pipe, except that an independent public accountant may be employed for the purpose of determining amounts of royalties or rentals due.

[Dissolution Ordered]

VII

Defendant Sand Spun is ordered to be dissolved within sixty (60) days from the date of entry of this judgment. There shall within ten (10) days after such dissolution be delivered to the Court, after notice to the Attorney General, adequate proof of such dissolution.

[Dedication of Patents Ordered]

VIII

Defendant Sand Spun is hereby ordered and directed to dedicate to the public, withing thirty (30) days from the date of entry of this judgment, all of the Sand Spun patents listed in Exhibit A.

[For Purposes of Compliance]

IX

For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment and for no other purpose, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, upon written request of the Attorney General or an Assistant Attorney General, and upon reasonable notice to any defendant herein made to the principal office of such defendant be permitted, subject to any legally recognized privilege, (1) access during the office hours of said defendant to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of said defendant, relating to any of the matters contained in this judgment, and (2) subject to the reasonable convenience of said defendant and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers or employees of such defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding such matters. Upon written request of the Attorney General, or an Assistant Attorney General, on reasonable notice to any defendant herein made to its principal office, such defendant shall submit such reports as might from time to time be reasonably necessary to the enforcement of this judgment. No information obtained by the means provided in this Section shall be divulged by the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Department of Justice except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment or as otherwise required by law.

X

Jurisdiction of this action is retained by this Court for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this judgment to apply to the Court at any time for, and for the Court to make, such further orders or directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment, for the modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, or for the enforcement of compliance therewith, and for punishment of violations thereof.

Final Judgment

Henry W. Goddard, District Judge: Plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint herein on December 18, 1945; all defendants except defendant Scophony, Limited having severally filed answers to the complaint denying the substantive allegations thereof; defendants, Scophony Corporation of American, General Precision Equipment Corporation and Television Productions, Inc., having severally consented to the entry on January 12, 1949 of a final judgment herein; the complaint herein having been dismissed on stipulation and order duly filed and entered on January 12, 1949 as against defendants Arthur Levey, Earle G. Hines and Paul Raibourn; defendant Scophony, Limited having unsuccessfully moved to dismiss this action and to quash service of process as to it for lack of jurisdiction over said defendant herein; defendant Scophony Limited being now in all respects in default herein; defendant Scophony, Limited being the only defendant as to whom this action is now pending; and defendant Scophony, Limited having consented to the entry of this final judgment without admission by said defendant with respect to any issue of fact or law,

Now, therefore, no testimony or evidence having been taken herein except the deposition of W. G. Elcock by plaintiff used on the motion of defendant Scophony, Limited, hereinabove mentioned, and without any trial or finding or adjudication of any issue of law or fact herein, and upon consent of plaintiff United States of America and defendant Scophony, Limited.

It is hereby ordered, adjudged and decreed:

[Jurisdiction]

I

That this Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this action and of the parties thereto; and that the complaint states a cause of action under Sections 1 and 2 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890 entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies" and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto.

[Applicability of Provisions]

II

That the provisions of this judgment applicable to defendant Scophony, Limited shall apply with equal force to its successors and assigns, its directors, officers, agents, representatives or employees, and to any person or corporation acting or with authority to act under, through, or for such defendant.

[Agreements Terminated]

III

That the following licenses and agreements and all amendments, modifications, or supplements of the same, having heretofore been terminated and cancelled as to defendants Scophony Corporation of America, General Precision Equipment Corporation and Television Productions, Inc. are hereby terminated and cancelled as to defendant Scophony, Limited as of December 18, 1945, and said defendant is hereby enjoined and restrained from the performance, observance or enforcement of any of the terms or provisions thereof, and from directly or indirectly adopting, adhering to or furthering any course of conduct for the purpose or with the effect of maintaining, reviving, or reinstating the terms and provisions of said licenses and agreements:

A. Agreement dated July 31, 1942, between Scophony, Limited, William George Elcock, General Precision Equipment Corporation, and Television Productions, Inc., a copy of which is annexed to the complaint herein as Exhibit 1;

B. Agreement dated August 11, 1942, between Scophony, Limited, William George Elcock and Scophony Corporation of America, a copy of which is annexed to the complaint herein as Exhibit 2;

C. Agreement dated August 11, 1942, between Scophony Corporation of America, General Precision Equipment Corporation and Television Products, Inc., a copy of which is annexed to the complaint herein as Exhibit 3.

[Acts Enjoined]

IV

That defendant Scophony, Limited is hereby enjoined and restrained from entering into, adhering to, maintaining or furthering, directly or indirectly, any agreement, combination, plan or program with defendants Scophony Corporation of America, General Precision Equipment Corporation, and Television Productions, Inc. or any of them:

(a) To allocate, divide or restrict territories, customers, or markets for the manufacture, use or distribution of processes, products, apparatus or installations for, or relating to television;

(b) To exclude any person from or to restrict or limit any person in the manufacture, use or distribution of any process, invention, product, apparatus or installation for, or relating to television;

(c) To limit, restrict or prevent the importation into, or exportation from the United States, its territories or possessions, of any process, invention, product, apparatus or installation for, or relating to television;

(d) To refrain from competition or to leave any person free from competition in any territory or market in the manufacture, use or distribution of processes, products, inventions, apparatus or installations for, or relating to television;

(e) To exchange exclusively among said defendants, or any of them, patent licenses or technical information with respect to the manufacture, use or distribution of any process, product, invention, apparatus or installation for, or relating to television.

[Dispossession of Ownership]

V

(A) That defendant Scophony, Limited divest itself of any and all stock or ownership interests in defendant Scophony Corporation of America as soon as possible, but in no event to exceed two years from the date of this judgment. During said period, defendant Scophony, Limited shall submit to the Attorney General a report every six months setting forth in detail the efforts made by it to dispose of said stock and ownership interests.

(B) That defendant Scophony, Limited be enjoined and restrained from directly or indirectly:

(a) Acquiring any stock or ownership in defendant Scophony Corporation of America;

(b) Having any officer, director, representative, agent or employee who is at the same time an officer, director, representative, agent or employee of defendant Scophony Corporation of America;

(c) Dominating, controlling or interfering with, or attempting to dominate, control, or interfere with, the business, financial or promotional policies, practices, operation, management, expansion or other activities of defendant Scophony Corporation of America.

[For Purposes of Compliance]

VI

For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, and for no other purpose, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, on written request of the Attorney General, or an Assistant Attorney General, and on reasonable notice to defendant Scophony, Limited be permitted, subject to any legally recognized privilege, (a) reasonable access, during the office hours of said defendant to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of said defendant relating to any matters contained in this judgment, and (b) subject to the reasonable convenience of said defendant, and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers or employees of said defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters. For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, and for no other purpose, said defendant, upon the written request of the Attorney General, or an Assistant Attorney General, shall submit such reports with respect to any of the matters contained in this judgment as may from time to time be necessary for the purpose of enforcement of this judgment. No information obtained by the means permitted in this Section shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of such Department, except in the course of legal proceedings in which the United States is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, or as otherwise required by law.

[Jurisdiction Retained]

VII

Jurisdiction of this action is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this judgment to apply to the Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment, or the modification thereof, or the enforcement of compliance therewith and for punishment of violations thereof.

[¶ 62,464] Reynolds Metals Co. v. Metals Disintegrating Co. Inc.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. No. 9840. Argued March 25, 1949. Decided June 27, 1949.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Illegal Contracts—Enforcement of Agreements Contrary to Public Policy.—New Jersey law does not permit a court to afford relief to either party upon a contract void as against public policy and the antitrust laws. An aluminum manufacturer who, upon offer of an amendment to the contract curing such illegality, rejected the proposed change because it did not also contain provisions for repayment to him of royalties supposedly collected illegally thereunder, is thus denied the aid of the court in procuring such a result.

Illegal Contracts—Reformation of Illegal Contracts—Parties in Pari Delicto.— A manufacturer of metal products who asks the court for reformation to cure the illegality of a license contract whereunder he manufactures patented products, and for return of royalty payments made by him pursuant to the illegal provisions thereof, is held to be in pari delicto and is denied such relief where it appears that he cooperated with the patentee in the original drawing up of those provisions and continued to operate thereunder for some time after the Supreme Court had declared such provisions illegal, before he called the patentee's attention to the defect and requested an amendment thereto

See the Sherman Antitrust Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.503.

Federal Civil Procedure—Pre-Trial Practice—Motion to Delete Sham Allegations.— Motions, supported by affidavits, which seek the deletion of certain allegations of an opponent argued to be sham pleadings, should not lead to adjudication of the truth or falsity of those allegations in pre-trial proceedings, since to do so would lead beyond the mere clarification and fixing of the issues, which is the proper scope of such practice.

See the Sherman Antitrust Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.616, 1640.619.

For the appellant: Raymond F. Adams, New York City.

For the appellee: James D. Carpenter, Jersey City, N. J.

Affirming a decision of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, 8 F. R. D. 349.

Before MARIS, O'CONNELL and KALODNER, Circuit Judges.

Opinion of the Court

O'CONNELL, J., Circuit Judge: The instant complaint seeks reformation of a license agreement between plaintiff ("Reynolds") and defendant ("Metals Disintegrating") and the refund to Reynolds of certain royalty payments made in connection therewith to Metals Disintegrating. After extensive and prolonged pretrial proceedings at which all the available information was stated to have been adduced, the court below granted the motion of Metals Disintegrating to dismiss the complaint as legally insufficient. 8 F. R. D. 349 (D. C. N. J., 1948). Both litigants have expressed the desire that the record on this appeal be treated as though it had been made at trial rather than in the preparatory stages of the case.

Diversity of citizenship being the basis of federal jurisdiction here, we refer to the law of New Jersey wherever applicable. Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U. S. 64 (1938).

[Facts]

The pertinent facts may be briefly summarized. In 1934, Reynolds began the installation of a ball mill for the manufacture of flake aluminum powder and paste. This activity led Metals Disintegrating, holder of patents involving like products, to file in 1938 a suit charging patent infringement. Negotiations ensued, during the course of which several drafts of licenses were presented for the consideration of Reynolds. That to which Reynolds eventually agreed, in 1939, included provisions purporting to fix the price and limit the sublicensing of dry aluminum bronze powder, which was unpatented.

In 1946, Reynolds advised Metals Disintegrating that this price-fixing attempt was apparently in violation of the anti-trust laws. Metals Disintegrating thereupon offered an amendment calculated to cure that defect. Rejecting the proposed change because there was no allowance made for rebate of what Reynolds deemed to have been improperly paid royalties, Reynolds filed the complaint at bar.

The district judge, after candidly noting his disagreement with the views we expressed in Frederick Hart & Co. v. Recordgraph Corporation, 169 F. 2d 580 (C. A. 3, 1948), nevertheless decided in conformance with that opinion and refused to strike the instant complaint as sham. He further found, however, that the contract was not severable and that the illegality of that price-fixing provision permeated the contract as a whole, and also that neither contracting party could obtain equitable relief because both were in pari delicto. He thereupon ordered judgment in favor of Metals Disintegrating.

[Purpose of Pre-Trial Practice]

The comments of the learned district judge directed to the advantages of permitting a "speaking motion," whereby a litigant might obtain the involuntary deletion of an allegation by his opponent through the medium of a motion reinforced by affidavits, merit an answer by us. He has ably presented the view contrary to that which we recognized as correct in the Frederick Hart case, supra, and to which we adhere. It seems to us that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure were designed to facilitate correlation, and not duplication, between the pre-trial and trial proceedings. If the truth or falsity of allegations in pleadings may be adjudicated in advance of a trial through the technique of filing affidavits, it is to be expected that eventually the courts will have to develop pre-pre-trial procedures; for pre-trial proceedings such as those favored by the court below are likely to inspire all too many carefully-drafted written statements escaping the clarifying processes of cross-examination and delaying prompt disposition of cases. We are satisfied that pre-trial proceedings are intended to determine what the issues are, and not to invade the trial function of resolving those issues. The rule limiting the scope of motions to strike pleadings as sham, as exemplified in Bates v. Clark, 95 U. S. 204, 205-206 (1877) is, we think, a salutary one which Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure reflected rather than altered. Consequently, we reiterate the position we expressed in the Frederick Hart opinion. See Andrews v. Heinzman, 9 F. R. D. 7, 9 (D. C. Neb. 1949).

We proceed, then, to the question whether, under the circumstances here presented, we can say as a matter of law that Reynolds is entitled to the relief requested, for, as we have stated, Reynolds affirmatively has asked that we review the material before us as though it had been adduced at a trial on the merits. We hold that the district judge did not commit reversible error.

[Parties in Pari Delicto]

Whether Reynolds or Metals Disintegrating was the father of the idea that the price of the dry powder be fixed cannot be definitely ascertained from the record before us. The conclusion of the court below that the parties collaborated in inserting that provision in the agreement, however, is amply supported by the evidence; and it is not inapposite to note that several years elapsed between the handing down of the Ethyl Gasoline Corp. v. United States decision, 309 U. S. 436 (1940) and the questioning of the price-fixing provision by the undoubtedly competent legal staff of Reynolds. We are not disposed to challenge the finding that the litigants at bar are in pari delicto.

It necessarily follows that the relief here requested by Reynolds cannot be granted. The law of New Jersey is perfectly clear that, with exceptions not here pertinent,[1] the courts will not assist either party to an illegal contract, but will leave them where it finds them. See Restatement, Contracts (1932 ed.), Ch. 18, Topic 12, particularly § 598 and New Jersey annotations thereto, cited in Carhart v. Lapetina, 137 N. J. L. 531, 61 A. 2d 49 (1948). Reynolds admits having rejected an amendment of the license which would have eliminated the illegal provision, because Reynolds thought some adjustment of past royalty payments should also be made; we fail to see any cogent public interest that the courts be used as a vehicle for permitting Reynolds to recover such payments made pursuant to a contract inimical to the spirit of legislation for public protection, when in fact Reynolds received that for which it contracted and when the evidence of negotiations indicates that Reynolds, rather than being squeezed by economic compulsion, has maintained a vigorous bargaining position.

[Judgment Affirmed]

Without detailing other factual conclusions of the court below, the reversal of which would be necessary for Reynolds to prevail upon this appeal, we need only state that our examination of the record persuades us that Reynolds has failed to prove its case. The judgment of the district court on the record before it was correct and will be affirmed.

[1] The exception on which Reynolds has placed reliance is that enunciated in McCarter v. Firemen's Ins. Co., 74 N. J. Eq. 372, 389, 73 Atl. 80, 87 (1909) and Cameron v. International Alliance, Etc., 118 N. J. Eq. 11, 20, 176 Atl. 692, 697 (1935). The latter and other similar cases are cited at § 601 of the New Jersey Annotations. Refusal to rescind the license under consideration was not shown by Reynolds, other than by bare allegation, to be likely to produce a harmful effect upon the public.

[¶ 62,465] Opinion of the Attorney General of Minnesota.

Addressed to E. T. McEvoy, County Attorney, Ivanhoe, Minnesota, by J. A. A. Burnquist, Attorney General, Victor J. Michaelson, Special Assistant Attorney General. July 20, 1949.

Minnesota Unfair Trade Practices Act

Unfair Trade Practices—Cooperative Sales Promotion Plans—Gifts not Conditioned on Purchases.—An arrangement between a retail store operator and a general photographer, by the terms of which the photographer makes pictures of children in the retail store on a certain day and gives free copies to the parents, in a cooperative attempt to stimulate both businesses, where the gift of the picture is not conditioned upon the purchase of any item in the store, is considered not to be violative of the Minnesota Unfair Trade Practices Act when it does not appear that there is an intent to injure competitors.

See the Minnesota Unfair Trade Practices Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8428.30.

Your letter of July 19th recites these

Facts

"'A' is a retail merchant in Minnesota; 'B', a resident of Iowa, is engaged in the business of general photography. 'A' and 'B' enter into an agreement whereby 'B' takes pictures of all infants brought into 'A's' store on a particular day, and 'B' gives a free picture to the parents of such children. This picture is given free and without obligation. The only consideration moving toward 'B' is the opportunity to make additional sales of pictures, but without any obligation on the part of the parents of the children. The purpose of the arrangement is to stimulate traffic through 'A's' store and thus increase business. There is no direct evidence that the arrangement is for the purpose or with the intent of injuring competitors or destroying competition."

and presents this

Question

"It would be appreciated if you would give me your opinion as to whether or not such an arrangement is in violation of Section No. 325.04, Minnesota Statutes."

It does not appear from the facts stated that the proposed arrangement is to be carried on with the intent or purpose of injuring the competitors or destroying the competition of Mr. "B".

In order to sustain a conviction under the above statute, it would be necessary to establish, by evidence, that the purpose or effect of the proposed arrangement was for the purpose or with the intent of injuring competitors and destroying competition.

We enclose [omitted herein] copy of Attorney General's opinion of August 23, 1948, in which a similar question was considered.

Appeal from the decree of the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Motion Picture Film Distributors—Monopolization of Showings—Injunction—Modification of Decree—Burden of Proving Compliance.—An injunction issued in a private equity suit prohibiting monopolization of first-run showings of motion pictures and requiring that complainant be given an opportunity to inspect and negotiate for such films, is ordered to be modified to give more finality to those rights to negotiate, and to place on the defendant motion picture distributors and exhibitors the burden of proving their compliance with the terms of the decree.

Modifying a decree of the United States District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania, 81 Fed. Supp. 212; reported at ¶ 62,384.

For the appellant: Joseph W. Henderson, Philadelphia, Pa.

For the appellees: Bernard Segal, Philadelphia, Pa.

Before BIGGS, Chief Judge, and McLAUGHLIN and O'CONNELL, Circuit Judges.

Opinion of the Court

McLAUGHLIN, Circuit Judge: In this matter by our opinion in 169 F. 2d 317, we found that the appellees had conspired against appellant in violation of the Sherman and Clayton Acts. We left the form of the decree to the Court below. A decree was entered in the District Court on December 13, 1948. The form of that decree gives rise to this appeal.

[Decree Appealed from]

By its first paragraph, the decree states that the existence of the monopoly, of the conspiracies and attempts to bring it about "and the contracts, combinations and agreements of the defendants, among themselves or with others, resulting in such monopoly and in the restraint of interstate trade and commerce as found by the Court are declared to be illegal and are enjoined * * *." Paragraph 2 then goes on to more specifically enjoin the appellees from:

> "(a) Monopolizing or attempting to monopolize the exhibition of feature motion pictures on first run in the Borough of Ambridge, or from entering into, engaging in or consummating, directly or indirectly, expressly or impliedly, by means of discrimination in prices and terms, or by any other means or device, any such monopolization or any such restraint of interstate trade or commerce.
> "(b) Enforcing, continuing, performing or acting under any provisions in existing contracts or license agreements between the distributors-defendants and the exhibitor-defendants having the effect of such monopolization, and entering into, executing or performing, directly or indirectly, expressly or impliedly, any provisions in any other such license agreements, franchise or arrangements whatsoever having the same effect.
> "(c) Conspiring to protect or perpetuate any such monopoly in the exhibition of motion pictures on the first run in the Borough of Ambridge, or such restraint of, or agreement or conspiracy to restrain such interstate trade, or commerce in motion pictures, or entering into, engaging in, accomplishing or consummating, directly or indirectly, expressly or impliedly, and agreements or conspiracies having the effect of illegality.
> "(d) Licensing their feature motion pictures for first run performance in the Borough of Ambridge to any one or more of the defendants without giving plaintiff an opportunity to inspect and negotiate for said pictures equal to and in all respects the same as the opportunity afforded any other exhibitor."

[Decree Defective in Lacking Finality]

Appellant complains that the language of 2 (d) fails of its purpose because there is no finality to it, i. e., appellant is merely given the equal opportunity "to inspect and negotiate" for the pictures in question without any provision that he have the same equal opportunity to actually obtain the pictures. The contention is obviously meritorious. The Court below will be directed to modify paragraph 2 (d) of the decree so that it will read as follows:

> "(d) Licensing their feature motion pictures for first run performance in the Borough of Ambridge to any one or more of the defendants without giving plaintiff an opportunity to inspect, negotiate for and obtain said pictures equal to and in all respects the same as the opportunity afforded any other exhibitor."

Appellant urges that a new clause should be inserted in the decree in order to protect the playing position of the Penn Theatre with particular reference to the time for the showing in Ambridge of the pictures in question after the latter have been exhibited in Pittsburgh. Appellant is entitled to fair protection in this respect and any future change of playing position should be at the direction of the Court. Therefore the Court below will be directed to add a new sub-paragraph to paragraph 2 of the decree, to read as follows:

"(e) From impairing, reducing or changing the playing position of the Penn Theatre which prevailed as of April 30, 1944, until the further order of the Court."

[Burden of Showing Compliance not Unreasonable]

Appellant also suggests that there should be a provision in the decree placing the burden of proving compliance with its terms upon the appellees. This is strenuously opposed by the appellees who maintain that the mere entry of the decree assures appellant of the relief to which he is entitled. While there may be considerable to that argument, we are interested primarily in seeing to it that the decree really works out in practical fashion as intended. Subject to appeal on the merits, the issue here has been determined and we are desirous of eliminating as far as possible, any excuse for unnecessary, harassing litigation by either side. Having appellees establish compliance with the decree will be of substantial help to that end. This will cause no undue hardship to appellees. Indeed, it can be far more easily and satisfactorily accomplished by them than by appellant. Within their own organization, nationwide statics are readily available concerning film rentals and other comparative picture and theatre data. Most of such special knowledge would be difficult if not impossible for appellant to obtain. The procedure indicated finds strong support in United States v. Paramount, 334 U. S. 131. In that case, with respect to clearances, the Expediting Court had put the burden of sustaining the legality of any clearance provision when attacked, upon the distributor. The Supreme Court in upholding this, said at page 148:

"To place on the distributor the burden of showing their reasonableness is to place it on the one party in the best position to evaluate their competitive efforts. Those who have shown such a marked proclivity for unlawful conduct are in no position to complain that they carry the burden of showing that their future clearances come within the law."

Though there is little, if any, question of clearance before us at this time, the analogy is very close and the reasons the appellees should here have the burden of showing compliance are identical with those given by the Supreme Court in the Paramount opinion, supra, for placing the burden on the distributor of showing the legality of clearance. Accordingly, the Court below will be directed to add a new paragraph 3 to the decree which will read:

"3. In any proceeding instituted by plaintiff in connection with the alleged violation of this decree in the future at any time by any of the defendants, the burden of proving compliance with the terms of the decree shall be upon the defendants."

The present paragraph 3 of the decree reads:

"This decree is final, but jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling any party to move to modify any of the provisions of this decree other than those relating to damages or counsel fees."

The language in that paragraph referring to damages or counsel fees is inept as there is no other mention in the decree, of such items. The Court below will be directed to change the paragraph number of this paragraph from 3 to 4 and to modify the paragraph to read:

"4. This decree is final, but jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enforcing this decree or of enabling any party to move to modify any of the provisions of this decree."

The Court below will be directed to renumber the present paragraph 4 as paragraph 5.

As modified in the above respects, the decree should give appellant the protection contemplated by our opinion, supra. There is no present need therefore, or passing upon appellant's remaining suggestions regarding the decree.

[Remanded for Modification]

The decree below will be vacated to the extent indicated by this opinion and the case will be remanded to the District Court with directions to modify the decree as outlined in this opinion.

[¶ 62,467] Bordonaro Bros. Theatres, Inc., v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., et al.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. No. 227, October Term, 1948. Argued May 12, 1949. Decided August 9, 1949.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Western District of New York.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Proof of Conspiracy—Prima Facie Case—Province of Jury.—A showing of the relative merits as to size, location and facilities of two theatres, between which there is alleged to be discrimination pursuant to a conspiracy in the awarding of first-run film leases, and introduction of evidence of negotiations between the plaintiff exhibitor and the defendant distributors for such first-run films, where plaintiff's competitor was wholly owned by one of the defendants, make out a prima facie case of unlawful conspiracy sufficient to take the case to the jury over the motions of defendants. The relativity of advantages between the two theatres is a factual issue and a decision thereon is a proper function of the jury. The fact that one of the defendants had favored plaintiff's competitor even before the alleged conspiracy, and that its policies did not, during the conspiracy, coincide with those of the other defendants, does not indicate lack of evidence justifying the removal of the case from the jury, but rather presents questions for the decision of the jury.

See the Sherman Antitrust Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.431.

Proof of Conspiracy—Province of Jury—Quantum of Proof of Inferences.—When more than one inference of fact can be drawn reasonably from the proof adduced in a case, it is for the jury to determine which one shall be accepted, and the rule which places upon the plaintiff the overall burden of proving his whole case does not mean that the inference argued for by him need be more thoroughly proved than the other, provided both are reasonable. Since conspiracy, if well planned and operating effectively, can seldom be proved by direct evidence, reliance must be had upon the reasonable inferences drawn from the conduct of the alleged conspirators in the light of the circumstances surrounding their actions.

See the Sherman Antitrust Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.431, 1610.316.

Private Damage Suits—Procedure and Pleadings—Inconsistency and Variance Objections not Tenable.—Inconsistency between two verdicts—one defendant being acquitted and a judgment being entered against the other—is not a valid objection to the judgment, since the question on review is not whether one verdict is consistent with the other, but whether the verdict is consistent with the evidence. Further, the objection of variance between pleadings and proof, and the judgment, is not received favorably unless the variance is harmful in tending to mislead the defendant as to the nature of the case he must defend. Defendants cannot claim they have been misled when a treble damage suit is brought in the wake of, and in an atmosphere of monopoly the same as in the prior government action against them.

See the Sherman Antitrust Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1630.614.

[Syllabus]

Action by Bordonaro Bros. Theatres, Inc., against Paramount Pictures, Inc., Warner Bros. Circuit Management Corporation, RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., and others for treble damages and other relief for violation of the antitrust laws, 15 U. S. C. A. § 1 et seq., injuring plaintiff in its operation of the Palace theatre in Olean, New York. From a verdict of $28,500 and resulting judgment of $85,500, plus costs and attorneys' fess of $18,998.44, for the plaintiff against defendants Paramount Pictures, Inc., and Warner Bros. Circuit Management Corporation, they appeal. From a judgment setting aside a verdict against RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed on the appeal of defendants Paramount Pictures, Inc., and Warner Bros. Circuit Management Corporation. Reversed on plaintiff's appeal and remanded for the entry of an appropriate judgment on the verdict against RKO Radio Pictures, Inc.

[Nature of Action]

CLARK, Circuit Judge: This is a treble-damage action under the antitrust laws, 15 U. S. C. A. §§ 1, 2, 15, by an independent motion picture exhibitor brought originally against thirteen defendants, including major companies engaged, with their subsidiaries and affiliates, in one or more of the various phases of the production, distribution, and exhibition of motion pictures. It comes in the wake of the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court upholding lower court findings of a nationwide conspiracy to restrain competition in and to monopolize the distribution and exhibition of motion pictures by the named defendants. United States v. Paramount Pictures, 334 U. S. 131; and see also Schine Chain Theatres v. United States, 334 U. S. 110; United States v. Griffith, 334 U. S. 100. The central issue here, as in our recent case of Fifth and Walnut, Inc. v. Loew's Inc., 2 Cir., July 19, 1949, is whether the admitted inability of plaintiffs to obtain first-run [1] films for their theatre sprang from a conspiracy to exclude them from the first-run field or whether it was the natural result of independent business judgments as to the relative value of their exhibition facilities.

[Facts]

Since 1922 the City of Olean, New York, has been offered its motion picture fare in two first-run theatres, the Palace and the Haven. A second-run theatre, known as the Gem, and later as the State, is also available. The Palace Theatre has been owned and operated by the Bordonaro family, first as a partnership and later as a corporation, for some thirty years. Until 1930 the Haven theatre was independently owned and operated, and from 1922 to 1930 the two theatres were operated jointly under a local pooling agreement. The agreement was terminated in 1930, and the Haven became a member of the Warner chain. It was leased to Intrastate Theatre Corporation, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc., and operated by Warner Bros. Circuit Management Corporation, another wholly-owned subsidiary and one of the appellants here. Immediately after this transfer, the Haven became the exclusive first-run outlet for Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc., Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation, United Artists Corporation, Loew's Incorporated, Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, and Universal Corporation films, and since 1931 for Paramount Pictures, Inc., as well. At various times since 1930, Loew's, Fox, and Universal began to divide their product equally between the Haven and the Palace, although plaintiff alleged that its contract contained discriminatory features. During the period complained of, plaintiff obtained none of the product of Warner, Paramount, RKO, or United Artists, and, on allegedly discriminatory terms, half the product of Loew's, Fox, and Universal, and all of the product of Columbia Pictures Corporation (not a defendant).

This action was begun in September, 1946. The complaint was dismissed as to certain of the defendants by stipulation before trial, and as to others by the court at the close of the plaintiff's case. The jury returned verdicts in favor of several of the remaining defendants, leaving in the case only Paramount Pictures, Inc., which itself and through its subsidiaries and affiliates produces, distributes, and exhibits films on a nation wide basis; RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., a distributor subsidiary of Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation, which is also a producer, distributor, and exhibitor for the national market; and Warner Bros. Circuit Management Corporation. Against these three defendants the jury return a verdict of $28,500. The court denied motions by Paramount and Warner to set aside the verdict and entered judgment against them for the damages trebled to the figure of $85,500, for attorneys' fees of $18,000, and for costs of $998.44. It did, however, set aside the verdict against RKO. Defendants Paramount and Warner appeal from the judgment against them, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment in favor of RKO.

[1] "Runs are successive exhibitions of a feature in a given area, first-run being the first exhibition in that area, second-run being the next subsequent, and so on, and include successive exhibitions in different theatres, even though such theatres may be under a common ownership or management." United States v. Paramount Pictures, 334 U. S. 131, 144, note 6.

[Evidence Adduced at Trial]

To prove its case plaintiff at the trial introduced a considerable mass of evidence on the relative merits, past and present, of the Palace and Haven theatres, and on the negotiations between plaintiff and the major distributors, including defendants Paramount and RKO, with regard to the distribution of first-run features. This appears to us well-designed to support a prima facie case and carry the issues beyond the defendants' motions to the jury. Obviously a conspiracy such as was here charged rarely can be proved by direct evidence from the participating parties themselves; reliance must be had upon the reasonable inferences drawn from their conduct in the light of the surrounding circumstances. Here plainiff relied primarily upon a showing of the superior facilities afforded by the Palace over the Haven theatre in location, size, and equipment, the denial by these defendants of their products to the plaintiff, and the consequent poor showing in comparison of the Palace with the smaller Haven theatre. There was supplementary evidence of various kinds, including the showing of some leniency to plaintiff's theatre on the part of certain defendants at the very time only of disputes among themselves, the endeavors to draw plaintiff into their operations on various terms, and the statements of certain agents at various times as to the difficulties and disadvantages of independent operation of movie theatres. This evidence did not apply to all the defendants or cover all the period involved, but it was submitted to the jury for the latter's evaluation under a correct charge. True, the defendants sharply controverted this view and presented evidence to show that the Haven was the more desirable theatre. But it is hard to see what function the jury is to serve in these trials if it is not to be permitted to evaluate just this kind of evidence.

Defendants, in urging that the jury should not have been permitted to draw the inferences of combined and concerted action against plaintiff which it obviously did, state a standard of proof which we have rejected even in criminal cases. Where more than one inference can reasonably be drawn from the proof, it is for the jury to determine the proper one; the burden of proof of the entire case resting upon the plaintiff does not mean that the court should so far encroach upon the province of the jury as to require that one inference should be more thoroughly proven than another if both are reasonable and rational. United States v. Spagnuolo, 2 Cir., 168 F. 2d 768, certiorari denied Spagnuolo v. United States, 335 U. S. 824, and cases cited therein; United States v. Sherman, 2 Cir., 171 F. 2d 619, 621. So evidence tending to show that an independent exhibitor, operating a theatre at least as desirable as the theatres of the exhibitors affiliated with the major concerns, was refused first-run films for exhibition was held to make out a prima facie case under the antitrust laws in Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, 327 U. S. 251. Cf. William Goldman Theatres v. Loew's, Inc., 3 Cir., 150 F. 2d 738. Here the additional evidence as to the sales policies of the distributor defendants and their attempt to buy out plaintiff served to strengthen plaintiff's case, at least to the extent that the jury believed it.

Damages in such a situation necessarily cannot be assessed with mathematical precision; but the testimony of plaintiff's expert witness, Samuelson, "while purely an estimate and introduced as such, was proof of a kind as definite and certain as the subject-matter admitted." William H. Rankin Co. v. Associated Bill Posters of U. S. and Canada, 2 Cir., 42 F. 2d 152, 155, certiorari denied Associated Bill Posters of U. S. and Canada v. William H. Rankin Co., 282 U. S. 864. Defendants must not be allowed to create their own immunity by the extent and duration of their conspiracy.

[Jury's Finding Held Reasonable]

Defendants object that the jury verdict and judgment against them is inconsistent with the verdict in favor of other defendant distributors, and that it constitutes a fatal variance between the pleadings and proof, and the judgment. But "the question on review should not be whether the verdict against the corporations is consistent with the acquittal. * * * Rather it should be whether the conviction is consistent with the evidence." United States v. General Motors Corp., 7 Cir., 121 F. 2d 376, 411, certiorari denied General Motors Corp. v. United States, 314 U. S. 618; cf. United States v. Austin-Bagley Corp., 2 Cir., 31 F. 2d 229, 233, certiorari denied Austin-Bagley Corp. v. United States, 279 U. S. 863. And we cannot say that a jury verdict against all the defendants remaining in the case at the time it was submitted to the jury would have been inconsistent with the evidence. As a practical matter the choice made by the jury, far from being strange, may be viewed as showing discriminating scrutiny of the evidence, in the light of the differences in conduct of the defendants pointed out above. Nor does there seem any substance in the technical objection of variance. This objection is certainly not favored in modern law; in any event it is harmless unless it serves to mislead an opponent. See Clark on Code Pleading, 739, 740, 2d ed. 1947. It is difficult to see how these defendants could have been misled, in the light of the background furnished by the Paramount case, supra, since the conspiracies clearly developed out of a general atmosphere of monopoly and restraint of competition. Even a single vertical conspiracy between Paramount, as a distributor, and Warner, as an exhibitor, would scarcely be outside the scope of the pleadings and proof, against such a background. By contrast, the variance held to be fatal in Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U. S. 750, a criminal case, involved an indictment charging thirty-two defendants with participation in a single general conspiracy, and proof of thirty-two quite separate and independent conspiracies. As we observed in United States v. Austin-Bagley Corp., supra, 31 F. 2d at page 233, "it is not a variance to fail to convict all those indicted, though strictly the agreement laid is then not the agreement proved."

In what we have just said, we have considered the case as it was submitted to the jury. Moreover, since we think the judge was in error in setting aside the verdict against RKO we have no occasion to consider the objections of these defendants to the judgment against them after RKO's removal from the case. In his memorandum the judge thought the evidence against RKO insufficient because RKO did not change its policy of preference for the Haven theatre with the advent of Warner Bros. into the exhibition field in Olean and the choice of theatres was a debatable question about which distributors might reasonably differ and further because RKO's policy did not coincide with any uniform selling policy of other distributors. But what happened under the original pooling agreement does not seeem too relevant for the later history; and, however single may RKO's policy have appeared (in this one instance as compared to its usual co-operation noted in the Supreme Court cases), it did amount in net consequence to that of the others. It appears to us that the judge has recounted factors appropriate for the jury to consider, but not for taking the case from the jury. The existence of an agreement in restraint of competition is always difficult to prove. As the agreement becomes established, not only is its operation better concealed, but its effects are more and more difficult to disentangle from the effects of business hazards outside the scope of the antitrust law. Knowing that a conspiracy to monopolize the first-run exhibition of motion pictures existed during the period in suit, and realizing also that certain theatres are necessarily better adapted for first-run showings, judges should be most circumspect in overturning a jury verdict including or excluding a particular theatre from the scope of the conspiracy.

[Judgment Affirmed and Verdict Ordered Reinstated]

Upon the appeal of defendants Paramount Pictures, Inc., and Warner Bros. Circuit Management Corporation, the judgment is affirmed. Upon the plaintiff's appeal, the judgment in favor of RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., is reversed and the action is remanded to the district court for the reinstatement of the verdict against that defendant and for the entry of such judgment as may be appropriate in the light of that reinstatement.

In the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Civil Action No. 3670-48. May 24, 1949.

Communications Act

Agency Agreement between Telephone and Telegraph Companies—Lessening of Competition—Antitrust Violation not Established.—The Court refused the request of a national labor union representing affected employees to annul an order of the Federal Communications Commission which granted the application of a telegraph company for authority to discontinue operation of certain offices and to substitute an agency office to be operated by the respective local telephone company operating in each community. It was held that the arrangement between telegraph and telephone companies did not constitute a merger nor did it establish a restraint of trade. While there may be some lessening of competition, such result was not in itself prohibited by the Sherman and Clayton Acts.

See the monopoly provisions of the Communications Act, ¶ 682.

For the plaintiff: Harry L. Isikoff and Frank Bloom, both of Washington, D. C.

For the defendant: Wm. B. Hickey, Department of Justice; Max Goldman and Edwin S. Smith, both of the Federal Communications Commission.

Before PRETTYMAN, Circuit Judge, and HOLTZOFF and TAMM, District Judges.

TAMM, J.: Plaintiff, a national labor union representing affected employees, brings this action to set aside, annul and permanently enjoin the enforcement of an Order and Authorization adopted by the Federal Communications Commission on May 27, 1948 and issued on June 7, 1948, which Order and Authorization granted an application of the Western Union Telegraph Company for authority under § 214 of the Communications Act of 1934 [1] to discontinue its operation of six Class 1-B telegraph offices, and to substitute in lieu of Western Union operation, an agency office to be operated by the respective local telephone company operating in each community. The intervenor-defendant, The Western Union Telegraph Company, is a corporation engaged in furnishing public telegraph communication in the six communities in Ohio which are involved in this application, as well as at various points throughout the United States and in some foreign countries.

[Jurisdiction of Court]

The jurisdiction of this Court rests on the provisions of Section 402 (a) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended,[2] incorporating therein certain provisions of the Urgent Deficiencies Act of October 22, 1913 [3] relating to the enforcing and setting aside of the Orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission and Title 28, United States, Code, Sections 1398, 2284 and 2321-2325 revising, reenacting and codifying certain provisions of said Act of October 22, 1913.

[Pertinent Statutes]

The statutes involved are Section 214 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended by Public No. 4, 205; 78th Congress, 1st Session, approved March 6, 1943; 57 Stat. 11, 12,[4] and Sections 7 and 8 of the Administrative Procedure Act, 60 Stat. 241, 242.[5]

[Contentions of Plaintiff]

The plaintiff in its Complaint charges that the Federal Communications Commission in issuing its Order and Authorization of June 7, 1948 acted in an "illegal and void" manner for the reasons that:

"1. The Order and Authorization is contrary to the anti-monopoly laws.

"2. The Telephone Company of Ohio is not a proper agent.

"3. Plaintiff was not accorded a fair hearing, in that there was considered as evidence, by the Commission, matter not in the record.

"4. No proposed report as to certain material evidence and issues was prepared and served upon the Plaintiff by the Commission, as provided by the Administrative Procedure Act.

"5. The Commission has disregarded its own findings in order to achieve a result violative of law.

"6. The Order and Authorization are contrary to the public interest and do not meet the requirements of Section 214 of the Communications Act of 1934 as amended.

"7. The Order of the Commission of May 27, 1948 issued simultaneously with and as a part of its disposition of Exhibits 'A' and 'B' is an abuse of the Commission's discretion and is arbitrary and improper."

[Statement of Facts]

The intervenor-defendant, Western Union Telegraph Company, filed a motion to dismiss the Complaint on the ground that the plaintiff lacked legal capacity to maintain this action. The Government filed a motion for summary judgment on the pleadings and exhibits. Oral argument was heard by the Court on April 12, 1949, counsel having previously stipulated that the parties were in complete agreement as to the facts, and that arguments before the Court would relate only to the question of law arising from the stipulated facts. Briefly stated the facts in this case are as follows:

The application which initiated the proceedings resulting in the Commission Order of May 27, 1948, was filed by Western Union with the Federal Communications Commission on December 27, 1946 and amended pursuant to motion filed May 28, 1947. In the application, Western Union requested authority to close its main office at each of six communities in Ohio aand to substitute, in lieu thereof, service through a teleprinter-operated agency office to be established in the office of, and to be operated by, the respective local telephone company operating in each community. Such telephone companies are managed by The Telephone Service Company of Ohio. Under the terms of a contract between Western Union and The Telephone Service Company of Ohio on behalf of itself and the companies under its management, the respective telephone companies, upon a grant of this application, will provide telegraph service as agents of Western Union in each of the six communities involved. In addition, it is also provided in the contract that telephone companies under the management of The Telephone Service Company of Ohio will act as Western Union agents in 116 communities adjacent to the six involved in this application.

At the time of the merger of Postal Telegraph, Inc. and Western Union in October, 1943, Postal had a number of agency agreements with telephone companies serving various communities in Ohio, functioning under the management of The Telephone Service Company. Under the terms of these agreements the telephone companies furnished 24-hour telegraph service to various Ohio communities through a combination of direct office representation and subscriber telephone stations. At certain of these places, including the six communities in the instant application, Western Union also maintained company-operated offices. Subsequent to the merger, when the operations of the Postal and Western Union were integrated, Postal's agreements with The Telephone Service Company of Ohio were kept in effect by Western Union in order to continue the rendition of 24-hour telegraph service in these communities, not then available at the Western Union offices.[6] According to the application filed with the Federal Communications Commission and testimony offered by the Western Union Telegraph Company at the hearings held on this application, the telephone companies did not realize sufficient revenue from the handling of telegraph traffic after the merger to justify continued participation in telegraph operations under the arrangements then in effect. On May 8, 1946, Western Union concluded an agreement with The Telephone Service Company, and it is to effectuate this agreement that the application was filed.

Essentially, the plan is to relocate the teleprinter and associated telegraph equipment presently in use in Western Union's company-operated offices in the commercial offices of the respective telephone companies where the equipment would be operated by personnel trained by Western Union but employed by and under the direct supervision of the telephone company.

After the filing of the application by Western Union Telegraph Company with the Federal Communications Commission a hearing upon the application was held in Mt. Gilead, Ohio, one of the communities involved, on May 14 and 15, 1947, pursuant to the Commission's Order of April 10, 1947, designating the application for hearing.

Western Union appeared at the hearing and offered evidence in support of its application. Appearances were also entered on behalf of The Commercial Telegraphers' Union (plaintiff herein), The Telephone Service Company of Ohio and the National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners, who were given leave to intervene by the Commission's Order designating the application for hearing. The Hydraulic Press Manufacturing Company appeared at the hearing and was permitted to intervene upon motion before the Commission.

A motion to reopen the record for the purpose of introducing certain exhibits annexed thereto was filed by plaintiff on June 20, 1947, and subsequently withdrawn by letter dated August 7, 1947.

On June 30, 1947, Brief and Argument were filed by plaintiff and Proposed Findings of Fact and Conclusions were filed by [6] The effect of Section 214 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, effective March 6, 1943, was to prevent Western Union from reducing the hours of service to these communities, unless otherwise authorized by the Commission.

Western Union. The Commission adopted a Proposed Report on February 12, 1948, in which it concluded that neither the present nor future public convenience and necessity would be adversely affected by a grant of the application. A copy of the Proposed Report was sent to the Public Utilities Commission of Ohio and by letter dated February 24, 1948, the Ohio Commission advised that it had "no specific comment to make in favor of or in opposition to the factual situations as developed" in the Proposed Report; however, comments were made with respect to jurisdictional aspects of the case. The National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners also filed on February 24, 1948, a statement commenting with respect to the jurisdictional problem but did not discuss the merits of the Proposed Report. On March 4, 1948, plaintiff filed exceptions to the Proposed Report and requested oral argument. On March 9, 1948, Western Union filed comments with respect to the above-mentioned letter and statement of the Ohio Commission and the National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners, respectively; and, on March 16, 1948, filed a statement in support of the Proposed Report.

Oral argument was held before the Commission en banc on March 22, 1948, at which time the record was reopened for the purpose of receiving two additional exhibits upon request of the plaintiff.

On April 6, 1948, plaintiff filed a motion to reopen the record and take further evidence with respect to correspondence between the Commission and the Department of Justice in regard to the application herein. Opposition to this motion was filed by Western Union on April 9, 1948; and a Supplemental Memorandum was filed by plaintiff on April 15, 1948.

On May 26, 1948, plaintiff filed a second motion to reopen the record; this time to receive in evidence the current bargaining agreement between Western Union and plaintiff. Opposition to this motion was filed by Western Union on June 1, 1948.

The motion of April 6, 1948, was dismissed in the Commission's Final Report adopted May 27, 1948, and issued June 7, 1948. The motion of May 26, 1948, was denied in a separate Order, dated May 27, 1948.

The Commission adopted a Final Report on May 27, 1948, and issued the same on June 7, 1948. A majority of the Commission found and concluded that a grant of Western Union's application would not adversely affect the present or future public convenience and necessity, and the Order and Authorization granting the application was adopted and issued at the same time. Two Commissioners dissented, and one Commissioner, who joined in the majority decision, appended additional views.

As basis for its decision and order, the Commission found in its Report that the proposed agent was capable, by reason of experience, availability of trained personnel, and financial qualifications, to render the service as proposed in the application; that the proposed telephone company-operated agency offices should provide service equal to, if not better than, that presently available through the Western Union Class 1-B offices in the six communities involved; that improved and additional services of value to those communities, as well as to 116 communities adjacent thereto, would result; that lower charges to the public for service in many instances would result; that certain savings would result to Western Union under the proposed agency operation if gross operating revenues at each of the six communities continued at present levels, and that it did not appear that a substantial reduction, if any, in telegraph revenue should result from the proposed agency operation.

With respect to the applicability of the Federal anti-trust laws, the Commission stated that its decision should not be construed as a determination as to whether or not operations pursuant to the agreement between The Telephone Service Company of Ohio and Western Union might or would result in any violation of any law relating to monopolies or unreasonable restraints of trade. However, the Commission did give consideration to the effect on competition of a grant of the application, and concluded that approval in this case would not have substantial effects on competition generally in the absence of a widespread program of such conversions and that there was no evidence before the Commission to show that Western Union contemplated such a program. The Commission also found that whatever effects there may be on competition in this situation were out-weighed by the benefits which it had found would inure to the public from the proposal and that the incentive from commissions accruing to the proposed agency operations by Western Union, as represented by it on the record, would serve to mitigate the effects on competition from such arrangements.

Upon the basis of the above findings the Commission concluded that neither the present nor future public convenience and necessity would be adversely affected by a grant of the application.

A petition for rehearing and stay was filed by plaintiff on June 18, 1948. An opposition to the petition was filed by Western Union on June 28, 1948. Comments in support of the petition were filed by plaintiff on July 23, 1948. The petition was denied by the Commission's Order of August 4, 1948.

On August 5, 1948 plaintiff filed a motion to stay the effective date of the Commission's Order and Authorization pending institution of appropriate court proceedings to obtain judicial review. Opposition to this motion was filed by Western Union on August 10, 1948. By Order, dated August 19, 1948, the Commission suspended the operation of its Order and Authorization for a period of 30 days, and thereafter plaintiff filed its complaint in this court.

[Violation of Antitrust Laws]

The first grounds upon which plaintiff bases its action is that the Order and Authorization of the Federal Communications Commission is "contrary to the anti-monopoly laws." While the Federal Communications Commission made no formal finding upon the possibility of an Anti-Trust Law violation occurring from the consummation of the proposed agency agreement, it did, according to the record before this Court refer the contract between the Western Union Telegraph Company and The Telephone Service Company of Ohio to the Department of Justice. The record discloses that the Federal Communications Commission did by letter of August 17, 1947, refer to the Department of Justice the contract between Western Union Telegraph Company and The Telephone Service Company of Ohio, for study to determine if the proposed agreement would "eliminate competition and constitute a merger in violation of the Federal Anti-Trust laws." The Department of Justice, by its letters of August 29, 1947 and October 24, 1947, was of the opinion that there was no violation of the Federal Anti-Trust laws. Although the Federal Communications Commission did not consider the exchange of correspondence as evidence in the preparation of its Report, the Court has given consideration to this correspondence since it constituted a specific item in the plaintiff's complaint. The Court has reviewed this contract and Report in the light of all of the facts in this situation, as measured by the pertinent provisions of the Sherman Act[7] and the Clayton Act of October 15, 1914.[8] The proposed arrangement certainly does not constitute a "merger," nor does it establish any "restraint of trade." The public will still have available the alternate means of communication, of the telephone or of the telegraph, and the only physical change is that the members of the public desiring to send a telegram will proceed to the public office of the telephone company, instead of the public office of the telegraph company to send a telegram over telegraph-company-owned and supervised equipment, and telegraph-company-owned and operated wires. The operator of the telegraph-company equipment in the telephone company office, while paid by the telephone company, will be trained by the telegraph company. Messages will pass from the telephone company office over Western Union wires to the nearest relay office of the Western Union Telegraph Co. The Court emphasizes that the public will still be left a choice between telephone and telegraph service at the six affected communities and that the proposed change in these communities to the agency operation "will result in benefits to the public." While it is true that there may be some "lessening of competition" such results are not, per se, prohibited by Congress in the Sherman and Clayton Acts. The phraseology "lessening of competition" is fundamentally descriptive of a factor judicially used as a determinent in dealing with factual situations to establish whether a prohibitive statutory restraint of trade or monopoly results from a particular state of facts. The test applied by the Supreme Court in the Columbia Steel case[9] is whether the elimination of competition constitutes an "unreasonable restraint," since only unreasonable restraints are forbidden.[10]

[7] 15 U. S. C. 1-11.

[9] United States v. Columbia Steel Company, et al., 334 U. S. 495.

A further factor of importance in the Court's opinion upon the matter of the applicability of the Anti-Trust laws to this case is the fact that the proposed agreement is undertaken only after formal approval by the appropriate Government agency. In fact § 214 of the Communications Act[11] requires a certificate from the Federal Communications Commission approving the proposed action before it can be legally undertaken. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia has ruled that transactions which might be illegal under the Anti-Trust laws "if brought about by (private) agreements or other devices" may well be legal if effectuated with (proper) government sanction. Mr. Justice Edgerton, speaking for the Court in Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co. v. F. C. C., 68 App. D. C. 336 at 338, in discussing similar circumstances pointed out that "The anti-trust laws are aimed at private action, not at governmental action." The Court, therefore, rules that the proposed Order and Authorization cannot be set aside, annulled or enjoined on the grounds that it is contrary to the anti-monopoly laws."

[Telephone Company as Proper Agent]

Plaintiff's second ground for its action is that The Telephone Company of Ohio is not a proper agent. Plaintiff cites references in the record before the Federal Communications Commission to allegedly poor telephone service now being rendered by The Telephone Service Company of Ohio, particularly through The Ohio Central Telephone Company at Mt. Gilead, Ohio, and contends that the quality of telegraph service now being received in the area served by The Telephone Service Company of Ohio will be adversely affected by the grant of the application.

The Telephone Service Company of Ohio is an independent telephone company, unaffiliated with the Bell System. It conducts a general telephone business in the State of Ohio through various subsidiary and affiliated corporations owning and operating telephone exchanges in various cities and towns in Ohio, including the six communities involved in the subject application. Each of the local telephone companies through which telegraph service is to be rendered under the proposed agency arrangements is in a financially sound condition. The proposed agent and its operating companies have had substantial experience in rendering telegraph service as agent of the Ohio Postal Telegraph-Cable Company in a large number of communities until the merger of the latter company with Western Union in 1943, and as agent of Western Union in a number of communities since merger.

Several references appear in the record of the proceedings before the Federal Communications Commission to allegedly unsatisfactory telephone services now being rendered by the proposed agent, particularly at Mt. Gilead, Ohio, on the basis of which plaintiff argues that the Commission's conclusion that the proposed agent is qualified to provide telegraph service "is contrary to the evidence." From a consideration, however, of the evidence which is pertinent to this matter and which is entirely ignored by the plaintiff, it is apparent that the causes of such unsatisfactory telephone service do not reflect upon the telephone company's qualifications or ability to act as an agency for telegraph service as proposed in the application or otherwise indicate that the quality of telegraph service under agency operation will be affected to any greater extent thereby than under present arrangements.

The Commission heard evidence that the inability of the telephone company to provide a quality of telephone service desired by the public has been due to wartime shortages of equipment and trained personnel, and that the telephone company has been making every effort to overcome these deficiencies by the construction and installation of new facilities already on order from the manufacturers. Moreover, the Commission was advised that under the agency agreement between the telephone company and Western Union, the latter will furnish, install, and maintain in all major respects the equipment to be used in the agency offices; and, that a number of teleprinter operators experienced in telegraph operations are available to the proposed agent and that others will be trained by Western Union. Other evidence was considered by the Commission in reaching its conclusion that The Telephone Service Company of Ohio was a competent agent, and the dissenting opinion of two Commissioners states that "We do not challenge the finding of the majority that, under existing circumstances, the substitution of telephone company agencies for the Western Union offices will result in benefits to the public as well as to Western Union." [12]

[10] The Standard Oil Company v. United States, 221 U. S. 1.

The Court is precluded from substituting its judgment on such matters for that of the Commission.[13] The record contains substantial evidence supporting the Commission's findings that those findings are, consequently, conclusive. "The judicial function is exhausted when there is found to be a rational basis for the conclusions approved by the administrative body." [14]

[Consideration of Correspondence Between FCC and Department of Justice]

Plaintiff next contends that it was not accorded a fair hearing, in that there was considered as evidence by the Commission, matters not in the record. This contention, apparently, relates to the correspondence exchanged between the Federal Communications Commission and the Department of Justice on the question of the applicability of the anti-trust laws. It appears, however, that the correspondence in question resulted from plaintiff's suggestion in its "Brief and Argument" filed with the Commission that the contract between Western Union and The Telephone Service Company of Ohio be referred by the Commission to the Department of Justice for investigation and prosecution under the anti-trust laws. In its proposed Report the Commission quoted the following excerpt from the Department of Justice letter of October 24, 1947:

> "We see no merit in the contention that a designation of telephone companies to operate 13 telegraph offices as agents of the Western Union Company would constitute a merger of the telephone and telegraph companies. We believe that the inclusion of the clause which you suggest in your letter would be adequate protection to the Government from the standpoint of the anti-trust laws in the event the Commission decides to approve the application for closure of Western Union's offices at designated points and the substitution of telephone agency offices."

It does not appear, however, that the Commission considered the above letter as evidence or that it based any findings of fact upon this correspondence either in its Proposed Report or in its Final Report. In its Final Report the Commission stated that in view of the plaintiff's objection to consideration of the correspondence it had given no consideration to the correspondence in arriving at its final decision.[15] The Court concludes that the record affords no basis for support of this contention of the plaintiff.

[Violation of Administrative Procedure Act]

Plaintiff next charges that no proposed report as to certain material evidence and issues was prepared and served upon the plaintiff by the Commission, as provided in the Administrative Procedure Act. In paragraph "Thirteenth" of its Complaint, plaintiff charges that the Commission "did not pass upon the evidence as to the violations of the anti-trust laws, but asserted merely that its order would not be a protection or defense against a charge of violation of said laws." The same paragraph of the Complaint states that:

> "It was only upon the insistence of plaintiff, in its exceptions and upon oral argument, that the Commission had considered the effect of the anti-trust laws, and has made findings of fact thereon, but no proposed findings on the anti-trust issues or facts were ever submitted to plaintiff, despite plaintiff's insistence at the oral argument and in exceptions, all a part of the record before the Commission, that such procedure was necessary in order to comply with the Administrative Procedure Act."

While plaintiff does not identify the specific section of the Administrative Procedure Act which it contends has been violated, the Court assumes from the record before it that reference is made to 5 U. S. C. 1007.[16] Section (a) requires the issuance of tentative decisions in certain cases. The Federal Communications Commission designated a presiding officer to take evidence in this proceeding. The Commission issued a "Proposed Report" on the application of Western Union Telegraph Company which report meets the "tentative decision" requirement of § 8(a) of the Administrative Procedure Act. The Commission's Proposed Report was issued in lieu of a recommended decision by the presiding officer who conducted the hearing. Prior to the issuance of the Proposed Report, plaintiff was afforded an opportunity to file proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law, but instead plaintiff filed a "Brief and Argument" which contended that the Western Union application for approval of the agency contract should be denied because it constituted an "unlawful merger" of the telegraph and telephone companies, in violation of the anti-trust laws. Plaintiff's argument in this regard was considered and rejected by the Commission.[17] Plaintiff thereafter filed a statement of exceptions to the Proposed Report, as provided in § 8(b) of the Administrative Procedure Act, these exceptions reiterating plaintiff's contention that the agency arrangement violated the anti-trust laws. Plaintiff's exceptions included a request for oral argument before the Commission en banc, which hearing was granted pursuant to the provisions of § 409(a) of the Communications Act.[18] At the hearing held by the Commission, plaintiff took virtually the same position contending that the Commission should withdraw its Proposed Report and issue findings on the question of whether the anti-trust laws had been violated. The Commission thereafter issued its Final Report in which it devoted several pages to the consideration of the "applicability of Federal Anti-Trust Laws." [19] The Commission, while holding that it had "no duty as to enforcement of the Federal Anti-Trust laws" (italics supplied), nevertheless stated that "the effect on competition of a grant of the application before us is a material consideration in applying the standard of 'public convenience and necessity' in Section 214 of the Communications Act." Thereafter the Commission enumerated the factual considerations on this point which the evidence had brought forth and which the Commission held were such as to justify it in concluding that there appeared to be no reason to deny to the public "at this time the improved and additional services of value which the subject conversions to agency operation will provide." [20]

Thus it appears that the Commission carefully considered the plaintiff's contention concerning the anti-trust laws, after affording plaintiff its statutory right to file and argue its exceptions to the Proposed Report. That the Commission did not adopt plaintiff's contention nor accede to its argument does not constitute a violation of the Administrative Procedure Act on the part of the Commission. The purpose of the cited provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act (supra) is to insure procedures by which parties may be fully informed of the issues and proposed grounds of decision and be afforded full opportunity to be heard upon these issues and grounds. Plaintiff was afforded all opportunities required by the Administrative Procedure Act.

[Findings of FCC as Contrary to Evidence]

Plaintiff further contends that the Commission disregarded its own findings in order to achieve a result violative of law. This contention set out at length but without clarity is the subject of paragraphs numbered "Eighth," "Ninth" and "Tenth," pages 3 to 6 of the Original Complaint. In essence, plaintiff charges that the findings of the Commission as to the applicability of the anti-trust laws were in direct conflict with certain enumerated sections of the testimony offered during the Commission's hearings. Plaintiff challenges the Commission's Report in which the Commission concedes a diminution of competition as reaching "directly in conflict with the basic laws of the country promoting competition and prohibiting monopolies." Plaintiff further argues on this point that the Commission's findings are in complete abrogation of the Commission's previous position.[21] Plaintiff further charges the Commission's Report is contrary to evidence relating to Western Union Telegraph Company's proper supervision of the proposed (agency) operations.

The Court's findings upon these points are adverse to the plaintiff because the testimony cited by plaintiff is not the only or predominant testimony upon the several points specified, and as set forth, supra, the Court finds that there is reasonable evidence to support the Commission's findings.

[Requirements of Communications Act]

The sixth basis for plaintiff's action charges that "The Order and Authorization are contrary to the public interest and do not meet the requirements of § 214 of the Communications Act of 1934 as amended (supra)." This section provides that:

> "(a) No carrier shall undertake the construction of a new line or of an extension of any line, or shall acquire or operate any line, or extension thereof, or shall engage in transmission over or by means of such additional or extended line, unless and until there shall first have been obtained from the Commission a certificate that the present or future public convenience and necessity require or will require the construction, or operation, or construction and operation, of such additional or extended line: Provided, That no such certificate shall be required under this section for the construction, acquisition, or operation of (1) a line within a single State unless such line constitutes part of an interstate line, (2) local, branch, or terminal lines not exceeding ten miles in length, or (3) any line acquired under section 221 or 222 of this title: Provided further, That the Commission may, upon appropriate request being made, authorize temporary or emergency service, or the supplementing of existing facilities, without regard to the provisions of this section. No carrier shall discontinue, reduce, or impair service to a community, or part of a community, unless and until there shall first have been obtained from the Commission a certificate that neither the present nor future public convenience and necessity will be adversely affected thereby; except that the Commission may, upon appropriate request being made, authorize temporary or emergency discontinuance, reduction, or impairment of service, or partial discontinuance, reduction, or impairment of service, without regard to the provisions of this section. As used in this section the term 'line' means any channel of communication established by the use of appropriate equipment, other than a channel of communication established by the interconnection of two or more existing channels:

Thus the standard required by the statute to be applied by the Commission is that of "public convenience and necessity" with a finding that "neither the present nor future public convenience will be adversely affected" by the proposed action. The standard of "public convenience and necessity" is to be so construed as to secure for the public the broad aims of the Communications Act.[22] The purpose of the Act as set forth in § 1 thereof is "to make available, as far as possible, to all the people of the United States, a rapid, efficient, Nation-wide, and world-wide wire and radio communication service with adequate facilities at reasonable charges." The Commission's Report sets forth in detail the effects of the proposed agency agreement upon telegraph service and facilities in the six communities involved; it considered the probable financial effects of the proposal upon the earnings of the companies involved; reviewed the probable costs of the telegraph services to the communities in question; set forth the improved facilities which will result from the merger and, as set forth heretofore, considered as a factor in applying the standard of "public convenience and necessity" the effect on competition of the grant of the application of Western Union Telegraph Company for the authority for the agency arrangement.[23]

[21] Commission's Report on Chain Broadcasting, p. 4, footnote 3 of Complaint, that in "The absence of Congressional action exempting the industry from the anti-trust laws, we are not at liberty to condone practices which tend to monopoly and contractual restrictions destructive of freedom of trade and competitive opportunity."

[22] Cf. Interstate Commerce Commission v. Parker, 326 U. S. 60, 69; New England Divisions Case, 261 U. S. 184, 189; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Railway Labor Assn., 315 U. [23] In its Final Report, the Commission stated: "Although we have no duty as to enforcement of the Federal Anti-trust laws, the effect on competition of a grant of the application before us is a material consideration in applying the standard of 'public convenience and necessity' in Section 214 of the Communications Act. We are appreciative of the fact that traditionally, a regulated public utility, such as Western Union,

The Court must, in view of these considerations, reject plaintiff's contention on this point.

[Denial of Motion to Reopen Proceedings]

The final ground for plaintiff's action is that the Order of the Commission of May 27, 1948, is "an abuse of the Commission's discretion and is arbitrary and improper." The Order of May 27, 1948, denies plaintiff's motion that the record of the Commission be reopened for the purpose of receiving in evidence the current bargaining agreement between Western Union Telegraph Company and the plaintiff. Plaintiff's motion was filed on May 26, 1948. The basis for the Commission's rejection thereof is as follows:

> "It appearing, that, pursuant to the terms of the Commission's Order of April 1, 1947, the Union intervened and participated fully in the proceedings herein; that hearings were held on May 14 and 15, 1947, and a Proposed Report was issued on February 13, 1948; that exceptions to said Proposed Report have been filed by the Union, and pursuant to the request of said Union, oral argument was held before the Commission en banc on March 22, 1948;
> "It further appearing, That the motion of the Union to reopen the record herein is not timely inasmuch as the existence of the particular contract provisions mentioned above was known by the Union throughout the proceedings herein, and the Union had ample opportunity to offer such provisions for the record;"

The pertinent portion of the contract, which plaintiff believes material and relevant to this proceeding is Article 52(R)(3): "The Company agrees it will not contract out any work which will result in loss of employment for employees covered by this agreement." The plaintiff, pointing out that the Federal Communications Commission is familiar with the contract between plaintiff and Western Union Telegraph Company, since this contract was involved in lengthy hearings before the Commission, contends that the Commission having "over-all control of the Western Union System" should have considered as a part of its action in the present case, the effect of the Commission's action upon the Western Union Telegraph Company's contractual obligations. The record before the Court discloses that the Western Union Telegraph Company filed its application with the Federal Communications Commission on December 27, 1946, amending the application on May 28, 1947. The plaintiff entered its appearance at the hearing held on May 14 and 15, 1947, and was a party to the proceedings, as set out heretofore, at all times thereafter. Under the circumstances the plaintiff had ample and adequate time; to-wit, a full year, in which to file the contract in question. Plaintiff was fully advised as to the advancing state of the proceedings; had filed exceptions to the Proposed Report, and had argued its exceptions to the Proposed Report on March 22, 1948. Filing of the motion to reopen on May 26, 1948, was not timely and the action of the Commission in not reopening the record was not an abuse of the Commission's discretion.

Reverting now to the core of the dispute, the central question is whether the Comis monopolistic within its particular field of operations. However, here we have a proposal whereby the telegraph company will be turning over to a telephone company, a normal competitor, its operations in certain communities. Accordingly, it is material to consider the particular facts and circumstances which compose the arrangements in question.

"Under the arrangements between Western Union and The Telephone Service Company of Ohio, it is not unreasonable to expect a diminution in the competition as it now exists between the two carriers in the six communities involved as well as in the 116 communities adjacent to those covered by the application. On the other hand, a grant of the application herein will afford to the public improved and extended services of value which are not presently provided by Western Union in those communities. In this regard, we refer to our findings heretofore made which indicate the extent of these benefits to the public. Among these benefits is the fact that under the proposed agency arrangements, telegraph service will be available to the public 24 hours daily through a teleprinter-operated agency office in each community, in contrast to present arrangements under which service during the closed hours of the Western Union office is, for the most part, by telephone to or from open Western Union offices in nearby communities, with the telegraph patron generally paying the applicable telephone toll charges. Reduced charges through elimination of after-hour telephone tolls, in addition to billing and collection privileges and 24-hour physical delivery service, not presently available in each community, should add much to the attractiveness of telegraph service. Furthermore, the plan to provide physical representation and to make available 24-hour telegraph service for telephone subscribers through telephone company-operated agency offices at 116 communities adjacent to those covered by the application should stimulate additional telegraph traffic. * * *" mission has power to approve an agreement between a telegraph company and a telephone company, if the effect of the agreement is to lessen competition between the companies in a given locality. The Commission says that the effect of the agreement in the present case will be a lessening of competition. We are quite mindful of the plain implications in the opinion in McLean Trucking Co. v. United States, 321 U. S. 67, that, absent a specific congressional permission, an administrative agency cannot validate an agreement between competitors which is otherwise invalid under the antitrust laws. But not every agreement between competitors is illegal. The question before us is whether the facts in this record reflect a lessening of competition of such substance as to be illegal under the Columbia Steel and similar cases. It is true that the telegraph equipment in these communities is to be in the hands of the telephone company and the initial telegraph service to the customer is to be by a telephone employee. And therein is a lessening of the competition. But the telegraph service to the public remains just as it was, both in character and in extent. It remains telegraph service, over telegraph equipment. And the companies are to retain their respective advertising efforts. The considerations which induce a person to send a telegram instead of making a telephone call, and vice versa, will remain exactly as they are. And the facilities for each service will remain exactly as available to the customer as they are now.

It seems to us, as it did to the Commission and to the Department of Justice, that the lessening of competition reflected by these particular facts is more theoretical than real. We do not have before us a major plan to adopt generally this same sort of agency substitution. If we did, we would have a different problem. But we think that we cannot magnify the miniature factual lessening of competition shown in this instance into a test case for the decision of a major question of law.

As a result of the Court's findings, the defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment is granted. Since the Court has considered this case upon its substantive merits, it is unnecessary to pass upon the motion of the Western Union Telegraph Company for the dismissal of the Complaint.[24]

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Act

Motion to Quash—Motion to Transfer—Convenience of Witnesses.—A motion made by a manufacturing corporation and its wholly owned subsidiaries to quash service of a complaint, which alleged unlawful agreements in restraint of trade, was denied since the venue was properly laid in the district where the non-resident corporations transact business and retain a manufacturers' representative. The motion to transfer the case to Illinois was allowed since most of the witnesses, books, records, and documents to be produced at the trial were principally located in Chicago. The Government's contention that this suit should be tried in Pennsylvania, so as to assure uniform treatment of two other suits filed simultaneously with this one, was rejected. If uniform treatment were the determining ingredient of venue, any one of three jurisdictions could have been selected rather than Pennsylvania.

On Defendants' Motion to Quash the Service of Process or, in the Alternative, to Transfer This Cause to the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division

Opinion

BARD, J., District Judge: The complaint filed by the Government alleges that the defendants have entered into unlawful agreements in restraint of interstate trade, in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act[1] and Section 3 of the Clayton Act[2]. The case is now before me on the defendants' motion to quash service of process or, in the alternative, to transfer this cause to the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division.

[Parties]

The defendant Max Gerber, a resident of Chicago, Illinois, operating under the trade name of Gerber Enterprises, has his principal place of business at 232 North Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois. The defendant Kokomo Sanitary Pottery Corporation, hereinafter called Kokomo, is an Indiana corporation which has its plant located at Kokomo, Indiana, and its principal office at 232 North Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois. The defendant Woodbridge Sanitary Pottery Corporation, hereinafter called Woodbridge, is a Delaware corporation which has its plant located at Woodbridge, New Jersey, and its principal office at 232 North Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois. The defendant Globe Valve Corporation, hereinafter called Globe, is an Indiana corporation which has its plant located at Delphi, Indiana, and its principal office at 232 North Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois. The defendant Gerber Industries, Inc., hereinafter called Gerber Industries, is an Indiana corporation which has its plant located at Delphi, Indiana, and its principal office at 232 North Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

Defendants Woodbridge and Globe are wholly owned subsidiaries of the defendant Kokomo. The defendant Kokomo is owned by the defendant Max Gerber. The defendant Max Gerber owns about 45% of the stock of the defendant Gerber Industries, and the remaining stock of the defendant Gerber Industries is divided among the various employees and associates of the defendant Max Gerber. All of the products of the defendants are sold subject to approval and acceptance by the defendants at their principal office in Chicago, Illinois.

[Venue]

Venue is properly laid within the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, for the defendants are found or are transacting business, and have an agent in this district. The corporate defendants admit in their affidavit that approximately 3.8% of their business comes from within this district. The Government's affidavit shows and the defendants' affidavit admits that the defendants retain a manufacturers' representative within this district. This representative regularly solicits and takes orders for more than 80% of the sale of the defendants' products within this district, and is paid on a commission basis. His stationery has the following legend printed on it at the bottom of the sheet: "Plumbing Fixtures by Gerber Globe Valve Corporation—Gerber Industries, Incorporated—Kokomo and Woodbridge Sanitary Potteries." In view of the interlocking control among the defendants and in view of the above averments, suit may be brought by the Government in this district. 38 Stat. 731, 736 (1914), 15 U. S. C. A. §§ 15, 22; United States v. Scophony Corp. of America et al., 333 U. S. 795; Eastman Kodak Co. of New York v. Southern Photo Materials Co., 273 U. S. 359; *Sure-Fit Products Co. et al. v. [Motion to Quash Service Denied]

Since venue is properly laid within the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, the non-resident corporate defendants cannot complain that service of process was made by the United States Marshals of the districts of which they are inhabitants or are found. 15 U. S. C. A. §§ 4, 5, 15, 22; Eastman Kodak Co. of New York v. Southern Photo Materials Co., supra; Haskell v. Aluminum Co. of America, 14 F. 2d 864; Frey & Son, Inc. v. Cudahy Packing Co., 228 Fed. 209. The individual non-resident defendant, Max Gerber, was served in his home in Illinois.

The defendants' motion to quash service of process must be denied.

[Convenience of Witnesses]

The defendants also contend that Section 1404 (a) of the Revised Judicial Code[3] applies to anti-trust cases, and that it would be for the convenience of the parties and witnesses and in the interest of justice to transfer this case to the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division.

Section 1404 (a) is general in its application and applies to "any civil action", including anti-trust suits. United States v. National City Lines, Inc. et al., 80 F. Supp. 734, certiorari denied by opinion 337 U. S. — (17 L. S. 4459); United States v. E. I. Du-Pont de Nemours & Co., 83 F. Supp. 233.

It appears from the facts alleged that it would be more convenient for at least the defendants and their witnesses to try this case in the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. In this case the principal office for all of the defendants is in Chicago, Illinois. Most of the witnesses, books, records, and documents which will or may become necessary to be produced at trial are principally located in Chicago. Those which are not located in Chicago, if any, will be found in Delphi, Indiana, Kokomo, Indiana, or Woodbridge, New Jersey; these places, with the exception of Woodbridge, New Jersey, are much closer and more convenient to Chicago, Illinois, than to Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. The choice of venue in the interest of justice is actually determined by a preponderance of the facts in favor of either the plaintiff or the defendant, United States v. National City Lines, Inc., et al., 80 F. Supp. 734, 744. Taking this into consideration together with the facts set forth in the preceding paragraph, it seems to me that justice will best be served if this case is tried in Chicago, in the Northern District of Illinois, rather than in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

The Government claims that Philadelphia is more advantageously located for its witnesses. However, it fails to allege where its witnesses are from, or how much farther they will have to travel to get to Chicago rather than to Philadelphia. Moreover, the Government will probably have to rely for at least part of its case on the books, records, and documents of the defendants, all of which would have to be brought to Philadelphia if the trial were held here.

[Uniform Treatment Argument]

The Government states that this is one of three anti-trust suits which it filed simultaneously in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania against three groups of defendants, all of whom are in the same business, and contends that if all cases were tried in Philadelphia, they would receive uniform treatment. This is a forceful statement but, under all the facts and circumstances, not a convincing one. In the instant suit the defendants have their principal office in Chicago, Illinois. In the second suit, United States of America v. Kohler Co., Civil Action No. 8947, the defendant company has its principal office in Kohler, Wisconsin. And in the third suit, United States of America v. Briggs Manufacturing Company et al., Civil Action No. 8948, the defendants have their principal office in Detroit, Michigan. If uniform treatment is the determining ingredient of venue, any one of these three jurisdictions could have been selected rather than the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

[Motion to Transfer Allowed]

The complaint alleges, not an illegal restraint of trade in the Philadelphia locality only, but an illegal restraint of interstate trade presumably encompassing the entire United States. The Government should not be permitted to harass the defendants by selecting some far-off place for trial which would put the defendants to unnecessary expense and travel in order to conduct their defense. Such harassing is an evil of the Sherman and the Clayton Acts which Section 1464 (a) of the Revised Judicial Code is intended to correct.

In accordance with this opinion, an order will be entered granting the defendants' motion to transfer this case to the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division.

On Defendants' Motion to Transfer Action

BARD, J. District Judge. The complaint filed by the Government alleges that the defendants have entered into unlawful agreements in restraint of interstate trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act[1] and Section 3 of the Clayton Act.[2] The case is now before me on the defendants' motion to transfer this action to the Eastern District of Michigan, Southern Division.

The defendant Briggs Manufacturing Company, hereinafter called Briggs, is a Michigan corporation which has all of its plants and its offices in Detroit, Michigan. The defendant Abingdon Potteries, Inc., hereinafter called Abingdon, is an Ohio corporation which has all of its plants and its offices at Abingdon, Illinois. The defendant John Douglas Company, hereinafter called Douglas, is an Ohio corporation which has all of its plants and offices at Cincinnati, Ohio. The defendant Republic Brass Company, hereinafter called Republic, is an Ohio corporation which has all of its plants and offices at Cleveland, Ohio.

Defendants Douglas and Republic are wholly owned subsidiaries of the defendant Briggs. The defendant Briggs has a controlling interest in the outstanding capital stock of the defendant Abingdon. All of the products of the defendants Douglas and Abingdon are sold to the defendant Briggs and are thereafter resold by the defendant Briggs. The products of the defendant Republic are sold either to the defendant Briggs or directly to the customers of the defendant Republic in accordance with orders and directions from the defendant Briggs.

The defendants contend that Section 1404(a) of the Revised Judicial Code[3] applies to anti-trust cases, and that it would be for the convenience of the parties and witnesses and in the interest of justice to transfer this case to the Eastern District of Michigan, Southern Division.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Recovery of Land—Monopolistic Practices Purely Collateral—Plea of Unreasonable Restraint of Trade Overruled.—In an action by a landlord to recover possession of certain realty, the tenant filed a plea alleging that the landlord for a long time prior to the initiation of this action had been continuously engaged with other persons in a combination and conspiracy in unreasonable restraint of trade and in monopolizing the transportation and sale of fruit and vegetable produce shipped in interstate commerce. It was further alleged that the present action was a proceeding forming a part of, and intended to further, such combination and conspiracy. On a hearing of the defendant's bill of exceptions to the lower court's holding, it was held that evidence regarding alleged monopolistic practices had been correctly rejected as collateral to the trespass and ejectment proceeding before the court.

For the plaintiff: Letts & Quinn, George R. Beane, Providence, Rhode Island.

For the defendant: Aram A. Arabian, Raphael Vicario, Providence, Rhode Island.

BAKER, J.: This is an action of trespass and ejectment brought by a landlord against its tenant to recover possession of certain realty. It was tried in the superior court by a justice thereof sitting without a jury. He rendered a decision in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant thereafter duly prosecuted its bill of exceptions to this court.

In the writ in this case the property which is alleged to be wrongfully detained by the defendant from the plaintiff's possession is described as follows: "four certain bays or units numbered 34, 34½, 36 and 36½ in the Produce Building, so-called, situated on the southerly side of Harris and Kinsley Avenues," in the city of Providence. The combined writ and declaration also alleges that the plaintiff on January 13, 1948 by notice in writing ordered the defendant to quit, vacate and deliver upon April 15, 1948 the above-described premises to the plaintiff.

[Defense of Conspiracy]

In addition to the plea of the general issue the defendant filed in the superior court four additional pleas. These additional pleas were equitable in nature and in general alleged that the plaintiff for a long time prior to the initiation of this action had been continuously engaged with other persons in a combination and conspiracy in unreasonable restraint of trade and in monopolizing the transportation and sale of fruit and vegetable produce in interstate commerce from other states to Providence in this state in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act and in violation of the common law. It was also alleged in the additional pleas that the present action is a proceeding forming a part of, and is intended to further, such combination and conspiracy. The plaintiff demurred to these additional pleas and the demurrer was sustained by a justice of the superior court, to which ruling the defendant duly excepted.

The defendant's bill of exceptions contains six exceptions, three to rulings of the trial justice admitting or rejecting certain evidence, two to his refusal to permit the defendant to make offers of proof, and an exception to his decision in favor of the plaintiff on the merits. After the case reached this court and shortly before it was heard, the defendant filed a motion that it be allowed to amend its bill of exceptions by adding thereto an exception to the ruling of the justice of the superior court sustaining the demurrer to defendant's equitable or additional pleas. The plaintiff objected to such amendment and by our permission the motion was briefed and argued at the same time the other exceptions were heard on their merits.

[Motion to Amend Bill of Exceptions]

In our opinion we should dispose of the above motion before we consider the defendant's bill of exceptions as filed. By general laws 1938, chapter 542, § 5, this court may allow amendments to a bill of exceptions. That section sets out in detail the procedure to be followed by a party who desires to prosecute a bill of exceptions from the superior court to the supreme court. The statute in this respect has been strictly construed and held to be jurisdictional. Frappier v. Frappier, 64 R. I. 54. It has also been decided that an exception which is not in the bill of exceptions is not before the appellate court for consideration. Rowy v. Mainella, 68 R. I. 149; Goff v. Lunn, 49 R. I. 455. At the conclusion of § 5 is the following sentence upon which the defendant relies: "The supreme court may allow amendments to a bill of exceptions or transcript of testimony." The question is thus raised whether or not the addition in this court of a separate and distinct exception not appearing in the bill of exceptions as filed and allowed by the trial justice in the superior court, although properly taken in that court, may be considered as an amendment to the bill of exceptions within the meaning and intent of the above-quoted sentence of the statute.

Upon consideration and realizing that the above statutory authority to amend should be given a reasonably liberal construction, even though statutes relating to bills of exceptions are strictly construed, we are nevertheless of the opinion that such a liberal construction should not go to the extent of permitting the addition by us, over objection, of an entirely new exception not appearing in the bill of exceptions when it was presented to and approved by the trial justice and when the case reached this court. An addition of this kind does not seem to us to be an amendment in the proper sense of an existing bill of exceptions within the meaning of the statute. Such a broad application of the power of this court to allow amendments to a bill of exceptions as is urged by the defendant might well lead to careless, hasty and imperfect preparation of bills of exceptions and a reliance on the fact that amendment here would be almost a matter of form. If one exception may be added to a bill of exceptions by this court it might be difficult to prevent the addition of several others. In such circumstances an opposing party would not be certain of the exceptions he had to meet until the case was ready for argument in this court. Also the approval by the trial justice of the bill of exceptions becomes of little importance if further exceptions may be added thereto on motion before us.

In Gladding v. Union R. R., 25 R. I. 122, this court, prior to the passage in 1905 of the Court and Practice Act had occasion to consider a question analogous to the one now before us. In that case the court had before it under the then appellate practice the plaintiff's petition for a new trial. He filed a motion, denied by the court, to be allowed to amend his petition. At page 124 of the opinion the following holding appears:

> "A petition for a new trial may be amended by making the assignments or error more specific, but not by adding new and additional assignments of error, of which the party had notice at the time of filing his petition."

We have examined the cases cited to us by the defendant in this connection and find that in the circumstances they are not applicable. Defendant's motion to be allowed to amend the bill of exceptions is therefore denied and its exception to the sustaining of plainttiff's demurrer to the equitable pleas is ont before us for consideration.

[Monopoly Held Collateral to Trespass Proceeding]

In our opinion defendant's first five exceptions relating to evidentiary rulings by the trial justice are without merit. We find that a certain written agreement entered into by the parties on January 31, 1948 was material and was properly admitted in evidence. Also defendant's offers of proof following the sustaining of plaintiff's objection to the introduction of certain testimony were correctly rejected. The testimony in question and the offers of proof related to the matters raised by the defendant's equitable pleas regarding the plaintiff's conduct allegedly amounting to restraint of trade and monopolistic practices. The demurrer to these pleas had been sustained by the superior court, but the defendant nevertheless attempted to introduce the matter included therein under its plea of the general issue. In our opinion it was not admissible under the last-named plea and was rightly excluded. It apparently related to a subject which was entirely collateral to the trespass and ejectment proceeding then on trial. See New England Transportation Co. v. Doorley, 60 R. I. 50, and 60 R. I. 260. Also an equitable defense in an action at law is not admissible under a plea of the general issue. Coates v. Coleman, 72 R. I. 304; Siravo v. Whitman, 51 R. I. 102. Further, in our judgment defendant's contention that the excluded evidence was admissible under the plea of the general issue because of a provision in the lease under which it originally went into possession of the property is not sound. The present proceeding in trespass and ejectment was brought after the lease in question had terminated and did not in any way depend upon a breach of the provision above referred to. The defendant's first five exceptions are overruled.

The remaining exception is the decision of the trial justice. In support of its case the plaintiff put in evidence as exhibits a lease for one year dated April 15, 1946 under which the defendant went into possession of the property in dispute, a notice by letter from the plaintiff to the defendant dated January 13, 1948 to quit and surrender up the premises on April 15, 1948, and a written agreement executed by the parties January 31, 1948. The letter which contained the above express notice to vacate also contained an incidental reference to a previous unsuccessful attempt to have the defendant give up possession of the property on December 31, 1947, but that reference did not invalidate the rest of the notice which was complete and sufficient. The agreement was on good consideration and contained several provisions concerning matters between the parties. Two of these provisions were as follows: "(d) That Gamco is a tenant from year to year for the year beginning April 15, 1947, of four certain bays or units numbered 34, 34½, 36 and 36½ in said Produce Building; that its current yearly term expires April 14, 1948, and that all the terms, conditions and provisions of that certain Indenture of Lease of said premises in said Produce Building, dated April 15, 1946, between the Company as Lessor and Gamco as Lessee, are in full force and effect during said tenancy from year to year. (e) That the notice to quit, dated January 13, 1948, from the Company to Gamco, was served on Gamco on January 14, 1948, and is a good and sufficient notice to quit and to terminate said tenancy on April 15, 1948, unless Gamco has a right to retain possession of said premises for some other reason."

The defendant did not surrender possession of the property on April 15, 1948 and the present action was begun April 16, 1948. We have considered the defendant's argument in support of its contention that the decision of the trial justice was erroneous. We are unable to agree with that argument and we cannot say that in the circumstances his decision for the plaintiff was clearly wrong. The defendant's sixth exception is overruled.

[Judgment for the Plaintiff]

All of the defendant's exceptions are overruled, and the case is remitted to the superior court for the entry of judgment for the plaintiff on the decision.

In the California District Court of Appeal. Civil No. 7566. Third District. 93 A. C. A. 99. July 21, 1949.

Appeal from an order of the Superior Court of San Joaquin County sustaining demurrer to complaint without leave to amend and dismissing action. GEORGE F. BUCK, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by state to enjoin violations of Unfair Practices Act. Order of dismissal affirmed.

California Unfair Practices Act

State Action for Injunction—Definition of a Person—Unfair Competition.—An order dismissing a state action to enjoin violations of the Unfair Practices Act was affirmed, on appeal. The Court ruled that the state was not one of the persons entitled to sue for injunctive relief under Section 17021. Without deciding whether violations of the Unfair Practices Act constituted unfair competition within the meaning of Section 3369 of the Civil Code, the Court held that since this action was not brought under that section, it could not be invoked as authorizing the state to sue for an injunction.

See the California Unfair Practices Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8068.80.

For the appellant: Forrest E. Macomber.

For the respondents: Fred N. Howser, Attorney General, and Clarence A. Linn, Deputy Attorney General.

[Syllabus]

Appeal—Judgments and Orders Appealable—Dismissal.—An order dismissing an action duly entered in the minutes of the court constitutes a judgment effective for all purposes, and hence is appealable. (Code Civ. Proc., § 581, subd. (d).)

Trademarks and Unfair Competition—Remedies—Who May Sue.—The state cannot maintain a civil action to enjoin alleged violations of the Unfair Practices Act (Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 17000-17101), in view of the requirement of § 17020 that the "definitions in this article shall be used in construing this chapter," and of the fact that the state is not, although a municipality is, included among those persons defined by § 17021 who may bring an action under § 17070 to enjoin violations of the act.

Id.—Remedies—Injunction. — Civ. Code, § 3369, providing that the state may bring an action to enjoin acts of unfair competition, does not authorize the state to sue for an injunction under the provisions of the Unfair Practices Act or any other statute except § 3369.

Appeal — Review — Moot Questions. — Where it is concluded on appeal that a code section invoked by a party is inapplicable to the case, any question as to the constitutionality of such section is moot and irrelevent to the decision of the case.

[Nature of Action]

PEEK, J.: The District Attorney of San Joaquin County commenced this civil action in the name of "The People of the State of California" against the Centr-O-Mart, a corporation, and certain individual defendants, seeking to enjoin alleged violations of the Unfair Practices Act (Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 17000-17101). The defendants interposed a demurrer and motion to dismiss the complaint upon the ground that the state was not a proper party plaintiff. The trial court made and entered its order sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend and dismissed the action. Inasmuch as the appealability of such an order was questioned the state caused a nunc pro tunc judgment of dismissal to be entered, and a second timely notice of appeal was filed therefrom. The sole question presented to this court is whether or not the state is authorized to maintain a civil action to restrain alleged violations of the Unfair Practices Act.

[Jurisdiction Established]

It is elementary that a reviewing court has jurisdiction to determine an appeal only if it is predicated upon an appealable order and the notice thereof is timely. (Estate of Hanley, 23 Cal. 2d 120 [142 P. 2d 423]; Gwinn v. Ryan, [1] 33 Cal. 2d 436 [202 P. 2d 51].) The facts shown by the record herein disclose that the order of dismissal was entered by the clerk in the minutes of the trial court on May 4, 1948, and that the first notice of appeal was filed May 21, 1948. Said notice specified that it was from "the order granting defendants' motion to dismiss." It is thus apparent that the notice was filed within the time prescribed by rule 2 (a) of the Rules on Appeal and thus confers the requisite jurisdiction upon this court to hear the appeal, if the order appealed from was an appealable order. Subdivision (d) of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides in part as follows:

> ". . . All dismissals ordered by the court shall be entered upon the minutes thereof or in the justice's docket, as the case may be, and such orders when so entered shall constitute judgments and be effective for all purposes . . ."

Since by the plain provision of said statute the order of dismissal constituted a judgment effective for all purposes it is appealable. (Gwinn v. Ryan, supra.) The first notice of appeal conferred jurisdiction upon this court to hear the appeal, therefore it is immaterial to discuss the question as to whether or not the second notice of appeal from the nunc pro tunc judgment conferred such jurisdiction.

[Scope of Definition of Person]

The Unfair Practices Act is contained in division VII, part 2, chapter 4, sections 17000-17101 of the Business and Professions Code. Section 17070 provides that "Any person or trade association may bring an action to enjoin and restrain any violation of this chapter and, in addition thereto, for the recovery of damages." Violations of the provisions of the act are made a misdemeanor by section 17100. The word "person" is defined by section 17021 as "any person, firm, association, organization, partnership, business trust, company, corporation or municipal or other public corporation." Section 17020 provides that "The definitions in this article shall be used in construing this chapter."

Appellants contend that the word "person" appearing in said section 17070 includes the state and that the state was therefore authorized to maintain this civil action for an injunction. In support thereof, reference is made to People v. Black's Food Store, 16 Cal. 2d 59 [105 P. 2d 361] and People v. Pay Less Drug Store, 25 Cal. 2d 108 [153 P. 2d 9] wherein the state successfully maintained actions to enjoin violations of the Unfair Practices Act. However, in none of the cases cited by appellants was the question raised as to the right of the state to maintain the action and hence such cases cannot be construed as upholding such right. We have been referred to no case passing upon the precise question of whether the state is a person as that term is used in section 17021, and our own research has revealed none. The decisions of other state courts upon the question are in conflict (See Words & Phrases, Person, p. 243) and are of slight assistance particularly in view of the requirement imposed by section 17020 that "The definitions in this article shall be used in construing this chapter."

Thus the question becomes one of determining whether the state is a "person" within the meaning of the terms as used in said section 17021. In this regard appellants contend that since a municipality is included within the definition of "person" as that term is defined in said section the state therefore must be included therein. Appellant further asserts that to conclude otherwise leads to the result that the state cannot enforce its own law while a political subdivision of the state is empowered to do so. Such contention is without merit. The question is not whether the state can enforce its own law, since, as previously noted, it is given the power to prosecute violations of the act as misdemeanors; rather it is, whether the particular course pursued herein is available, that is, whether the state can enforce the act by the injunctive process in a civil proceeding. Analyzing the question in the light of the specific statutory provisions it would seem to follow that the absence of the state among the persons designated by section 17021 necessarily leads to the conclusion that such omission was intentional and that the state is not one of the persons entitled to sue for injunctive relief under section 17021.

[Civil Code Provision]

Appellants further contend that if authority for the state to maintain this action cannot be found in section 17021 of the Business and Professions Code such authority is contained in section 3369 of the Civil Code. Subdivision 2 thereof provides that > "Any person performing or proposing to perform an act of unfair competition within this State may be enjoined in any court of competent jurisdiction."

Subdivision 5 provides that

> "Actions for injunction under this section may be prosecuted by the Attorney General or any district attorney in this State in the name of the people of the State of California upon their own complaint or upon the complaint of any board, officer, person, corporation or association or by any person acting for the interests of itself, its members or the general public."

Appellants' contention is that violations of the Unfair Practices Act set forth in the complaint come within the category of unfair competition as that phrase is defined in subdivision 2 of section 3369 of the Civil Code, and therefore subdivision 5 thereof authorizes the state to maintain the present action. This contention cannot be sustained. Whether or not violations of the Unfair Practices Act also constitute unfair competition as that phrase is used in section 3369 of the Civil Code is not the question. Section 3369 of the Civil Code merely authorizes actions for injunctions by the state "under this section" and the present case is not an action under section 3369 but is an action to restrain alleged violations of the Unfair Practices Act. Thus, by its very terms, section 3369 does not authorize the state to sue for an injunction under the provisions of the Unfair Practices Act or any other statute except "under this section."

[Constitutionality of Section Irrelevant]

Since we have concluded that the provisions of section 3369 of the Civil Code do not authorize the maintenance of this action by the state, the respondents' contention that said section is unconstitutional is moot and irrelevant to the decision of this case.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Equity No. 87-273. July 25, 1949.

Upon remand by the Supreme Court reversing in part and affirming in part decree and findings of December 31, 1946.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Motion Picture Industry—Geographic Distribution of Theatre Ownership.—Upon the United States Supreme Court remanding an antitrust action against major and minor film producers and exhibitors, the District Court held, that in the absence of competitive bidding, the theatre holdings of the major defendants played a vital part in effecting violations of the Sherman Act. It was found that the film companies owned or operated theatres either in largely separate markets or in pools with only trifling competition among themselves. Although the Court did not find an agreement to divide territory, it held that the effect of the distribution of ownership of the theatre circuits was to substantially limit competition. Geographic distribution was found to be a part of a system in which competition was largely absent and the status of which was maintained by fixed runs, prices, and clearances, pooling agreements and other illegal practices.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.175.

Motion Picture Industry—Effect of Vertical Integration upon Competition.—When an antitrust action against film producers and exhibitors was remanded by the Supreme Court for further consideration, the District Court held that the Government failed to show a calculated scheme on the part of the film companies to control the market rather than a purpose to obtain an outlet for their pictures and a supply of film for their theatres. Vertical integration was declared illegal when it was found to be an active aid to the conspiracy to fix prices, runs and clearances. The test used by the Court to determine the illegality of vertical integration was its close relationship with illegal practices. In this case the vertical integrations were definite means of carrying out restraints and conspiracies in violation of the Sherman Act.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.273.

Motion Picture Industry—Existence of Monopoly Power.—On remand of an antitrust suit against the film companies, the District Court held that the parties named must be viewed collectively rather than independently as to the power which they exercised over the market by their theatre holdings. It was found that the major companies owned at least 70 per cent of the first-run theatres in the 92 largest cities. As distributors they received approximately 90 per cent of the domestic film rental from the films. These figures when coupled with the strategic advantages of vertical integration were found to indicate a power to exclude competition from these markets when desired.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1022.27, 1220.156.

Motion Picture Industry—Separation of Exhibition from Production.—Upon remand, the District Court ordered a separation of the business of the defendants as exhibitors of film from their business as producers and distributors. A provision to enjoin three exhibitor defendants and any theatre-holding corporation resulting from the proposed divorcement from acquiring a beneficial interest in any additional theatre was outlined by the Court for insertion in the decree. The Court declined to disestablish specific theatres on the theory of local monopolies or of illegal fruits since there was insufficient evidence to justify such a remedy.

[Digest] This case comes before us after a decision by the Supreme Court affirming in part and reversing in part our decree and findings of December 31, 1946. United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 334 U. S. 131.

[Geographical Distribution]

A review of the illegalities which we, and the Supreme Court as well, have found to exist, in addition to a consideration of geographical distribution and a very general absence of competition between the major defendants, convinces us that in the absence of a system of competitive bidding, the theatre holdings of the major defendants have played a vital part in effecting violations of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.

We have been instructed by the Supreme Court to consider the question of geographical distribution of theatres among the five major defendants. In dealing with this subject, we do no take into account the presence or absence of independent theatres in the areas dealt with. We have examined the defendants' theatre holdings and find that in cities of less than 100,000 in population, there is no doubt that Paramount, Warner, Fox and RKO owned or operated theatres either in largely separate market areas or in pools, without more than trifling competition among themselves or with Loew's. In cities having a population of more than 100,000, there was in general little competition among the defendants, although considerably more than in towns of under 100,000. A summary of the data which substantially represents the true situation, but owing to certain differences in the proofs offered must be regarded as approximate rather than as entirely accurate, is as follows:

Cities of less than 100,000

In cities of less than 100,000, Paramount had complete or partial interests in or pooling agreements* with other defendants affecting 1,236 theatres located in 494 towns. In 13 of these towns containing 31 of the theatres—or only 3%—there was competition with another defendant. In 9% of these towns competition between Paramount and the only other defendant in the town was substantially lessened or eliminated by means of a pooling agreement affecting some or all of their theatres; and in this 9% were located 10% of Paramount's theatre interests. And in 88% of the towns, containing 87% of Paramount's theatre interests, Paramount was the only defendant operating theatres. Thus it appears that there was little, if any, competition between Paramount and any other defendant in 97% of the towns of under 100,000 and in respect to 97% of the theatres in which Paramount had an interest.

Fox had similar theatre interests in 428 theatres located in 177 towns. In 13 of these towns containing 29 Fox theatres, or about 7% thereof, there was competition with another defendant. In about 93% of the towns containing the same percentage of Fox's theatre interests, Fox was the only defendant operating theatres.

Warner had similar theatre interests in 306 theatres located in 155 towns or less than 100,000. In 17 towns, or 11%, containing 30 Warner theatres, or 10% of its holdings, there was competition with another major defendant. In 3% of the towns, competition between Warner and the only other defendant in the town was substantially lessened or eliminated by means of pooling agreements; and in this 3% were located 4% of Warner's theatre interests. In 86% of the towns containing the same percentage of Warner's theatre interests, Warner was the only defendant operating theatres. Thus, there appears to have been little, if any, competition between Warner and any other defendant in 89% of the towns and in respect to 90% of the theatres in which Warner had an interest.

Loew had interests in only 17 theatres located in 14 towns. In 4 towns, or 29%, containing 4 Loew theatres, or 23%, there was competition with another defendant. In 14% of the towns, competition was substantially lessened or eliminated by means of pooling agreements; and in this 14% were located 18% of Loew's theatre interests. In 57% of the towns, containing 59% of Lowe's theatre interests, Loew was the only defendant operating theatres. Thus, there appears to have been little, if any, competition between Loew and any other defendant in 71% of the towns and in respect to 77% of the theatres in which Loew had an interest. It is to be noted, however, that Loew's theatre interests in towns of less than 100,000 constitute a far smaller proportion of its total theatre holdings than do those of the other defendants.

RKO had interests in 150 theatres located in 66 towns. In 6 towns, or 10%, containing 6 RKO theatres, or 4%, there was competition with another major defendant. In 60% of the towns, competition was substantially lessened or eliminated by means of pooling agreements, and in this 60% were located 73% of RKO's theatre interests. In 30% of the towns, containing 23% of RKO's theatre interests, RKO was the only defendant operating theatres. Thus, there appears to have been little, if any, competition between RKO and any other defendant in 90% of the towns and in respect to 96% of the theatres in which RKO had an interest.

As a further illustration of the absence of substantial competition among the five major defendants in towns of less than 100,000 population, the proofs as to their total theatre holdings make the following showing which seems to us impressive. They had interests altogether in 2,020 theatres located in 834 towns. In 26 towns, or 3%, containing 100 of their theatres, or 5%, there was competition among some of them. In some what over 5% of the towns, competition between them was substantially lessened or eliminated by means of pooling agreements, and in this 5% were located 7% of their theatre interests. And in somewhat less than 92% of the towns, containing 88% of their theatre interests, only one of the major defendants owned theatres in the area. Thus, there appears to have been little, if any, competition among the five defendants or any of them in 97% of the towns and in respect to 95% of the theatres in which they had an interest.

It appears from the foregoing that the effect of the geographical distribution in towns having a population of less than 100,000 was largely to eliminate competition among all of the defendants in the areas where any of them had theatres. The details upon which our results have been based appear in the statistical data set forth at the end of the opinion in Appendix 1 [not reproduced herein].

* Pooling agreements and joint interests among defendants are treated as indistinguishable for the purpose of summarizing geographical distribution.

Cities of 100,000 and over

In cities of over 100,000 Paramount had complete or partial interests in or pooling agreements with other defendants affecting 352 theatres in 49 cities. In 18 of these cities, or 37%, containing 91 Paramount theatres, or 26%, there was competition with other defendants. In an additional 10% of the cities, containing 17% of Paramount's theatre holdings, there were other defendants having theatre interests, but those interests were so relatively small as compared with Paramount, both on first and later runs, that competition with Paramount was unsubstantial owing to the dominance which the latter's theatre holdings gave it. In 12% of these cities competition between Paramount and the only other defendants in the city was substantially lessened or eliminated by means of a pooling agreement affecting some or all of their theatres, and in this 12% were located 18% of Paramount's theatre interests. And in 41% of the cities, containing 39% of Paramount's theatre interests, Paramount was the only defendant operating theatres. Thus, it appears that there was little, if any, competition between Paramount and any other defendant in 63% of the cities of over 100,000 and in respect to 74% of the theatres in which Paramount had an interest.

Fox had similar theatre interests in 211 theatres located in 17 cities. In 5 of these cities, or 29%, containing 54 Fox theatres, or 26%, there was competition with other defendants. In an additional 18% of the cities, containing 41% of Fox's theatre holdings, there were other defendants having theatre interests, but those interests were so relatively small as compared with Fox, both on first and later runs, that competition with Fox was unsubstantial owing to the dominance which the latter's theatre holdings gave it. In 53% of the cities, containing 33% of Fox's theatre interests, Fox was the only defendant operating theatres. Thus, it appears that there was little, if any, competition between Fox and any other defendant in 71% of the cities and in respect to 74% of the theatres in which Fox had an interest.

Warner had similar theatre interests in 243 theatres located in 26 cities. In 14 of those cities, or 54%, containing 89 theatres, or 37%, there was competition with other defendants. In an additional 8% of the cities, containing 5% of Warner's theatre holdings, there were other defendants having theatre interests, but those interests were so relatively small as compared with Warner, both on first and later runs, that competition with Warner was unsubstantial owing to the dominance which the latter's theatre holdings gave it. In 19% of these cities competition between Warner and the only other defendants in the city was substantially lessened or eliminated by means of a pooling agreement affecting some or all of their theatres, and in this 19% were located 51% of Warner's theatre interests. And in 19% of the cities, containing 7% of Warner's theatre interests, Warner was the only defendant operating theatres. Thus, it appears that there was little, if any, competition between Warner and any other defendant in 46% of the cities and in respect to 63% of the theatres in which Warner had an interest.

Loew had similar theatre interests in 144 theatres located in 37 cities. In 32 of those cities, or 86%, containing 122 Loew theatres, or 85%, there was competition with other defendants. In 3% of these cities, competition between Loew and the only other defendant in the city was eliminated by means of a pooling agreement affecting all of their theatres, and in this 3% were located 7% of Loew's theatre interests. And in 11% of the cities, containing 8% of Loew's theatre interests, Loew was the only defendant operating theatres. Thus, it appears that there was little, if any, competition between Loew and any other defendant in 14% of the cities and in respect to 15% of the theatres in which Loew had an interest. In the matter of mere geographical distribution of its theatres, Loew has the most favorable record of any of the major defendants. But it is to be noted that, while it is true that as to its neighborhood prior run theatres in New York, there was competition with RKO in the sense that both operated in New York on the same runs, nevertheless these two companies divided the product of the various defendant distributors under a continuing arrangement so that there was no competition between them in obtaining pictures. Indeed, on one occasion where Paramount was having a long dispute with Loew's as to rental terms for Paramount films to be shown in Loew's New York neighborhood circuit of theatres, no attempt was made by Paramount to lease its films to RKO for exhibition in the latter's circuit, nor was any effort made by RKO to procure Paramount films as they both evidently preferred to adhere to the existing arrangement, under which Loew's circuit consistently exhibited the films of itself, Paramount, United Artists, Columbia and half of Universal, while RKO exhibited the films of itself, Fox, Warner, and half of Universal. Accordingly, we think that the showing that 85% of Loew's theatres are in competition with theatres of other defendants is misleading and may properly be reduced by the exclusion of its New York neighborhood theatres. If this is done, it would give Loew a percentage of approximately 42% of its theatres in competition with other defendants in cities over 100,000.

RKO had similar theatre interests in 256 theatres in 31 cities. In 22 of these cities, or 72%, containing 190 theatres, or 74%, there was competition with other defendants. In an additional 6% of the cities, containing 4% of RKO's theatre holdings, there were other defendants having theatre interests, but those interests were so relatively small as compared with RKO, both on first and later runs, that competition with RKO was unsubstantial owing to the dominance which the latter's theatre holdings gave it. In 16% of these cities, competition between RKO and the only other defendants in the city was substantially lessened or eliminated by means of a pooling agreement affecting some or all of their theatres, and in this 16% were located 15% of RKO's theatre interests. And in 6% of the cities, containing 7% of RKO's theatre interests, RKO was the only defendant operating theatres. Thus, it appears that there was little, if any, competition between RKO and other defendants in 28% of the cities and in respect to 26% of the theatres in which RKO had an interest. With respect to mere geographical distribution, RKO's record was relatively good but it is to be noted that approximately 58% of its theatre interests were located in New York on neighborhood runs, and the same comments as to distribution of film made in regard to Loew's are applicable to RKO. If its New York neighborhood theatre interests were excluded from the category of theatres in competition with other defendants, the RKO percentage would then be only about 16% in competition with other defendants.

The major defendants had interests altogether in 1,112 theatres located in 87 cities of more than 100,000. In 46% of these cities, containing 23% of their theatre interests, only one of the major defendants owned theatres in the area. In 11.5% of the cities, competition between them was substantially lessened or eliminated by means of pooling agreements, and in this 11.5% were located 16% of their theatre holdings. In an additional 11.5% of the cities, containing 17% of their theatre interests, there was more than one defendant having theatre interests in the city, but the position of one defendant was so dominant relative to the others that competition between them was unsubstantial. In 31% of the cities, containing 44% of their theatre interests, there was competition among the defendants. But the New York neighborhood theatres of Loew and RKO, which are included in reaching the 44% figure, should properly be excluded because there is no competition between Loew and RKO in obtaining pictures for the reasons we have already given. This would reduce the percentage of defendants' theatres which compete with one another to 27.

It appears from the foregoing that the effect of the geographical distribution in cities having a population of more than 100,000 was substantially to limit competition among the major defendants. The details upon which our results have been based appear in the statistical data set forth at the end of the opinion in Appendix 2 [not reproduced herein].

The plaintiff contends that the figures as to geographical distribution require a finding that there was an agreement to divide territory, but the evidence indicates that much of the acquisition of theatres was due to the buying up of circuits and that the purchases at least in some of these cases involved competition among certain of the defendants. We, therefore, do not find an agreement to divide territory geographically in the organization of the defendants' theatre circuits, but we do hold that the geographical distribution became a part of a system in which competition was largely absent and the status of which was maintained by fixed runs, clearances and prices, by pooling agreements and joint ownerships among the major defendants, and by cross-licensing which made it necessary that they should work together. The argument of some of the defendants that they had no opportunity to change this geographical status not only seems inherently improbable but affirmatively contradicted by the making of pooling agreements and entering into joint ownership with one another. Moreover, even in the relatively few areas where more than one of the major defendants had theatres, competition for first-run licensing privileges was generally absent because the defendants customarily adhered to a set method in the distribution and playing of their films. In substantiation of the general picture, the plaintiff has shown, on the basis of a study of four seasons between the years 1936 and 1944, that during this period the privilege of first-run exhibition of a defendant's films was ordinarily transferred from one defendant to another only as the result of dissolution of a theatre operating pool or an arbitrary division of the product known as a "split". The lack of competition which we have described has undoubtedly been induced in large measure by the reliance of the defendants on each other in obtaining pictures for use in their various theatres throughout the country. The defendants were also dependent on one another to obtain theatre outlets for their own pictures, for the best customers of any defendant were ordinarily one or more of the other defendants.

We think that there can hardly be adequate competition among the defendants where such interdependence exists. Moreover, when the defendants were interdependent as to a great part of their activities, it necessarily would affect not only competition among themselves, but with independents. We have already found such effects in the various concerted practices of the defendants which have restricted competition with independents. In our former opinion, we provided for a system of competitive bidding for film in the belief that such a system would sufficiently control the reliance of the major defendants on one another's product and theatres. That system having been rejected by the Supreme Court, we must find some other means of preventing the major companies from being in a state of interdependence which too greatly restricts competition.

[Vertical Integration]

One of the chief matters referred to us by the Supreme Court is the effect of vertical integration upon competition in the industry. While vertical integration would not per se violate the Sherman Act, the Supreme Court has made it clear that if such intergration is conceived with a specific intent to control the market or creates a power to control the market which is accompanied by an intent to exercise the power, the integration becomes illegal.

We are not satisfied that the plaintiff has shown a calculated scheme to control the market in the conception of the defendants' vertical integration, rather than a purpose to obtain an outlet for their pictures and a supply of film for their theatres. But here we are presented with a conspiracy among the defendants to fix prices, runs and clearances which we have already pointed out was powerfully aided by the system of vertical integration of each of the five major defendants. Such a situation has made the vertical integrations active aids to the conspiracy and has rendered them in this particular case illegal, however innocent they might be in other situations. We do not suggest that every vertically integrated company which engages in restraints of trade or conspiracies will thereby render its vertical integration illegal. The test is whether there is a close relationship between the vertical integration and the illegal practices. Here, the vertical integrations were a definite means of carrying out the restraints and conspiracies we have described. Moreover, we concluded in our prior findings, and the Supreme Court has affirmed our conclusion, that the distribution practices of the defendants constituted an attempt to obtain a monopoly in exhibition forbidden by the Sherman Act, a conclusion which requires the elimination of our Findings 152 and 153, as explained above.

[Existence of Monopoly Power]

In respect to monopoly power, we think it existed in this case. As we have shown, the defendants were all working together. There was a horizontal conspiracy as to price-fixing, runs and clearances. The vertical integrations aided such a conspiracy at every point. In these circumstances, the defendants must be viewed collectively rather than independently as to the power which they exercise over the market by their theatre holdings. See American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781.

If viewed collectively, the major defendants owned in 1945 at least 70% of the first-run theatres in the 92 largest cities, and the Supreme Court has noted that they owned 60% of the first-run theatres in cities with populations between 25,000 and 100,000. As distributors, they received approximately 73% of the domestic film rental from the films, except Westerns, distributed in the 1943-44 season. These figures certainly indicate, when coupled with the strategic advantages of vertical integration, a power to exclude competition from these markets when desired. This power might be exercised either against non-affiliated exhibitors or distributors, for the ownership of what was generally the best first-run theatres, coupled with the possession by the defendants of the best pictures, enabled them substantially to control the market. If an intent to exercise the power be thought important, it existed in this case, as we noted above in finding an attempt to monopolize.

Furthermore, the power to fix clearances and runs which we have found existed and was exercised by the major defendants was in itself a power to exclude independents who were competitors, and was accompanied by actual exclusion.

The Remedy

The Supreme Court has denied the remedy of requiring the defendants to offer films to the highest bidder and has required us to find some other means of obviating the illegal practices and attempted monopoly on the part of the defendants.

[Separation of Exhibition from Production]

As an injunction is regarded as an insufficient remedy there must, in our opinion, be a divorcement or separation of the business of the defendants as exhibitors of films from their business as producers and distributors. Just as in the Crescent case affiliation was held to furnish the incentive for carrying out the conspiracy that there existed, we find that vertical integration has served a similar purpose in the case at bar.

Therefore, the divorcement we have determined to order appears to be the only adequate means of terminating the conspiracy and preventing any resurgence of monopoly power on the part of the remaining defendants. Beyond all the above considerations there would seem to be an inherent injustice in allowing defendants to avoid divorcement when they would have been originally subjected to it merely because two of their confederates eliminated themselves from a compulsory decree which would have been based upon the participation of all in the conspiracy.

Joint Interests

The Supreme Court has asked us to reconsider the dissolution of joint interests between defendants and independents because some partial interests of independents were said to have been held by investors rather than actual or potential exhibitors. Paramount and RKO need not be considered, since they are now subject to the provisions of consent decrees. Fox has obtained an order, agreed to by the plaintiff, dealing with the disposition of all its joint interests, except its partial ownership through its affiliate National Theatres Corporation in Evergreen State Amusement Corporation. Fox contends that evidence offered at the trial after remand shows that one Newman, who had an indirect interest of about 15% in Evergreen, was not an actual or potential theatre operator. He became the president and manager of Evergreen, but that in itself did not make him a co-owner with Fox in that company, and his interest of about 15% seems to us no more than the interest of an investor. Nor do we find any indication that he would have been an independent operator of a theatre but for his investment in Evergreen. Prior to the investment he had been an employee of National and for some seven years had had no ownership in a theatre. In the circumstances, we hold that the interest of Fox in Evergreen need not be dissolved, although it will be subject to a general divorcement like the other theatre holdings of Fox from its distribution business.

In respect to Warner, the plaintiff has consented to an order disposing of all its joint interests. In the case of Loew, the plaintiff has agreed to an order disposing of its joint interest in Buffalo Theatres, Inc., and seems to have approved a stipulation made in open court providing for the disposition of all its other joint interests.

In our opinion the orders and stipulations relating to joint ownerships of Fox, Warner and Loew with independents are sufficient to dispose of all questions arising under the requirement of the Supreme Court that joint interests with actual or potential operators be dissolved. In view of the situation presented by the making of these orders and stipulations, our Findings 115, 116 and 117 should be vacated, and the proposed substituted findings of the plaintiff should be denied.

Franchises

We are directed by the Supreme Court to reconsider our prior decision prohibiting franchises in all cases, and as an initial step conforming to the Supreme Court's opinion our Finding 89 should be vacated. On reconsideration, we adhere to the view that the three remaining major defendants as well as the three minor defendants should not be allowed to grant franchises except to independents. Such a practice ties up the distribution of films and restricts competition by independents to obtain pictures for what we regard as unnecessarily long periods and has been a method of unlawful diccrimination in the past. We hold, however, that any of the defendants may grant franchises to an independent operator, provided that the result thereof will be to enable such independent to compete effectively with theatres affiliated with a defendant or with theatres in the new theatre circuits to be formed pursuant to our order of divorcement. We see no objection to the substituted Finding 89 proposed by the plaintiff and adopt it accordingly.

Clearance

Our disposition of clearances was in no way altered by the Supreme Court. We think, however, that our Finding 77 was inadvertent and should be modified so as to read as follows, thus conforming to paragraph 4 in Section II of our decree based upon the finding:

> "A grant of clearance, when not accompanied by a fixing of minimum admission prices or not unduly extended as to area or duration affords a fair protection of the interest of the licensee in the run granted without unreasonably interfering with the interest of the public."

The substitute for Finding 78 proposed by the plaintiff is denied.

Discrimination

The plaintiff requests cancellation of paragraphs 8 and 9 in Section II of our former decree, which include provisions as to discrimination, and wishes to substitute a flat prohibition against including in licenses made with affiliated exhibitors or circuits of theatres certain contract provisions by which discriminations against small independents and in favor of the large affiliated and unaffiliated circuits were accomplished, as this court stated in Finding 110, affirmed by the Supreme Court. These provisions would only be illegal if inherently discriminatory or used in a discriminatory manner. We think it sufficient to provide, as was done in the Paramount consent decree, that the distributor defendants be enjoined "from licensing any feature for exhibition upon any run in any theatre in any other manner than that each license shall be offered and taken theatre by theatre, solely upon the merits and without discrimination in favor of affiliated theatres, circuit theatres, or others." It may be objected that this is competitive bidding which has been rejected by the Supreme Court, but it neither involves calling for bids nor licensing picture by picture. A group of pictures may be licensed to one who wishes to take them without conditions being imposed that he can obtain one only if he purchases the group. We hold that the request of the plaintiff for the cancellation of paragraph 8 of Section II of the decree should be granted, but paragraph 9 should stand as it is. A new paragraph corresponding with the one we have quoted above from the Paramount consent decree should be substituted for the cancelled paragraph 8.

The Three Minor Defendants

We can see nothing in the arguments on behalf of these defendants for special treatment except an attempt to revise some of our former findings of fact and conclusions of law which have been affirmed by the Supreme Court. We have already dealt with the questions of franchises and discrimination earlier in this opinion. In respect to road shows, we see no reason for exempting them from the various injunctive provisions of our decree. It is entirely possible for the licensor to license for road shows, so long as it is not done in a discriminatory manner, either at a flat rental or on the basis of some percentage of what the show is thought likely to yield. But it would be unlawful in this, as in the case of other licenses, for the licensor to require a fixed admission price as a condition of the license.

The three minor defendants argue that they should be allowed to retain their old customers irrespective of discrimination and contend that the Supreme Court has indicated that they possess this right. We cannot so interpret the opinion of the Supreme Court. It only presented the argument that, if competitive bidding had been sanctioned, the three minor defendants would lose the relationships they had with old customers and would be at a disadvantage in competing with the more powerful major defendants whose own theatres were not subject to competitive bidding. The system of preferring old customers undoubtedly aided discrimination in the past and served as a ready excuse for a fixed system of runs and clearances and was to that extent unlawful. When separation of the business of distribution from that of the operation of theatres is effected, there will be a favorable market for the three minor defendants in which to license their pictures. This will be not only a compensation for inability to prefer their old customers but apparently a substantial added advantage to them in obtaining a greater opportunity to license their pictures than they had heretofore.

The Decree

The Supreme Court has asked us to divest any theatres which may be fruits of past illegal restraints or conspiracies. It may appear also to be necessary, irrespective of our general plan of divorcement, to terminate theatre monopolies in certain local situations possessed by any individual defendant or by any new theatre circuit which may be set up under the divorcement decree we propose. The plaintiff has presented insufficient evidence to justify us in disestablishing particular theatres either on the theory of local monopolies or of illegal fruits, and indeed it has formally stated that evidence of illegal fruits is not now available. So far as local monopolies are concerned, the statistics presented by the plaintiff were furnished to support the need for a general divorcement which this opinion has sanctioned and did not precisely reach any situations of local monopoly which may require divestiture of specific theatres. Moreover, certain of the statistics presented by the plaintiff go no farther than the year 1945, and there have been various changes in theatre holdings since that date. Accordingly, consideration of fruits and local monopolies will be suspended in the decree which we shall presently make.

In accordance with the instructions of the Supreme Court it is necessary that the provisions of paragraph 6 in Section III of our former decree in respect to expansion of theatre holdings be vacated. A provision should be substituted in the decree to be entered which enjoins the three exhibitor-defendants and any theatre-holding corporation resulting from the divorcement we propose from acquiring a beneficial interest in any additional theatre unless the acquiring exhibitor-defendant or corporation shall show to the satisfaction of the court, and the court shall first find, that such acquisition will not unduly restrain competition in the exhibition of feature motion pictures.

It is argued by the plaintiff that a limited prohibition of cross-licensing of pictures among the three major defendants should be adopted temporarily. We think such a limitation would be unwarrantedly injurious both to those defendants and to the public. The plaintiff proposes that each major defendant be enjoined from licensing more than half of its films to any of the other defendants pending the completion of divorcement plans in those towns where the plaintiff claims there are no independent theatres or at least on independent first-run theatres. The plaintiff evidently hopes that such a limitation would induce independents to acquire theatres in so-called closed towns. Unless and until that should happen, one or two of the major defendants might be unable to show more than half of their pictures in such towns, and if but one of the major defendants had theatres there, those theatres could show only half of the films of the other two. It is manifest that this limitation upon cross-licensing would injure both the major defendants and the public, who would be deprived of seeing some of the pictures. In addition to this, the selection of the particular pictures in the half which could be licensed would involve some difficulties and might prove in the end to have been unwise, both for the distributor involved and the public interest. Our remedy of divorcement will meet all of the purposes for which the plaintiff is striving. We do not think that its completion will be so delayed as to justify this doubtful and difficult ad interim remedy proposed by the plaintiff.

[Arbitration]

The arbitration system and the Appeal Board which has been a part of it have been useful in the past and as we understand it have met with the general approval of the plaintiff and of those defendants who have agreed to it. In our opinion it has saved much litigation in the courts and it should be continued. Accordingly, the three major distributor-defendants and any others who are willing to file with the American Arbitration Association their consent to abide by the rules of arbitration and to perform the awards of arbitrators, should be authorized to set up an arbitration system with an accompanying Appeal Board, which will become effective as soon as it may be organized after the decree to be entered in this action shall be made, upon terms to be settled by the court upon notice to the parties to this action.

The decree herein should be settled on notice and should be in accord with what we have said in the foregoing opinion. The terms as to divorcement set forth in the plaintiff's proposed decree seem to us satisfactory, except that the reference to paragraph 10 in Section III relating to joint interests, which we have rejected, should be deleted. We also approve of the further proposal of the plaintiff that the plaintiff and the defendants shall submit plans calling for such divestiture of theatres as may comply with the requirements of the Supreme Court regarding local monopolies and illegal fruits. Any ultimate disposition, however, must await a later order which shall be dependent upon the proof the plaintiff may furnish as to local monopolies and illegal fruits. We may perhaps indulge in the hope that the parties may be able to agree as to the disposition of any such interests, as they have done in the case of joint ownerships.

We do not approve of the provisions limiting cross-licensing pending the completion of divorcement or the provisions relating to dissolution of joint interests with independents, which have been sufficiently provided for in stipulations of the three major defendants and the orders entered thereon to which we have made reference. Our opinion indicates other changes in the decree proposed by the plaintiff, which should be embodied in the amended decree.

We have specified former findings which should be vacated and in some instances have set forth proper substitutes. Further disposition of any findings to be made should await submission by the parties.

Submit proposed amended decree and findings on or before September 20, 1949.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civ. 24-464. August 12, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Webb-Pomerene Act

Export Associations—Allocation of Markets and Allied Practices—No Immunity Granted by Webb-Pomerene Act.—Injunctive relief was granted in a Government proceeding against two domestic export associations organized under the Webb-Pomerene Act, manufacturers, distributors, and exporters of alkalis charged with violating Section 4 of the Sherman Act. When the parties admitted execution of the cartel agreements but contested their illegality under the Sherman Act, it was held that the Webb-Pomerene Act afforded no right to export associations to engage on a world wide scale in international agreements allocating exclusive markets, assigning quotas in sundry markets, fixing prices on an international scale, and selling through joint agents. Congress did not exempt such agreements or such practices as restricting the import and export of a commodity, eliminating competition among producers, and price-fixing from the scope of the Sherman Act by Section 2 and at the same time outlaw the consequences of such economic conduct by Section 4 of the Webb Act.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.175, and the Webb Export Trade Associations Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 687.

For the plaintiff: John F. X. McGohey, United States Attorney, New York, New York; J. Francis Hayden, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, Francis E. Dugan, Special Attorney, Antitrust Division and Manuel M. Gorman, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, of Counsel.

For the defendants: Cravath Swain & Moore, Attorneys for Defendant United States Alkali Export Association, Inc., New York, New York; William Dwight Whitney, and George S. Leonard, of Counsel; Dwight, Harris, Koegel & Caskey, Attorneys for Defendant Church & Dwight Company, Inc., New York, New York; H. [Nature of Action]

Opinion of KAUFMAN, D. J.

[Digest] This is an equitable proceeding brought by the United States under Section 4 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 26 Stat. 209, 15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 4, to restrain certain practices alleged to be in violation of Section 1 of the same Act. The complaint was filed in March, 1944, and named as defendants two domestic export associations organized under the Export Trade Act of 1918 (Webb-Pomerene Law, 40 Stat. 516, 517, Public Law 126, 65th Cong., 2nd Sess., 15 U. S. C. A. Secs. 61-65), thirteen corporate members of one or the other of said associations, and a corporation of the United Kingdom together with its New York subsidiary.

Defendants, all of which either manufacture, distribute, or export alkalis, are charged with entering into a series of agreements and engaging in concerted practices whereby the export of alkalis from the United States to many markets of the world has been restricted; the import of alkalis into the United States from abroad has been prohibited; the production of alkalis within the United States has been curtailed and limited; competition between defendants and others has been eliminated; the trade of domestic competitors of the defendants engaged in exporting alkalis has been restrained; and prices of caustic soda in the United States have been fixed.

[The Defendants]

The principal defendant, the United States Alkali Export Association (hereinafter referred to as "Alkasso"), was organized as a Delaware corporation in 1919, and, pursuant to the Webb Act, filed in that year with the Federal Trade Commission a verified written statement containing the location of its offices, names and addresses of its officers and stockholders, and a copy of its certificate of incorporation and by-laws.

The California Alkali Export Association, otherwise known as "Calkex", is the second domestic export association named in the complaint. Calkex, a California corporation organized in 1936, was originally composed of three corporate members, West End Chemical Co., Inc., Pacific Alkali Co., Ltd., and American Potash & Chemical Corporation. Of these corporations, however, West End is the sole remaining member of Calkex and the only defendant in this case.

Also joined as parties defendant are Imperial Chemical Industries, Ltd. (hereinafter termed "I. C. I."), a British corporation which manufactures and exports alkalis, and its wholly owned New York subsidiary, Imperial Chemical Industries (New York) Ltd. (later referred to as "I. C. I., New York").

The complaint charges as "co-conspirators," though not defendants, the American Potash & Chemical Corporation, mentioned above, Solvay Process Company, an important domestic producer of alkalis and a member of Alkasso from 1919 until 1941, Solvay et Cie—hereinafter termed "Belgian Solvay"—a corporation of the Kingdom of Belgium and a principal manufacturer of alkalis in Europe, and I. G. Farbenindustrie Aktiengesellschaft, more widely known as "I. G. Farben", one of the largest chemical companies in the world at the time the acts and agreements alleged by the Government occurred.

The International Cartel

No issue of fact is presented with regard to the agreements, . . . which the Government maintains are violations of its anti-trust laws. The answers of Alkasso and of I. C. I. admit the execution of agreements relating to the division of world markets, the assignment of international quotas, and the fixing of prices in territories other than the United States, and the individual corporate members of Alkasso admitted knowledge of these cartel arrangements. Solely for determination, therefore, is their legality under the provisions of the Sherman Act and whether or not, if illegal under the Sherman Act, they are exempted from condemnation by virtue of the provisions of the Webb Act.

Insofar as the application of the Webb Act is concerned, the case is res nova, since the Webb Act has not heretofore been construed by the courts.

[Alleged Justification of Webb Act]

Defendants make no attempt to conceal the substance of their arrangements to allocate the world markets in alkalis. Indeed, the broad outlines of the successive agreements were openly communicated to the Federal Trade Commission (Def. ex. B, C, S). Defendants rest their claim of justification entirely upon the provisions of the Webb Act, claiming that, by virtue of that statute, the anti-trust laws have no applicability to world wide apportionment of territory, establishment of exclusive markets, and the fixing and maintenance of prices between foreign competitors and export associations organized in the United States under the terms of the Act.

Section 2 of the Webb Act (40 Stat. 517, 15 U. S. C. A. § 62) [4] provides that the Sherman Anti-Trust Act shall not, except in certain enumerated instances, apply to the formation of an export association engaged solely in the export trade or to "an agreement made or act done in the course of export trade by such association * * *." The question for determination, therefore, is whether or not this language authorizes export associations organized under the Webb Act to enter into such arrangements as those above set forth.

The decisions under the Sherman Act leave no doubt that all contracts, combinations, and conspiracies aimed at obstructing the foreign commerce of the United States come within the broad prohibitions of the anti-trust laws. United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106; United States v. Pacific & Arctic Co., 228 U. S. 87; Thomsen v. Cayser, 243 U. S. 66; United States v. Sisal Sales Corp., 274 U. S. 268; United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416; United States v. National Lead Co., 63 F. Supp. 513; aff'd 332 U. S. 319. The rule of competition, basic in American economic philosophy and approved by express legislative fiat in the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, is equally applicable to our export trade as it is to trade among the several states. United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, supra, p. 444. The contention by the defendants during the trial was that the purpose of the Webb Act was to repeal entirely the provisions of the Sherman Act as they applied to international trade and to leave our foreign commerce completely unfettered by any statutory restraints.

Unquestionably the cartelization of the world, if accomplished by the individual corporate defendants separately and not through

[4] "Sec. 2. That nothing contained in the Act entitled 'An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies', approved July second, eighteen hundred and ninety, shall be construed as declaring to be illegal an association entered into for the sole purpose of engaging in export trade and actually engaged solely in such export trade, or an agreement made or act done in the course of export trade by such association, provided such association, agreement, or act is not in restraint of trade within the United States, and is not in restraint of the export trade of any domestic competitor of such association: And provided further, that such association does not, either in the United States or elsewhere, enter into any agreement, understanding, or conspiracy, or do any act which artificially or intentionally enhances or depresses prices within the United States of commodities of the class exported by such association, or which substantially lessens competition within the United States or otherwise restrains trade therein."

an association organized under the Webb Act, would be a flagrant transgression of the anti-trust laws. As to this, there could be no doubt since the decision of Judge Rifkind in the National Lead case, 63 F. Supp. 513.

Therefore, apart from the question presented here as to the immunity afforded to export associations organized under the Webb Act, the National Lead case, together with the case of United States v. General Dyestuff Corp., 57 F. Supp. 642, also decided by Judge Rifkind, indicates clearly that the type of economic conduct pursued by defendants is prohibited by the Sherman Act. See also United States v. General Electric Co., 80 F. Supp. 989, 1009; United States v. Timken Roller Bearing Co., 83 F. Supp. 284, 307-309; United States v. General Electric Co., 82 F. Supp. 753, 847. Consequently, to hold in this case that defendants, by employing the medium of an export association, may restrain our foreign trade with impunity, uninhibited by the sanctions and proscriptions of the Sherman Act, would be to ignore the plain intent of the statute. To remove cartel agreements, if made by export associations organized under the Act, from the comprehensive ban of the Sherman Act, while at the same time condemning similar agreements by others, would be to overlook the fact that it was the evil of restraint on commerce which Congress sought to extirpate, and not the creation of a preferred class which was to be free to continue the evil. Cf. United States v. Sisal Sales Corp., supra; United States v. American Tobacco Co., supra; United States v. General Dyestuff Corp., supra.

[Webb Act Interpreted]

Whatever exemptions the Webb Act did bestow upon associations organized thereunder, it affirmatively appears upon the face of the statute that Congress did not intend thereby to abandon the rule of competition as applied to our export trade. All privileges accorded under the Act are removed should any association, agreement or act be "in restraint of the export trade of any domestic competitor of such association." This strong solicitude for those in this country who would be forced to compete with such associations abroad would be entirely frustrated if such cartel patterns as were established here were permitted under the Act. For as long as one rival of an export association sought to vend his wares in foreign territory, international agreements of the kind here involved could do naught but restrain his trade. As the Supreme Court has succinctly indicated (International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392, 396), "it is unreasonable, per se, to foreclose competition from any substantial market." See, also: United States v. Griffith, 334 U. S. 100, 107. Nor can the stifling effect of such arrangements upon potential competition be overlooked. Cf. United States v. Griffith, supra, p. 107; United States v. Timken Roller Bearing Co., supra, p. 318.

Far from restricting the application of the anti-trust laws abroad, the Webb Act made what, at the time of its passage, were wide extensions in the extraterritorial effect of those laws designed to preserve competition.[5] Section 5 of the Act enlarged the investigatory powers of the Federal Trade Commission to situations where " * * * an association either in the United States or elsewhere has entered into any agreement, understanding, or conspiracy, or done any act which artificially or intentionally enhances or depresses prices within the United States of commodities of the class exported by such association, or which substantially lessens competition within the United States or otherwise restrains trade therein * * * ." (Italics supplied.)

Section 4 of the Act was of even broader scope. It granted world-wide operation to Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (Pub. Law 203, 63rd Cong., 2nd Sess., 38 Stat. 719, 15 U. S. C. A. § 45). The effect of Section 4 of the Webb Act was to condemn such "unfair methods of competition", wherever committed. Nor does this section draw any distinction between associations organized under previous sections of the Webb Act and other corporations engaging in export trade, and consequently must be held to apply equally to export associations as to others.[6]

The Federal Trade Commission Act was specifically designed to remedy the economic abuses which had been revealed by actions instituted under the Sherman Act, Federal Trade Commission v. Keppel & Bro., 291 U. S. 304, 310. And included within the generic term "unfair methods of competition" are exactly those practices which the Sherman Act declares illegal [7], including price maintenance [8], establishment of quotas [9], and the suppression of competition [10]. Therefore, the Webb Act, by declaring such conduct, if engaged in by American enterprise abroad, would be illegal, became a remedial statute. It was designed to make the rule of competition equally as applicable to our commerce between nations as it was to trade among the several States. Branch v. Federal Trade Commission, 141 F. 2d 31, 36.

A reading of the Webb Act in its entirety must therefore lead to the rejection of the claim that the cartel agreements involved herein are sanctioned under the Act. It cannot be concluded that Congress exempted such agreements and practices from the scope of the Sherman Act by Section 2 of the Webb Act, and at the same time outlawed the consequences of such economic conduct by Section 4 of the Webb Act. The only alternative would be to argue that the purpose of the Act was to vest exclusive control and jurisdiction of extra-territorial restraints of trade with the Federal Trade Commission. That hypothesis, however, is no longer open. United States Alkali Association v. United States, 325 U. S. 196.

The legislative history of the Webb Act, when considered as a whole, refutes any claim that the Act was intended to leave the foreign commerce of the United States free of, and unfettered by, the anti-trust laws. The isolated statements, removed by defendants from context and cited for that contention, do not reflect the true purport of the Act and are unreliable guides for judicial interpretation in the face of the entire Congressional history of the statute indicating an abiding contrary intent. See Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U. S. 683, 692.

The Webb-Pomerene Act was not haphazard legislation passed without the considered judgment of Congress [11] and the executive branch. [11a] Behind its passage was a thorough investigation by the Federal Trade Commission, which, in 1916, published a two volume report entitled "Cooperation in American Export Trade", calling for the enactment of remedial legislation to enable American enterprise to garner its share of foreign trade.

The report of the Federal Trade Commission is especially significant because it was presented to Congress and represented the background of the drafting, debating, and passage of the Act. It called to the attention of Congress the large economic units of other countries against which American exporters and manufacturers had to compete, and recommended that those in this country engaged in foreign trade be permitted to cooperate in order to meet the competition of large foreign combines. But the entire emphasis of the Federal Trade Commission's recommendations was upon furthering competition between domestic and foreign concerns and not the elimination thereof.[12] Nor did the Commission leave any impression that it intended to free the [12] Federal Trade Commission, Report on Cooperation in American Export Trade (2 vols., 1916), Vol. I, p. 8. The Commission's summary of its recommendations (Vol. I, pp. 379-381) indicated its belief "that American exporters should be enabled to compete in foreign markets on more nearly equal terms with foreign competitors * * *. It does not believe that Congress intended by the antitrust laws to prevent Americans from cooperating in export trade for the purpose of competing effectively with foreigners international commerce of Americans from all requirements of the trust laws. It fully recognized that "The dangers in cooperative action must be faced frankly and provided against fully"[13], but strongly believed that its goal could be achieved "without altering the policy of the antitrust laws or interfering with their enforcement".[14]

The committee reports submitted to the Congress prior to the passage of the Webb Act indicate that doubt as to the applicability of the Sherman Act to combinations of American manufacturers selling abroad necessitated declaratory legislation permitting the association of domestic concerns for the purpose of competing with foreign nations in extraterritorial markets.[15] The reports specifically pointed out that "The bill does not authorize any violation of the present antitrust laws."[16]

The constant reassurance by sponsors of the legislation to the Congress that the bill did not remove the sanctions of the antitrust laws as applied to our foreign trade is cogent and compelling reason for concluding that the framers of the Webb Act had no intention of permitting international combinations to trade unbridled in the markets of the world. The advocates of the Act constantly maintained that its passage was necessary to enable smaller producers and manufacturers in this country to form cooperative selling agencies in order to compete effectively with large foreign units abroad.[17] Suggestion that by so doing, all restraints upon our foreign commerce were thereby repealed was sharply rejected.[18]

Senator Pomerene openly stated to the Senate considering the Act: "* * * * although an association organized under the pending bill should enter into some agreement or perform some act in a foreign country which met the requirements of law there, if at the same time the effect of it were such as to materially interfere with the policy of the United States under its trust laws, then it would be subject to the jurisdiction of the authorities of this country, including both the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice." (56 Cong. Rec. 170)

In refuting the contention that the Webb Act would permit associations formed under the Act to participate in world-wide cartels, Senator Pomerene declared:

"* * * if I may refer to another phase of this debate, a very plausible argument was made yesterday when the position was taken in substance that this bill was a repeal of the Sherman antitrust law, and if it became the law of the land and these associations were authorized they would at once seek to control the foreign market, and probably enter into a combination with foreign companies and cartels engaged in the same line of business * * *."

"If the Senator when making this argument

Act when read as a whole, and giving careful attention to the entire legislative history of its passage, the conclusion is irresistible that the Webb-Pomerene Act affords no right to export associations to engage on a world-wide scale in practices so antithetical to the American philosophy of free competition. The international agreements between defendants allocating exclusive markets, assigning quotas in sundry markets, fixing prices on an international scale, and selling through joint agents are not those "agreements in the course of export trade" which the Webb Act places beyond the reach of the Sherman Law. Cf. United States v. Borden, 308 U. S. 188; American Cooperative Serum Ass'n v. Anchor Serum Co., 153 F. 2d 907, 912, cert. den. 329 U. S. 721.

In reaching this conclusion, the ruling of the Federal Trade Commission in the Silver Letter [19], suggesting the possible legality of international agreements touching only foreign markets and the continued adherence by the Commission to a modified version of that position has not been overlooked.[19a] But, as has already been indicated (United States Alkali Ass'n v. United States, 325 U. S. 196, 208), the Commission is not entrusted with enforcing the Sherman Act. Nor is it the Commission which ultimately determines what economic behavior constitutes "unfair methods of competition" within the purview of the Federal Trade Commission Act. *Federal Trade Commission v. The United States as Territory Embraced by the Cartel

Notwithstanding the foregoing interpretation of the Webb Act relating to the division of foreign markets, price fixing, and elimination of competition abroad, it is deemed advisable to dispose of the questions of fact presented at the trial. The first of these is whether or not the United States was territory reserved to Alkasso under international compact.

The contracts introduced in evidence between Belgian Solvay and I. C. I. in 1928 and 1935 (Gov. ex. 1 and Def. ex. F) and the contract of Belgian Solvay, I. C. I., and I. G. Farben of 1938 (Def. ex. G) are ambiguous and do not, standing by themselves, lead to an inference that the United States was specifically a market prohibited to any of the contracting parties.[20] Nevertheless the preponderance of the evidence does indicate that at least as early as 1933, the United had recited facts instead of fancies, there might have been some force in his utterances, but he was giving free rein to his imagination. The Senator overlooked the fact that this bill does not repeal the Sherman law." (56 Cong. Rec. 172)

Further statements by Senator Pomerene were to the same effect. He declared, in speaking of the Webb Act, "It does not repeal, it does not affect the Sherman law so far as it applies to domestic commerce. It strengthens the Sherman law and the Federal Trade Commission law, in so far as unfair practices are concerned beyond territorial lines." (56 Cong. Rec. 173); he specifically pointed out that "There is nothing in this bill authorizing the division of territory abroad." (56 Cong. Rec. 181)

[19] The letter was written in response to an inquiry regarding certain hypothetical issues raised by the silver producers and was published in a news release of August 6, 1924. See Temporary National Economic Committee, Monograph No. 6, Export Prices and Export Cartels, 76th Cong., 3d Sess., 1940, p. 125.

The Commission, in these proceedings, has inquired into the reasonableness of cartel agreements as they affect our foreign trade rather than condemn them as illegal per se. Cf., however, the following economic reports published by the Federal Trade Commission: Report on the Copper Industry, Part I, The Copper Industry of the United States and International Copper Cartels (1947), pp. 225-226; Report on the Sulphur Industry and International Cartels (1947), pp. 13-16, 82-84, 104-105; Report on International Steel Cartels (1948), pp. 5, 12-13, 40-41, 65, 115; Report on International Electrical Equipment Cartels (1948), pp. 8-9.

[20] The intent of the agreement of 1928 to bar shipments to the United States is not clear. In any case, the 1935 agreement superseded all prior arrangements and indicated that the United States was "Territory common to both Parties" and that I. C. I. and Belgian Solvay would each have the right "to manufacture and to sell in the United States * * *." The division of 1938 shows joint participation in the American market.

States became territory subject to international partition among the defendants.

In the spring of 1933, a draft of the 1933 agreement later entered into by I. C. I. and Alkasso was submitted to Finch, Alkasso's president, by Wallace on behalf of I. C. I. (Gov. ex. 214). Included in the draft were the following terms:

> "To Great Britain, the Continent of Europe, Australia and New Zealand, Alkasso will not ship in excess of their 1932 shipments to each or any of these markets.
> "I. C. I. will correspondingly not increase their shipments to U. S. A. and its dependencies Cuba, Hawaii, etc." (Gov. ex. 216.)

Finch returned the draft to Wallace, then in London, with the two clauses quoted above deleted. Attached to his accompanying letter was a slip saying: "Discussed this matter with George White who will be writing you." (Gov. ex. 216.) White, who headed I. C. I.'s subsidiary in New York, sent a letter to Wallace on July 13, stating that the omissions requested by Finch were made "in order to avoid embarrassing questions which might be raised by the Federal Trade Commission should they call for a copy of the agreement * * * ." The letter indicated further, however, that the deletions "will not alter the agreement or change the undertaking mutually reached in New York * * * ." (Gov. ex. 215.)

Finch admitted that he had deleted the two provisions from the draft of the 1933 agreement and that he had discussed the draft with White. He further testified that he subsequently agreed that Alkasso would thereafter refrain from exporting to the continent of Europe, Great Britain, and the British Empire, including New Zealand and Australia. He denied categorically, however, that any undertaking had been made to restrain British imports into the United States or that he had told White the deleted provisions of the agreement had been stricken to avoid complications with the Federal Trade Commission. Other members of the Association's board of directors testified that they were unaware of any agreement on the part of I. C. I. to remain without the market place of this country. But Finch's recollection of the events of 1933 was not at all clear,[21] while defendants' own evidence shows that Alkasso's directors would not necessarily be formally informed of such a provision in a cartel agreement (Def. Ex. A).

Further evidence that the market of the United States fell within the world division of territory is contained in the Minutes of the General Purposes Committee of I. C. I. in 1936 where Nicholson, a senior director of I. C. I., in summarizing the cartel agreement of 1936 between I. C. I., Alkasso, and Belgian Solvay, indicated that the United States was included within the exclusive territory allotted to Alkasso (Gov. ex. 221). It is conceded by I. C. I. that the minutes correctly record Nicholson's summary of the agreement (Gov. ex. 226) and it further appears that, based upon this summary, I. C. I.'s directors approved the arrangement which placed this country among the private markets of Alkasso (Gov. ex. 222). Thereafter, I. C. I., in its reports to Alkasso relating to international shipments grouped the United States among those countries included within Alkasso's exclusive sphere (Gov. ex. 194, 195, 196).

Finch testified that the provision granting the United States to Alkasso as an exclusive market was reinserted by I. C. I. in its draft of the 1936 agreement merely as a sop to prevent shipments by Alkasso to the continent and that he had again insisted upon its deletion.

Further testimony adduced on the part of defendants was that the paucity of imports into this country during the period under consideration was due to the economic unfeasibility of shipping alkalis to this country from abroad because of tariff barriers, extra freight charges, and a domestic preference for liquid caustic which could not be shipped across the ocean in that state.

In weighing the conflicting evidence, the contemporaneous documents showing that the United States was, at the time the agreements were executed, intended to be part of the exclusive territory of Alkasso must be given greater weight than the defendants' present denials. United States v. U. S. Gypsum Co., 333 U. S. 364, 395-396; United States v. Corn Products Refining Co., 234 Fed. 964, 978; United States v. General Electric Co., 82 F. Supp. 753, 844-845; see United States v. Hartford-Empire Co., 46

[21] At first Finch disclaimed all knowledge as to any agreement on the part of Alkasso to cease shipping to Europe in 1933. He later admitted such arrangement after his memory had been refreshed by the Government's documentary evidence.

F. Supp. 541, 553. The silent fact that the final written agreement made no reference to the allocation of the United States, while almost every other country in the world was divided and apportioned by these parties to the cartel, coupled with the fact that the markets of the United States were shown to be a subject of substantial international interest (Gov. ex. 20, 21, 194, 195, 196), leads to the conclusion that the omission was born of the fear that an express allocation of the United States would make the agreement illegal on its face. This is made stronger by the fact that the domestic market of each of the other cartel members was considered vested in the home producer (See Exhibit D to the complaint), and that, under the agreements, which made each member of the cartel responsible under quota arrangements for all material exported from its exclusive territory, Alkasso assumed liability for all shipments of alkalis from the United States. (See Exhibits A, B, C, D, to the complaint.) Statistics introduced in evidence by both sides are one in showing how negligible were imports of all alkali products into this country during the entire period of the conspiracy. (Gov. ex. 198, 199, Def. ex. P, Q) All of the above facts must be considered in the light of evidence indicating that as early as 1929 Alkasso and I.C.I. had entered into such close alliance that it was "understood there will be complete cooperation between us in order to avoid competition in any part of the world * * *." (Exhibit B to the complaint)

Nor is it entirely evident that defendants were without economic motive for including the United States within the provisions of the international compact. Many of the factors relied upon to prove the unfeasibility of imports here would apply equally as well to the markets of Canada and Mexico, countries prominently mentioned in the division of international trade. These two markets were always within the export orbit of Alkasso despite recognition in the agreements of the principle of Imperial preference (Gov. ex. 174, 175), which would logically have made Canada a market of I.C.I.

Defendants' own economic expert admitted that the same economic deterrents against exporting alkalis from Europe to the United States existed with respect to exporting from this country to Great Britain, and that there was no more likelihood of an agreement by Alkasso not to invade the market of the United Kingdom than there was for a covenant by I. C. I. to refrain from exporting to the United States. Yet Finch admitted the existence of an express obligation by Alkasso to respect the sanctity of the British home market and such was the tenor of the agreement of 1936 (Exhibit D to the complaint).

The factors suggested to keep imports of alkali out of the United States in no way made it economically unfeasible for Alkasso to ship to Europe had it so wished (Gov. ex. 10, 11, 12, 14, 19). While the American tariff would no doubt prove discouraging, the period of greatest imports of caustic and soda ash into this country occurred at a time when the tariff rate was at its highest (Def. ex. P, Q), and Alkasso itself had at one time expressed a willingness to enter into foreign markets where there existed high preferential tariff rates (Gov. ex. 20). Even assuming it unprofitable for foreign producers to export to the United States, it is not difficult to see the advantage to Alkasso of a covenant protecting the domestic market when it is considered what a sustained policy of foreign dumping would have done to the stable price of alkalis which existed in this country during the period in question, or how such a policy would have interfered with the methods Alkasso employed to prevent caustic from reaching the hands of competing American exporters.

What has already been said about the Webb Act renders unnecessary lengthy discussion of the legality of an agreement between an export association organized under the Act and a foreign seller prohibiting imports into the United States. It should be pointed out, however, that the provisos of Section 2 of the Webb Act withdraw all immunities afforded by the Act from associations that enter into any agreement, understanding, or conspiracy "which substantially lessens competition within the United States or otherwise restrains trade therein", or which is "in restraint of trade within the United States". There can be no question that imposing upon the domestic market restraints which ban all imports of a given commodity into this country is conduct expressly made subject to the anti-trust laws by these provisos of the Webb Act. The original contention by defendants, later abandoned, that such a provision was not an unreasonable restraint of trade within the meaning of the Sherman Act is without merit. United States v. General Dyestuff

Corp., 57 F. Supp. 642, 649; United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416, 444; United States v. National Lead Co., 63 F. Supp. 513, 527.

Participation of Calkex in the International Cartel

Calkex asserts as a defense that it was never party to the international cartel. The contention, however, is without substance, for, as will appear below, the very formation of Calkex sprang from the overall international agreements. Once in existence, Calkex agreed to market its material through agents of Alkasso and to limit its exports to specifically designated territories (Exhibit E to the complaint). Although Kalkex never signed the international agreements, its entire conduct was directed toward conforming to and abetting the pattern set by the international cartel. Thus Calkex withdrew from Europe, where prior to its formation its members had sold considerable quantities of soda ash (Gov. ex. 148, 149, 156, 157, 159). Calkex, along with its members, respected the cartel arrangements in business negotiations (Gov. ex. 150, 152, 153, 160, 161, 162), entered into direct discussions with I. C. I. regarding certain markets, and sold ash through I. C. I. agents in China and India. In its own eyes, Calkex considered itself a full and intimate member of the international alliance (Gov. ex. 150, 151, 154). Under these circumstances, there is no basis for its exoneration.

Elimination of Export Competitors

Having by international agreement abolished competition in foreign trade and obtained its share of international markets, Alkasso proceeded upon what overwhelming evidence shows to be a deliberate attempt to eliminate all domestic competition in the exporting of alkalis. The practices engaged in to this end were pursued as a direct consequence of the international cartels [22] and forcefully indicate why such international restraints of trade are interdicted by the Sherman Act and in no way sanctioned by the Webb Act.

It was incumbent upon Alkasso, starting from the earliest international agreement, to assume total responsibility under its export quotas for all alkalis exported from the United States.[23] Exports from this country to exclusive territories of other nations would consequently be deductible from Alkasso's tonnage in joint markets. More important, however, such exports might endanger the entire fabric of the international cartel structure.[24] On the other hand, exports from the United States by non-members of the cartel to Alkasso's exclusive or joint markets would sharply curtail the price advantage achieved through monopoly control.[25] In order, therefore, to keep its own markets free from price competition, to keep international agreements intact, and to secure maximum export tonnage thereunder for itself, Alkasso set upon a course to stifle all exports of alkalis from the United States other than shipments effected through or under its direction.

To prevent exports through independent sources, all agreements with members from 1924 until 1940 contained provisions appointing Alkasso exclusive agent for the sale of members' material abroad and permitting independent shipments only upon Alkasso's express permission in writing. This exclusivity clause was stricken from membership agreements in 1940 after the Federal Trade Commission had suggested its illegality in the case of the Pacific Forest Industries.[26] As a matter of practice, however, members thereafter consistently ad-

I. in joint markets, Alkasso employed the monopolistic price as a weapon to abolish American competition in these areas. (Gov. ex. 82, 83, 85, 102, 104) But this was only an alternative remedy to the control of material and the elimination of all competing exports from the United States itself (Gov. ex. 83, 84, 104).

The Federal Trade Commission recommended that Pacific Forest Industries, an association organized under the Webb Act, no longer maintain contracts which in any way prohibited members from selling material directly to other American exporters. See Temporary National Economic Committee, Investigation of Concenhered to the policy of refusing requests for export tonnage and considered Alkasso their sole agent for foreign sales (Gov. ex. 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69); while Alkasso continued to "contact members, the material of which was moving abroad through channels other than the Association".

Further implementing its policy of controlling all possible material which might fall into the hands of other exporters, Alkasso, until 1939, maintained with nonmember manufacturers of alkalis within the United States contracts containing provisions appointing it the exclusive export agency of the producer (Gov. ex. 120).

Additional precautions against unauthorized exports were taken by each of Alkasso's members by inserting in all domestic sales contracts clauses stipulating that the material sold was for domestic consumption only and not for export. Such a provision was adopted "as a result of the decision of the directors of the Association" and was another link in the chain to prevent the shipment of alkali tonnage from the United States through exporters who were not members of Alkasso (Gov. ex. 60, 61, 62). Whenever domestic purchasers of material permitted alkalis to filter into unauthorized export channels, defendants thereafter cut off the buyer's supply by refusing to make additional sales (Gov. ex. 16, 17, 68, 79, 80, 87, 92, 98, 112, 114), for it was the open and avowed policy of the Association and its members to prevent what was euphemistically termed "bootlegging" (Gov. ex. 70, 71, 99, 100).[27]

An elaborate statistical system was utilized to obtain knowledge of all shipments exported outside the Association and reaching foreign territory. If alkalis reached Alkasso's own markets, it was informed of the shipments and the source, through reports from its foreign agents. Material infiltrating into the exclusive preserve of other parties to the cartel was identified and such information transmitted to Alkasso directly from I. C. I. or indirectly through Belgian Solvay. Alkasso also maintained inspectors at docks within the United States to scrutinize material leaving the country. From this information, blacklists of all "bootleggers" were compiled by Alkasso and circulated throughout its membership to prevent future sales. Lest all these intricate measures against errant exports should prove in some instances inadequate, the Association maintained "standing orders with certain parties in the trade to purchase at any time any loose or available tonnage which could reach the hands of export dealers or regular exporters". (Gov. ex. 9.)

The formation of Calkex was an integral part of the plan to control the exports of domestic competitors. Calkex was a direct incident and corollary of the cartel arrangement in that the primary purpose of its organization was to withdraw California ash from the already apportioned territory of Norway, New Zealand and Australia, and to market it in conjunction with and under the direction of Alkasso. Once established, Calkex employed the same devices to stifle export competitors as did Alkasso and cooperated fully with Alkasso toward this end.[28]

The effect of the means adopted by Alkasso in eliminating its export competitors was due in no small measure to the concentrated power manifested by Alkasso in the export field. For the larger part of the duration of the conspiracy, Alkasso was the export agent for almost all the producers of alkalis in the United States. Until 1941 it exported or controlled the export of well over ninety percent of all alkali material leaving this country. Finch, the Association's president, could recall the name of only one domestic manufacturer of alkalis which exported independently for a short period of two years, and well he could speak with a sense of accomplishment when, in 1937, he wrote of the "great measure of control we have extration of Economic Power, Monograph No. 6, Export Prices and Export Cartels, 76th Cong., 3d Sess., 1940, p. 130.

[27] The attitude of defendants regarding independent exporters is well portrayed by the bold statement of Calkex in its correspondence that "it will be unsatisfactory to allow the Los Angeles Chemical Company to remain in the export soda ash business. This same argument applies also to other jobbers who likewise wish to continue exporting small quantities of Soda Ash." (Gov. ex. 110)

[28] Calkex by a resolution of its Board of Directors required members to export exclusively through Calkex (Gov. ex. 146). It also abolished the formal requirement of the resolution in 1940 (Gov. ex. 147), but all members continued to export exclusively through Calkex thereafter. In domestic sales, Calkex members likewise maintained contract provisions restricting the use of ash sold to the consumption of the purchaser (Gov. ex. 164, 165). Its members supplied statistics regarding export shipments made independently of Calkex (Gov. ex. 107), and cooperated fully with Alkasso in eliminating export competition (Gov. ex. 74, 93, 95, 97, 108).

ercised over all foreign markets for many years, in the face of enormous supplies available here for subterranean traffic, not to mention the great benefit our control has meant to the British generally in the way of prices." (Gov. ex. 98.)

There is no merit in defendants' original argument that the word "competitor", in the proviso of the Webb Act making the Sherman Act applicable to any agreement or act "in restraint of the export trade of any domestic competitor of such association", was not intended to embrace the independent exporter. The explicit language of the proviso rebuts this contention. Nor does answer lie in the fact that the Webb Act seemingly contains no prohibition against monopoly combinations, for whatever degree of combination the Webb Act may exempt from the anti-trust laws, it does not sanction the use of monopoly power to extinguish the competition of independent domestic competitors engaged in the export trade.

Not only must the practices of defendants outlined above therefore fall as part of the overall international cartel heretofore declared illegal, but they must also be condemned as integral elements in an overt conspiracy, specifically interdicted by the Webb Act, to eliminate domestic competitors engaged in the export trade.

No lengthy discussion is necessary of the long line of decisions under the Sherman Act condemning such practices when their result is to restrain trade or fetter competition. The policy dictated by the Act prohibits the use of concerted boycotts and coercion,[29] circulation of blacklists,[30] the employment of espionage systems,[31] where that conduct tends in any way to "hinder or obstruct the free and natural flow of commerce * * * ." Federal Trade Commission v. Beech Nut Packing Co., 257 U. S. 441, 453. The general provisions in the domestic contracts of Alkasso's members prohibiting the resale or export of alkali runs afoul of the Sherman Act in that defendants have unlawfully attempted to control the path of alkalis in interstate and foreign commerce after sale of such material has occurred. Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Park & Sons Co., 220 U. S. 373; United States v. Schrader's Son, Inc., 252 U. S. 85; Federal Trade Commission v. Beech Nut Packing Co., supra. The exclusive agency relationship between Alkasso and its members, whether lawful or not when standing alone, cannot be sanctioned when it has been utilized as an important element in a conspiracy to eliminate export competition. See United States v. General Dyestuff Corp., 57 F. Supp. 642, 648.

Stabilization of the Domestic Price of Caustic

The final aspect of the conspiracy charged is that Alkasso and its members employed the Association as a device for fixing and stabilizing the price of caustic soda in the United States within the meaning of the proviso of the Webb Act declaring the anti-trust laws applicable to any agreement, understanding, conspiracy or act "which artificially or intentionally enhances or depresses prices within the United States." There is no substantial dispute as to the facts presented by the evidence; contention is based mainly upon the inferences to be derived therefrom.

Both defendants' and the Government's evidence indicate a remarkable stability in the price of caustic soda from a period beginning in 1931. The government's statistics from the Oil Paint & Drug Reporter reflect a practically constant domestic quotation of $2.30 per ton for solid caustic from August 9, 1937, until the end of 1944 (Gov. ex. 212). From November, 1933, until August, 1937, the quotation for domestic caustic soda in car lots was a constant rate of $2.60 per ton (Gov. ex. 212, 213), while contract quotations between 1931 and 1933 varied only between $2.50 and $2.55. Defendants' exhibits show more fluctuation in price over the long run period—1922-1942. But the defendants' expert admitted that their price studies reflected an unusually stable price structure from 1931 on, while the report of Diamond Alkali, which appeared to assume an important part in the construction of defendants' statistics, showed only one shift in the price of solid caustic during the twelve year period, 1931-1943 (Gov. ex. 224). The domestic price stability of caustic is in marked contrast to what defendants showed were frequent and sharp fluctuations in the average export return (Def. ex. K), a contrast more significant when it is considered that the unwavering price on the domestic market failed to reflect the recession of 1937, while export prices showed sharp response to the vagaries of the economic cycle.

Taking the remaining evidence introduced with this stable price structure of caustic in the domestic market as background, there is ample ground for the conclusion that defendants utilized Alkasso as a means of removing surplus caustic soda from the domestic market in order to maintain the current price. Defendants argue that the price of soda ash also remained stable throughout the same period, and from that they seek exoneration on the ground that no charge of price fixing of the latter commodity has been made. However, the fact that the Government has not levelled any charge against defendants because of the stability of the price of soda ash does not alter the conclusions to be drawn from the stability of the price of caustic soda, especially where it has been shown that the problem of disposing of a surplus in caustic soda, unlike soda ash, was a continuing and plaguing one for the Association and its members.

Behind the need for the employment of Alkasso as a thermostat to keep constant the domestic price of caustic soda was the rapid rise from 1923 to 1945 in the production of electrolytic caustic (Gov. ex. 201). From 1931 to 1941, electrolytic caustic production increased some 270%. While the production of ammonia caustic remained relatively stable until the advent of the war, electrolytic caustic production, compared with total production of caustic, increased from 28% in 1923 to over 50% in 1941 and to 63% in 1943 (Gov. ex. 200, 202). As previously noted, this tremendous rise in the amount and percentage of electrolytic caustic produced was due to the great increase in the demand for chlorine. But it placed upon the Association and its members the urgent and pressing problem of disposing of excess production in such a way that it would not affect the going price in the domestic mart.

Alkasso was always keenly aware of the problems caused by the increase in electrolytic caustic. Finch wrote in 1942 of the "problem" confronting "the industry with this surplus material which continues to increase" (Gov. ex. 140). In 1933, Finch, in a memorandum to Dow Chemical Company with regard to membership in Alkasso, declared that "Hereunder the electrolytic problem is always recognized * * *" (Gov. ex. 126A), and at Alkasso's meeting of directors, it was indicated that the problem of the Association was primarily one "of distributing excess caustic soda" (Gov. ex. 129).

The concern demonstrated was not merely solicitude over the disposal of material which the domestic market could not consume, but was intimately identified with the preservation of the domestic price structure of defendants' product. In a letter to Alkasso, Dow, an electrolytic producer, mentioned "the intelligent export disposition of * * * (Dow's) * * * output, or the possible alternative of a heavy cost to those who participate to a much greater percentage in the country's total alkali business * * *" (Gov. ex. 124). And Hooker, another electrolytic manufacturer, wrote in opposition to a proposed plan of Solvay: "If we take the position in advance, which I think we have heretofore done, that we expect to place all of our material in the Domestic market and if possibly the other electrolytics do likewise, Solvay * * * might be forced * * * [to] give up their avaricious suggestion." (Gov. ex. 125)

So, too, in its negotiations with the British subsequent to 1933, it is clear that Alkasso was motivated by its need to obtain additional markets in order to dispose of material which might tend to depress the price of caustic within the United States. White of I. C. I., New York, indicated that if Carbide & Carbon, a manufacturer which purchased chlorine and caustic, utilized products other than caustic in its production, the backup in caustic in this country might force Finch to press too hard for export concessions from I. C. I., resulting in a breakdown of the international cartel and a crash in the domestic price. (Gov. ex. 217, 218) The British tried to persuade Finch to solve this problem by agreement with Carbide, but expressed concern over the fact that "the export market is being regarded by all these people as the ultimate element for stabilization." (Gov. ex. 220) On June 4, 1935, White wired London of the average prices in the United States market, indicated that the excess caustic problem was not one of a temporary nature, and said that he had informed Finch that it was doubtful "whether I. C. I. could accept or would discuss change in quota to relieve internal stress brought about by domestic competitive affairs" (Gov. ex. 220). In the same cable White informed London that "* * * duPonts had learned of excessive caustic stocks and of possibility of break in price here arising from disagreement with us * * *". During this period the British remained adamant in refusing to change quotas "enabling states industry continue to maintain stability home market * * *" (Gov. ex. 20). Not only does the evidence demonstrate an intent on the part of Alkasso and its members to maintain domestic price stability by means of Alkasso, but it indicates clearly certain methods and devices employed by Alkasso to that end.

It was the policy of the Association to export caustic in preference to all other alkalis. By far the greatest proportion of its exports were electrolytic caustic (Gov. ex. 133). Premiums were placed on higher grade caustic to encourage purchases of lower surplus grades. (Gov. ex. 135) Markets not supplying a ready demand for caustic were abandoned, and Alkasso declined the sale of tonnage in other alkali products because "* * * the Association problem primarily being one of caustic soda and an increase in caustic shipments being more desirable for that reason". (Gov. ex. 129).

While at the beginning of each year, Alkasso established export quotas or allocations of material for each of its members based on the percentage of the member's sales to total sales in the domestic market, it readily abandoned its prearranged allocations and granted preferences or "overages" to producers of electrolytic caustic whenever surpluses of that material accrued. These overages granted to electrolytic producers were correspondingly deducted from the tonnage previously scheduled to be accepted from ammonia producers, and were, in the words of Finch, "due to the pressure upon us for electrolytic material * * *". Alkasso also purchased surplus electrolytic caustic from non-member producers upon the latter's request and stored it at already overcrowded warehouses.

Defendants' showing of overages in bicarbonate and ash does not rebut the inferences to be derived from their conduct in marketing caustic in the light of the testimony of Finch that the overages in ash and bircarbonate were due to brand preferences or to decisions by members not to ship and the absence of a showing that there was any surplus or overproduction of these latter products. Nor does the minuteness, percentagewise, of overages in caustic to total production remove the taint which must be accorded this practice, where it is shown to be an important element in a scheme designed to remove all surplus caustic from this market in order to stabilize the domestic price.

The final aspect of defendants' conduct aimed at implementing the stabilization program in caustic was to employ Alkasso as a huge warehouse for the storage of excess electrolytic caustic until such material could be moved abroad and out of the domestic market. This was done, according to Finch, directly as a result of the pressure exerted upon Alkasso by electrolytic members and non-members. While the normal carrying requirements of Alkasso demanded a stockpile of from 2,500 to 4,000 tons of caustic, at times it had on hand average monthly stocks in excess of 10,000 tons of material. In 1935 the cost of storage to Alkasso for caustic held in this country approximated $3,000 per month (Gov. ex. 142) and the average yearly cost computed in 1939 amounted to $25,000 (Gov. ex. 144). When storage at seaboard by Alkasso became too expensive, excess caustic was stored at members' plants for the account of Alkasso and Alkasso paid five cents per month per ton for storage expenses thus incurred.

In summary then, it must be concluded that the domestic price of caustic showed remarkable stability over a large period of the conspiracy; that defendants utilized Alkasso to dispose of surplus caustic when it would tend to depress the price in the domestic market; that the purpose in preferential exports of caustic, allocation of overages to producers of surplus electrolytic caustic, and the storing of excess material was to neutralize the tendency of surplus caustic to become a price depressant.

A suggestion is made that stabilization of price was not "artificially enhancing or depressing" prices within the meaning of the proviso of the Webb Act. The claim is baseless. Interpretation of the anti-trust laws does not turn upon such semantic niceties. The practice of domestic price stabilization by an export association and its members finds no sanction in the Webb Act and must be condemned under the Sherman Act, when, for half a century, the Supreme Court "has consistently and without deviation adhered to the principle that price-fixing agreements are unlawful per se under the Sherman Act and that no showing of so-called competitive abuses or evils which those agreements were designed to eliminate or alleviate may be interposed as a defense." [32]

Defendants assert that the export market, representing only from between seven to ten per cent. of the total production of caustic in the United States, would not prove to be an effective device for maintaining constant price levels within this country. The evidence would not necessarily warrant this conclusion. In any case, however, the facts come within the rule laid down in the Socony Vacuum Case, 310 U. S. 150, declaring illegal any agreement for the purchase of "distress" or surplus material amounting to a small percentage of the total product where it is shown that such practice would materially interfere with the free interchange of those competitive forces which ultimately determine the commodity's going price. See United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416, 445.

The Issue of Mootness

Defendants originally argued that the issues involved in the case had become moot in that the recent war caused a practical termination of all international agreements and that there appeared little likelihood that the practices complained of would be resumed. The evidence fails to bear out this claim.

In 1941, two years after Britain had entered the war, Alkasso and I. C. I. intended to renew the 1936 agreement but such action was made unfeasible by British economic regulations. Despite the state of belligerency and uncertainty of governmental policy, however, both parties did arrive at a mutual understanding. While recognizing that wartime conditions made it mandatory to limit the extent of cartel coverage to some degree, they nevertheless reaffirmed the division of exclusive territories which had been allotted under the agreement of 1936 and also provided in detail for certain joint territories (Exhibit F to the Complaint). Finch testified that this division of markets was respected by both parties until the time the instant action was begun. Alkasso also negotiated sales abroad through agents of I. C. I. in South America until 1944 under arrangements stemming from the cartel.

The evidence also shows that I. C. I. and Alkasso employed the cartel as a means of allocating material during the period of war shortages. In 1942 Alkasso wrote to the Department of Commerce to protest contemplated governmental action in dividing the South American markets between Britain and the United States. Alkasso set forth the international cartel agreements between it and I. C. I. and requested "that both of us be left alone under this arrangement to work out the problem of feeding Latin American industries, for which previous arrangements were made and along which lines both of us have been working and will continue to work." (Gov. ex. 57.)

It is clear, therefore, that the war did not bring about a general abandonment of all cartel practices. No doubt the war necessitated curtailment of many cartel activities; perhaps it even caused the demise of certain co-conspirators such as Belgian Solvay and I. G. Farben. But there is no evidence indicating that defendants considered the state of war other than an inopportune interlude necessitating only retrenchment until the cessation of hostilities, when again the world markets in alkalis could be apportioned.

On reargument held on May 19th and 20th, 1949, counsel for defendants stated:

> "* * * this association is going very strong today in foreign markets, and there is not any cartel of any kind whatsoever, and if we can receive some expression or instruction as to whether we can or cannot have one and under what circumstances, and all the rest of it, that is an important thing. I see no reason why we can't tomorrow have a new one if we need to under the law * * *."

Injunctive relief is therefore eminently proper, for even where activities have totally ceased before the institution of suit, the equitable power to provide against their resumption still subsists unless it be shown that there is no reasonable expectation that such practices will recur. United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416, 448; see also Walling v. Haile Gold Mines, 136 F. 2d 102, 105; United States v. National Lead Co., 63 F. Supp. 513, 526-527.

[32] United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150, 218; also United States v. Trenton Potteries, 273 U. S. 392; Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211; Standard Sanitary Mfg. Co. v. United States, 226 U. S. 20.

Defendant Calkex urges that injunctive relief against it is improper because for all intents and purposes it has been inactive in the export field since 1941 and two of its three original members have withdrawn, leaving it a mere ghost or corporate shell. However, the evidence shows that the demise of Calkex in the export field was due solely to wartime difficulties in obtaining supplies of ash to export and in obtaining adequate shipping facilities. Despite these obstacles, the directors in 1941 recommended "that the Association should be preserved regardless of present difficulties" (Gov. ex. 166). Nor has the agreement between Calkex and Alkasso, which continues to link Calkex to the international conspiracy, ever been formally terminated. The fact that there is now but one member of Calkex still nursing its faint flame of life does not preclude the revival of its export activity when post-war supplies of ash become more readily available. This is all too likely to occur when it is considered that the withdrawal of its principal member, American Potash, was at the insistence of the Alien Property Custodian who is now no longer in control of corporate policy. Furthermore, Calkex has not seen fit to rest throughout these proceedings solely upon the contention that it has become defunct. On the contrary, it has argued in behalf of the propriety of the conduct engaged in by all defendants.

Since there appears reasonable likelihood of the resumption of its activities, and since it has constantly asserted the legality of its past behavior, Calkex, too, must submit to the equitable powers of this court. United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, supra; Otis & Co. v. Securities & Exchange Commission, 106 F. 2d 579, 584; Walling v. Haile Gold Mines, supra. See United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U. S. 290, 308.

Findings of fact will be made and a decree will be entered in accordance with this opinion.

New Jersey Fair Trade Act, Sherman Antitrust Act

Trade-Marked Gasoline—Minimum Resale Price—Conspiracy Defense Dismissed.—An interlocutory injunction was granted to a producer of trade-marked gasoline enjoining service station operators, who had notice of the minimum retail selling price as set out in a contract between the producer and one of its retailers, from selling gas below the prices fixed therein. It was held that the gasoline was in fair and open competition, that the gasoline company had complied with all the statutory requirements and was therefor entitled to the protection of the New Jersey Fair Trade Act. The defense that the producer was engaged in a conspiracy to restrain trade and fix prices in defiance of the federal antitrust laws was dismissed since the company's minimum prices were at least one cent lower than those charged by other companies.

For the plaintiff: Francis V. D. Lloyd, (Morrison, Lloyd & Griggs, Hackensack, N. J.).

For the defendants: Albert S. Gross, Hackensack, N. J., (George J. Kauper, Union City, N. J.).

[Nature of Action]

GRIMSHAW, J. S. C.: This matter is presently before me on a motion by the plaintiff for an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants from using the trade-mark, name and brands of the plaintiff in connection with the retail sale of gasoline at prices below those fixed by the plaintiff.

[Parties]

The plaintiff, California Oil Company, a Delaware Corporation, authorized to do business in New Jersey, is engaged in the production and sale of gasoline. It markets its products under the trademark and name of "Calso" and "Calso Supreme". As a result of advertising, these names and brands have acquired a special significance in connection with the products of the plaintiff and are, as a consequence, a valuable part of the good will which plaintiff enjoys.

Defendants, Irving Reingold and Philip Stark, trading as Rein Motors, operate a gasoline service station in the City of Hackensack. At this station defendants sell at retail the gasoline produced by the plaintiff. In doing so these defendants use the trademark, name and brands of the plaintiff.

[Minimum Retail Selling Price]

On March 4, 1949, plaintiff, in order to secure for itself the protection afforded by the provisions of the so-called Fair Trade Act, R. S. 56:4-3, 6, executed a contract with Refinery Calso Station, one of the retailers of its products. In the contract, plaintiff fixed the minimum retail selling price for its product sold under the name of "Calso" at 17.1 cents per gallon and the minimum retail price of its product sold under the name of "Calso Supreme" at 19.1 cents per gallon. These prices were in addition to all state and federal sales and excise taxes. Following the execution of the contract, plaintiff notified all retailers of its products, including these defendants, of the minimum retail prices so fixed. In April 1949 plaintiff notified all its retailers, including these defendants that thereafter the minimum resale price for "Calso" would be 17.7 cents per gallon and for "Calso Supreme" 19.7 cents per gallon, exclusive of state and federal sales and excise taxes. Defendants failed to charge the prices set by the plaintiff. They sold and still continue to sell plaintiff's products at a price approximately 2.4 cents below the minimum price plaintiff has set. Plaintiff protested and sought to have defendants follow its price list but defendants refused and this litigation ensued.

That the enactment of the Fair Trade Act, R. S. 56:4-3, 6 was within the authority of the legislature is no longer open to question. Old Dearborn Distributing Co. v. Seagram Distillers Corporation, 299 U. S. 183; Johnson & Johnson v. Weissbard, 121 N. J. Eq. 585. Nor can it be disputed that the plaintiff took the necessary steps to qualify it for the protection afforded by the statute.

[Consent Alleged as a Defense]

Defendants concede that they received notice of plaintiff's minimum price list. But they base their refusal to conform upon three grounds. The first is that the plaintiff consented to the sale of its products at reduced prices. In his answering affidavit Irving Reingold says that in December of 1948, three months before plaintiff fixed its minimum prices, Reingold met with G. S. Cramner, plaintiff's sales manager and Martin Beck, the distributor from whom defendants obtained their supplies of gasoline. According to Reingold, he told his companions of defendants' intention to sell at reduced prices and they approved. This statement is categorically denied by both Cramner and Beck. Frankly I don't believe it. Six months prior to the meeting Beck had contracted to supply defendants with gasoline. The contract had several years to run. It is not reasonable that Beck who had nothing to gain by gratuitous concessions would deliberately invite a price war. Plaintiff was not a party to the contract nor was it consulted about the execution of the contract. At the time of the meeting, plaintiff was preparing to establish minimum prices for the resale of its gasoline. It strains belief to conclude that plaintiff would imperil all its plans for no conceivable benefit.

Reingold also charges that Refinery Calso Station, the retailer with which plaintiff made its price setting contract, is owned by the plaintiff and therefore the contract is a fraud on the statute. The allegation is made upon information and belief. It is supported by no proof other than an affidavit by a ubiquitous fire chief from Hackensack who swore that he accompanied Reingold to the Calso Refinery Station and heard the son of the proprietor say that plaintiff owned the station. Such evidence is not worthy of consideration. And it is interesting to note that the station owner was in court at the time of the argument but was not called upon to substantiate defendant's allegations either by affidavit or oral testimony.

[Conspiracy Raised as a Defense]

The last charge by Reingold, also upon information and belief, is that the plaintiff, in concert with the major oil producers of the country, is engaged in a conspiracy to restrain trade and fix prices in defiance of the federal anti-trust laws. Defendants charged that all the oil companies had set the same price for the retail sale of gasoline and that such action established a prima facie case of conspiracy. Unfortunately defendants' own proofs refute this allegation. Their own affidavits establish the fact that plaintiff's minimum prices are at least one cent lower than those charged by the other companies. So, whatever other producers may be doing, plaintiff, certainly, on the proofs before me, is not engaged in any conspiracy to restrain trade and fix prices by horizontal agreements with other producers.

[Interlocutory Injunction Granted]

Plaintiff's product is in fair and open competition. In setting a minimum price for its resale, plaintiff has complied with all the statutory requirements. It is entitled to protection. An interlocutory injunction will issue.

[¶ 62,476] Automatic Radio Manufacturing Company, Inc. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit. October Term, 1948. No. 4381. August 22, 1949.

On appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, FORD, J.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Suit to Recover Royalties—Alleged Patent Misuses—Unlawful Monopoly Not Established.—The validity of a patent license agreement was reaffirmed when the Court dismissed the appeal of a radio manufacturer from an interlocutory judgment which ordered the payment of royalties to a patent holding company engaged in radio research. None of the defenses alleging that the licensor had so misused the monopoly of its patent grants as to have disentitled itself to any relief were sustained. The fact that the licensed apparatus was required to be marked with a restrictive use notice did not invalidate the agreement. Payment of royalties measured by a percentage of the selling price of all radio apparatus of specified types was found to be unobjectionable, the parties being free to bargain as to the basis upon which royalties were to be computed. No proof was found for the allegation that the licensor was engaged in an illegal endeavor to eliminate competition and secure an unlawful monopoly; even assuming such claim had been established, the license contract was itself a valid agreement and not part of such scheme.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1270.101, 1660.240.

Before MAGRUDER, Chief Judge, WOODBURY, Circuit Judge, and SWEENEY, District Judge.

Opinion of the Court

MAGRUDER, Chief Judge: This is a suit for royalties alleged to be due under a patent license agreement between the defendant, Automatic Radio Manufacturing Company, Inc., a Massachusetts corporation (hereinafter called Automatic), and the plaintiff's assignor, Hazeltine Corporation, a Delaware corporation. Plaintiff Hazeltine Research, Inc., is an Illinois corporation organized as a wholly owned subsidiary of Hazeltine Corporation. Hazeltine Electronics Corporation, another wholly owned subsidiary of Hazeltine Corporation, conducts the research program about to be mentioned. We shall refer to these corporations collectively as Hazeltine.

For many years Hazeltine has engaged in a program of radio research, as a result of which it has developed many patented inventions. Other patents have been acquired by it through various business arrangements. At the time of this suit, Hazeltine owned, or had the right to grant licenses under, five hundred and more patents and approximately two hundred patent applications, chiefly pertaining to radio and television. As one of the largest licensors in the radio field, it has granted nonexclusive licenses to radio manufacturers, permitting them to use any or all of Hazeltine's patents, in return for a royalty payment of a fixed percentage of gross sales of various types of radio equipment.

Automatic first became a licensee of Hazeltine in 1935. It defaulted on its royalty obligations under the first two agreements with Hazeltine. However, in each instance a settlement was reached, and the relationship continued. The present contract between the parties became effective September 1, 1942, to run ten years, subject to an option of earlier termination by the licensor upon the happening of certain specified events. Automatic was given a non-transferable, non-exclusive license, under a schedule of enumerated patents and all other patents with respect to which Hazeltine should acquire the right to grant licenses during the period of the agreement. The license authorized Automatic to utilize such patents in the manufacture and sale of certain described radio, phonographic, and other equipment, "limited to use in homes, use for educational purposes and private non-commercial use". Automatic agreed to pay royalties expressed in terms of a specified percentage of the selling price of each piece of the enumerated types of equipment manufactured and sold by the licensee, whether or not any of such patents were actually used in the manufacture of the particular apparatus. In any case, the agreement called for a minimum royalty payment of $10,000 per year.

The contract, in Article VI, further provided—and appellant makes much of this—that the licensee

> "agrees to mark all licensed apparatus manufactured and sold by Licensee hereunder, in readily legible form, with the statement 'Licensed by Hazeltine Corporation only for use in homes, for educational purposes, and for private, non-commercial use, under one or more of the following patents and under pending applications:' followed by the word 'Patent' and the numbers of the patents which are, in the opinion of Licensor, involved in apparatus of the types licensed hereunder manufactured by one or more licensees of Licensor. The marking required by this section shall be affixed to said licensed apparatus by attaching plates bearing the required marking or by affixing said marking on said apparatus in some other form equally permanent and apparatus not bearing such marking is not licensed."

It was found by the district court that the contract was executed in New York, and that at least part of the performance thereunder was due in New York. The concluding article of the contract provided that it was to be "governed by and interpreted in accordance with the laws of the State of New York."

Because of wartime restrictions on the production of radio sets for private use, Hazeltine waived demand for payment of the minimum annual royalties from September, 1942, through August 30, 1945. Upon refusal of Automatic to pay royalties thereafter, Hazeltine filed its complaint in the present case on April 9, 1947. Plaintiff prayed for a judgment that Automatic pay to Hazeltine the minimum sum due under the contract for the year ending August 31, 1946, with interest; that an accounting be had and that the further sums due be determined and decreed to be paid to the plaintiff with interest; "that defendant render to the plaintiff the statements required by said agreement throughout the continuance in force of said agreement"; that defendant pay plaintiff's costs herein; and that plaintiff have such other and further relief as may be just.

After Automatic's answer was filed, both parties filed motions for summary judgment and submitted supporting affidavits. A hearing was held on the motions, and the district court concluded that the case was one appropriate for the application of summary judgment procedure since there was "no genuine issue as to any material fact". Hazeltine's motion was granted and Automatic's motion denied. 77 F. Supp. 493.

On June 21, 1948, an "Interlocutory Judgment" was entered, in which it was adjudged and decreed as follows:

> (1) "That the license agreement between the parties dated as of September 1, 1942, 'is good and valid at law and in full force and effect.'
> (2) "That plaintiff recover from defendant as minimum royalty under the license agreement for the year ending August 31, 1946 the sum of $10,000 with interest, 'and that execution may issue therefor.'
> (3) "That plaintiff recover such further sums as are due from the defendant at the date of this judgment under said license agreement, and that the case be referred to a Master to take and state an account thereof.
> (4) "That 'a permanent injunction issue out of and under the seal of this Court directed to defendant, its officers and agents, enjoining and restraining them and each of them throughout the continuance in force of said license agreement from breaching such provisions of Articles IV and V thereof as relate to defendant's obligation to plaintiff to pay royalties and to keep records and render statements from which the proper amounts of such royalty payments may be determined'."

This court has jurisdiction to entertain the present appeal from such judgment, pursuant to provisions of the Judicial Code now found in 28 U. S. Code §§ 1291, 1292 (1), and 1294 (1) (1948). Counsel for both parties approved the judgment "as to form", and no question is presented here as to the scope of the injunction.

Automatic raised, and the district court considered, numerous defenses. In examining the judgment of the district court, we confine our attention only to those matters presented in this appeal. In its brief, Automatic has enveloped the case in an atmosphere of overreaching and chicanery hardly warranted on the record. A lengthy affidavit executed by one counsel for Automatic, and filed by Automatic in support of its motion for summary judgment, contains many sweeping claims and charges, but the affidavit was made for the most part "on information and belief", and not on personal knowledge, as required by Rule 56 (e).

I. Patent Misuse

Appellant has advanced a variety of defenses to sustain the proposition that Hazeltine has so misused the monopoly of its patent grants as to have disentitled itself to any relief under the present complaint.

Restrictive Use Notices

Automatic argues that the requirement in the license agreement that licensed apparatus be marked with a "restrictive use" notice, as above stated, constitutes such a misuse of the patent as to render the agreement unenforceable. This contention must be rejected on the authority of General Talking Pictures Corp. v. Western Elec. Co., 304 U. S. 175 (1938), and upon rehearing, 305 U. S. 124 (1938). In that case a non-exclusive license "was expressly confined to the right to manufacture and sell the patented amplifiers for radio amateur reception, radio experimental reception, and home broadcast reception." 304 U. S. at 180. The agreement required the licensee to affix to all amplifiers sold under the license a notice stating that the apparatus was licensed only for the aforesaid uses. Amplifiers with such notices attached were sold by the licensee to a purchaser who intended to and did put them to use in theaters as part of talking picture equipment. At the time of order, manufacture and sale, both the licensee and the purchaser knew of the purchaser's intended commercial use, and the purchaser knew that the license did not authorize the licensee to make and sell amplifiers for that use. Speaking through Mr. Justice Brandeis, the Supreme Court on rehearing reaffirmed its earlier view that the purchaser was accountable as an infringer.

> "That a restrictive license is legal seems clear. . . . The practice of granting licenses for a restricted use is an old one, see Rubber Company v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. 788, 799, 800; Gamewell Fire-Alarm Telegraph Co. v. Brooklyn, 14 Fed. 255. So far as appears, its legality has never been questioned . . . As the restriction was legal and the amplifiers were made and sold outside the scope of the license the effect is precisely the same as if no license whatsoever had been granted to [the licensee]. And as [the purchaser] knew the facts, it is in no better position than if it had manufactured the amplifiers itself without a license. It is liable because it has used the invention without license to do so." 305 U. S. at 127.

Consequently, the Court continued, there was > "no occasion to consider what the rights of the parties would have been if the amplifier had been manufactured 'under the patent' and 'had passed into the hands of a purchaser in the ordinary channels of trade.' Nor have we occasion to consider the effect of a 'licensee's notice' which purports to restrict the use of articles lawfully sold."

We must conclude from the decision in the General Talking Pictures case that a license agreement is not necessarily invalid because the licensee is granted a restricted right to make and vend a patented apparatus for use limited to a particular, described field, and is required by the agreement to affix to the licensed apparatus a notice of such restricted use. There may be circumstances under which a notice of restricted use would be inoperative and unenforceable as against subsequent purchasers, but that problem is not presented in the case at bar. And it is to be noted that the judgment from which this appeal is taken does not even command Automatic, the licensee, to comply with the term of the agreement requiring it to attach the restrictive use notices to the licensed apparatus sold by it.

General Talking Pictures Corp. v. Western Elec. Co. has not been overruled by the Supreme Court. Appellant contends that the case was wrongly decided, and that the authority of the case has been more or less undermined by subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court on related subject matters. From our examination of the latter cases we are not satisfied that this is so; at any rate, we decline to speculate on whether the case would now be followed by the Supreme Court. If the case is to be overruled, that must be done by the Supreme Court. Meanwhile, it is our duty to follow it.

In fact, it appears that none of the radio apparatus made and sold by Automatic has been marked with the restrictive use notice required by Article VI; in other words, Automatic has consistently ignored this provision of the agreement. Automatic makes the curious suggestion that its own breach of this term of the contract affords an independent ground for relieving it of the obligation to pay the stipulated percentage royalties. The argument is based upon the provision of Article VI that apparatus not bearing the restrictive use notice "is not licensed"; and therefore, Automatic argues, since "no licensed apparatus for which royalties are due under the contract has ever been made or sold", the district court erred in requiring an accounting of percentage royalties. Under the foregoing circumstances, no doubt Hazeltine would have had an election to proceed against Automatic on the theory of infringement. But the above contract provisions are for the benefit of the licensor, who may choose to waive them. Notwithstanding the failure of Automatic to attach the restrictive use notices, Hazeltine is entitled to insist upon the performance by Automatic of its contract obligation under Article IV to pay as royalties a percentage of the selling price of each complete apparatus of the types listed in Article III, Section 2, "sold by Licensee during continuance of this license".

Royalty Payments

It has been pointed out above that the license agreement gave Automatic the right to make use of any of Hazeltine's patents, and required Automatic to pay royalties measured by a percentage of the selling price of all radio apparatus of specified types manufactured and sold by Automatic, whether or not any particular apparatus in fact utilized any of the inventions of the Hazeltine patents, with a minimum royalty payment of $10,000 a year. There is no valid objection to this sort of agreement; the parties are free to bargain as to the basis upon which the royalties are to be computed. H-P-M Development Corp. v. Watson-Stillman Co., 71 F. Supp. 906 (D. N. J. 1947). Cf. Pyrene Mfg. Co. v. Urquhart, 69 F. Supp. 555, 560 (E. D. Pa. 1946); American Optical Co. v. New Jersey Optical Co., 58 F. Supp. 601, 606 (D. Mass. 1944); Ohio Citizens Trust Co. v. Air-Way Elec. Appliance Corp., 56 F. Supp. 1010, 1012 (N. D. Ohio 1944). As stated in one of Hazeltine's affidavits, this type of royalty clause was originally adopted "for convenience of accounting". The court below stated:

> "This is a convenient mode of operation designed by the parties to avoid the necessity of determining whether each type of defendant's product embodies any of the hundreds of patents which plaintiff controls." 77 F. Supp. at 496.

Certainly a licensee, in consideration of the grant of the right to use a licensor's patent, may lawfully promise to pay the licensor a fixed sum per year during the life of the agreement; and this promise would not become unenforceable merely because the licensee in a particular year happened not to utilize the invention. If this is so, it would be no more against public policy to stipulate for a variable consideration by way of royalty for the right to use the patent, whether such consideration were expressed in terms of a percentage of the net profits of the licensee's business, or (as here) in terms of a percentage of the selling price of certain apparatus manufactured and sold by the licensee. Depending on the circumstances such a percentage royalty might well be a lesser charge upon the licensee's business than a stipulation for payment of a flat sum yearly.

A different problem would be presented if the license agreement had provided that, in part consideration for the right to make use of Hazeltine's patents, Automatic agreed not to compete in the commercial field in the manufacture and sale of any radio apparatus of the types enumerated, even though such apparatus did not embody any of the inventions covered by Hazeltine's patents. Such an agreement might be unenforceable as constituting an unlawful attempt to extend the monopoly of licensor's patents beyond the limits of the patent grants. But as we read the license agreement in the case at bar, Automatic would not break the agreement by manufacturing and selling for unrestricted use radio apparatus which in fact does not embody any of the inventions covered by Hazeltine's patents. This is true notwithstanding the fact that Automatic, in making such a sale, would be required by Article IV, Section 1, of the agreement to pay to Hazeltine the stipulated percentage of the selling price as royalty for the right to utilize the patents covered by the license agreement.

Duress

Automatic's brief states that its affidavits "assert the license was signed only in fear of disastrous litigation. If it was, in fact, coerced into taking a license under invalid patents having no application to any radio set made today, the patents were obviously misused." Not all economic pressure constitutes "duress" rendering a contract voidable. The defense of duress is discussed in 5 Williston, Contracts § 1606 (Rev. ed. 1937), where it is pointed out that the pressure exerted must be wrongful; that a threat to resort to civil litigation is not such duress as to justify rescission of a transaction induced thereby, even though there is no legal right to enforce the claim, provided the threat is made in good faith, that is, in the belief that a possible cause of action exists. Neither Automatic's answer nor its amended answer set up duress as a defense. Notwithstanding the statement in Automatic's brief, the record in fact contains no specific allegation that Automatic was improperly coerced into executing the license agreement now in suit. There is a statement in Automatic's counter motion for summary judgment, as one of the asserted grounds for dismissal of the complaint, that Hazeltine has misused its patents by suing and threatening to sue, and otherwise harassing customers of radio manufacturers refusing to take a license under its patents "and coercing radio manufacturers to take licenses under its patents by threats of repeated, expensive law suits"; and a similar statement is made in one of the supporting affidavits.[1] Even if—as would hardly be justified—we take this allegation to imply that Hazeltine improperly coerced other radio manufacturers to enter into license agreements by threats of patent infringement suits which Hazeltine knew to be unfounded, such wrongful conduct in respect to third persons would constitute no defense to Automatic in the present suit. A promisee's cause of action on one contract cannot be defeated merely by a showing that the promisee had improperly coerced third parties into entering into similar contracts with him. See 6 Williston, Contracts § 1752 (Rev. ed. 1938); 2 Restatement, Contracts § 597 (1932). This generally accepted rule of law should not, in our view, be discarded by an extension of the decision in Morton Salt Co. v. G. S. Suppiger Co., 314 U. S. 488 (1942), which dealt with quite a different set of facts not involving the assertion of third-party defenses by a defendant sued for breach of contract.

Monopoly

Automatic has claimed that Hazeltine's alleged monopolistic practices should preclude its recovery here. Its answer alleged as a defense that Hazeltine "in an illegal endeavor to eliminate all competition and secure an unlawful monopoly in violation of the antitrust laws of the United States, acquired the approximately 425 United States letters patent and the approximately 120 applications for United States letters patent . . . from its employees" (and from other corporations and persons). From Automatic's somewhat nebulous generalizations, it is difficult to ascertain the precise nature of its argument on this score, though it does concede that the mere accumulation of patents, however great in number, is not illegal per se. Cf. Transparent Wrap Machine Corp. v. Stokes & Smith Co., 329 U. S. 637 (1947). As one of the grounds in support of its counter motion for summary judgment, Automatic asserted that Hazeltine has misused its patents by "refusing to grant a license under any one or more of its patents to anyone who refuses to take a license under all." The only factual support we have been able to find for this allegation is a statement in one of Automatic's affidavits, made by the affiant on information and belief, not as a matter of personal knowledge. It is indeed nowhere alleged that Automatic had sought and been refused a license covering less than all of Hazeltine's patents. This particular contention has not been pressed on appeal as a separate ground of defense.

[1] It appears that among the other licensees of Hazeltine are General Electric Corporation, Westinghouse Electric Corporation, and Radio Corporation of America. R. C. A. paid approximately one million dollars in royalties to Hazeltine during the years 1937-1947.

In most other respects, it appears that the defense of monopolistic practices is merely the assembling under a different heading of matters we have already considered. The district court correctly ruled that, even assuming arguendo that Hazeltine was engaged in an unlawful scheme to maintain a monopoly, the license contract in suit was not an integral part of it; that the license agreement, being itself a valid contract, will not be rendered unenforceable by collateral activities of the plaintiff in violation of the anti-trust laws. 2 Restatement, Contracts § 519 (1932); 5 Williston, Contracts § 1661 (Rev. ed. 1937); 2 Walker, Patents § 409 (Deller ed. 1937). See also Bruce's Juices, Inc. v. American Can Co., 330 U. S. 743, 754, 755-56 (1947). Morton Salt Co. v. G. S. Suppiger Co., 314 U. S. 488 (1942), is no authority for the proposition that a contract action for patent royalties may be bogged down by the defendant into a complicated and protracted trial of asserted collateral infractions of the anti-trust laws. And see Radio Corporation of America v. Majestic Distributors, 53 F. 2d 641, 642-43 (D. C. Conn. 1931), and cases cited.

II. Alleged Invalidity of Hazeltine's Patents

Until recently, it had generally been thought to be settled law that, in a suit for patent royalties under a license agreement, the licensee was estopped from challenging the validity of the licensor's patent. United States v. Harvey Steel Co., 196 U. S. 310 (1905); 2 Walker, Patents § 383 (Deller ed. 1937). Edward Katzinger Co. v. Chicago Metallic Mfg. Co., 329 U. S. 394 (1947), and MacGregor v. Westinghouse Elec. & Mfg. Co., 329 U. S. 402 (1947), established that this proposition can no longer be received without qualification. In each of those cases the licensee had agreed to sell the licensed products at prices fixed by the licensor. "Such a restriction on the price of articles entering interstate commerce is a violation of the Sherman Act save only as it is within the protection of a lawfully granted patent monopoly." Sola Elec. Co. v. Jefferson Elec. Co., 317 U. S. 173, 175 (1942). The Court, in the Katzinger and MacGregor cases, deemed the price-fixing undertaking to be an inseparable part of the "integrated consideration for the license grant"; and in these circumstances concluded that the public interest in "freedom from invalid patents and from restraints of trade" (329 U. S. at 401) would best be served by allowing the licensee to set up the invalidity of the patent in defense to a suit for royalties. It confined its decision to the set of facts before it, and pointedly declined to lay down the broader rule that a licensee may in all cases defend on the ground of invalidity of the patent even when no price-fixing stipulation was involved in the license contract. 329 U. S. at 399. As to that, the Court reserved judgment.

Until we receive further light and leading from the Supreme Court, we are disinclined to extend the holdings in the Katzinger and MacGregor cases so as to throw into the discard altogether the long line of earlier cases disallowing a licensee to challenge the validity of the licensor's patent. It is not uncommon for the parties to a patent infringement suit, in which there is a genuine issue as to the validity of the patent, to make a settlement of the litigation by an agreement under which the patent gives a license to the alleged infringer in consideration of the payment of a stipulated royalty. Indeed, the license agreement in suit seems to have been by way of settlement of earlier litigation between the parties. It is not apparent to us that the public interest would be served by rendering such common-sense business settlements nugatory, which would be the result of a ruling that the licensee could reopen the issue of validity when sued for the stipulated royalty.

In the case at bar, where a large number of patents were covered by a single license agreement containing no price-fixing stipulation, the result would be particularly awkward if it were held that the licensee may defend by putting in issue the validity of all these patents. Although Automatic's motion for summary judgment and its supporting affidavit make the general statement that none of Hazeltine's patents covered by the license are valid, no concrete attempt was made to buttress these assertions, and the district court concluded: "Furthermore, the defendant does not purport to contest the validity of all plaintiff's patents." 77 F. Supp. at 497. We ourselves have been unable to find from the record that Automatic seriously attempted to raise a "genuine issue" as to the validity of all the licensed patents. If the holding of the Katzinger and MacGregor cases were extended to the present situation, because of the restrictive use provision or otherwise, would the licensee, in order to make out its defense, have to establish that each and every one of the licensed patents is invalid? Or could the licensee maintain, in view of the fact that the stipulated royalties are payable whether or not any particular apparatus manufactured and sold by the licensee embodies any of the inventions covered by the patents, that the royalty agreement as an inseparable entirety becomes unenforceable if it can be shown that any of the 500 licensed patents is invalid? Or, as a third alternative, would the licensee have to show that substantial number of patents, or the more important patents constituting the "substance" of the agreement, were invalid? If we are wrong in our conclusion that the licensee here cannot challenge the validity of the patents, then we confess we would be at a loss to know how to instruct the district court to proceed with the case upon remand. Whichever of the three alternatives above suggested were followed, it seems to us the resulting situation would be a mess, and the district court would likely be subjected to a well-nigh intolerable burden.

III. Eviction

Questions of direct attack upon validity aside, Automatic relies on the defense of eviction which, as we understand its attempted application here, is in substance a defense of failure of consideration. The argument is based upon these circumstances: At various times in the past, Hazeltine brought infringement suits against third parties based on one or more of eight of the patents licensed under the agreement in suit. Only one of these eight patents was ever passed on by the Supreme Court, and its judgment of invalidity did not extend to all of the claims of this patent. Of the other seven patents, lower courts held all of the claims of two invalid, and some of the claims of the remaining five were also held invalid. Two additional patents sued on by Hazeltine were held by a lower court not to have been infringed. Some of these patents were litigated before the effective date of the agreement in suit and some after. The record is clear that Hazeltine informed Automatic of the aforesaid Supreme Court judgment of invalidity before the present license agreement was executed, but Automatic alleges that it was then unaware of the judgments of invalidity or non-infringement of the other patents litigated before that date.

Although Automatic did not in this court rely on a defense of fraud or misrepresentation, Automatic does claim that the aforesaid ten patents litigated adversely to Hazeltine were the ones in which Automatic had been chiefly interested; that the judgments against Hazeltine demonstrate the worthlessness of these patents, and that consequently there has been a failure of consideration relieving Automatic of its obligations under the license agreement.

It may be that the defense of eviction or failure of consideration raises a question of local law. The court below correctly ruled that, in so far as local law is controlling, the local law properly applicable under the circumstances of this case is that of the State of New York. See Klaxton Co. v. Stentor Elec. Mfg. Co., Inc., 313 U. S. 487 (1941); Adamowski v. Curtiss-Wright Flying Service, Inc., 300 Mass. 281 (1938); Restatement, Conflict of Laws §§ 332, 358, Comment b (1934).

In our opinion the defense of eviction is insupportable on several grounds.

The mere fact that Automatic may have regarded ten particular patents, out of the more than 700 patents and patent applications covered by the license agreement, as the most important ones licensed, in no sense means that both parties regarded those patents as the "substance" of the agreement and contracted accordingly. The record offers no significant suggestion that such was the case, and the district court concluded that Automatic "has not made any serious effort to show eviction here and could not show it", and that Automatic got "by the contract, what it bargained for, namely, the right to use whatever patents are available for use in plaintiff's large collection." 77 F. Supp. at 497.

Even if Automatic had properly presented this defense, we do not think it could be sustained where a non-exclusive license is concerned. Without attempting a full discussion of the doctrine of eviction,[2] we may assume for present purposes that, where an exclusive license is granted and the patent is held invalid, even by a lower court, in a suit between the patentee-licensor and a third party, the licensee may successfully claim an eviction. An exclusive license agreement may be said to presuppose a grant to the licensee of a complete monopoly; if the patent is not upheld in even one suit against an infringer, the desired monopoly is pro tanto destroyed, and there may be said to be a failure of consideration. See Schutte & Koerting Co. v. Wheeler Condenser & Engineering Co., 295 Fed. 158 (E. D. Pa. 1924); 1 Williston, Contracts § 137 (Rev. ed. 1936). But where the license, as here, is non-exclusive, this argument is inapplicable.

To hold that a non-exclusive licensee may base a defense of eviction on lower court judgments of invalidity in suits between the patentee-licensor and third parties would seem inconsistent with the principles recognized in Triplett v. Lowell, 297 U. S. 638 (1936). There it was held that, even though in an earlier infringement suit against a third party some claims of a patent had been held invalid and the patentee had failed to disclaim them, the patentee might still maintain a suit against another alleged infringer for infringement of those same claims as well as other claims. The Supreme Court pointed out that many times it had upheld claims previously held invalid in litigation that had not reached the Supreme Court; that if in the second suit the previously invalidated claims were upheld, no question of failure to disclaim would be presented; but if these claims were again invalidated, the court would be faced with the question whether recovery on other claims should be barred by reason of the failure to disclaim the invalidated claims. We think in the present suit against Automatic on the non-exclusive license agreement, it would be anomalous to give greater effect to a lower court's judgment of invalidity in an infringement suit against a third party than would be given to such a judgment if Automatic had not been a licensee and had been sued as an infringer. In short, a holding by one lower court that a patent is invalid is hardly a conclusive determination of that patent's invalidity and hence the "worthlessness" of a non-exclusive license of that patent. See Appleton Toy & Furniture Co. v. Lehman Co., 165 F. 2d 801 (C. A. 7th, 1948); Pope Mfg. Co. v. Owsley, 27 Fed. 100 (C. C. N. D. Ill. 1886). But cf. Drackett Chemical Co. v. Chamberlain Co., 63 F. 2d 853 (C. A. 6th, 1933).

Nor do we find that any different rule prevails in the State of New York. It is true that in Hazeltine Research, Inc. v. De Wald Radio Mfg. Corp., 84 N. Y. S. 2d 597 (Sup. Ct., Special Term, N. Y. County, Part III, 1948), in ruling on plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, Justice Hofstadter apparently held that the defense of eviction like that advanced in the case at bar was available in New York to a non-exclusive licensee being sued for royalties. We have examined the New York authorities cited by the court, and do not think that they support this conclusion. The leading case of Marston v. Swett, 66 N. Y. 206 (1876), after retrial, 82 N. Y. 526 (1880), dealt with an exclusive license; we have already pointed out the important difference in this connection between an exclusive and a non-exclusive license. Herzog v. Heyman, 151 N. Y. 587 (1897), involved the sale or assignment of a patent, not a non-exclusive license agreement. The distinction is important. See Marston v. Swett, 66 N. Y. 206, 212-13 (1876); 1 Williston, Contracts § 137 (Rev. ed. 1936). In Buffalo Rubber Mfg. Co. v. Batavia Rubber Co., 90 Misc. 418, 153 N. Y. S. 779 (Sup. Ct. 1915), the license was taken by defendant upon a representation that the licensor had a patent application pending, when in fact such application had been rejected by the Patent Office on the ground of prior invention by an earlier patentee; and the court held that the false representation was sufficient ground in equity for the rescission of the license agreement induced thereby. In Pomeroy v. New York Hippodrome Corp., 197 App. Div. 114, 188 N. Y. S. 734 (1921), the license agreement was also made during the pendency of a patent application; however, the patent sought, for the device covered by the license, was refused by the Patent Office, which allowed the licensor merely a patent for a minor improvement on an earlier patent. Appellant also cites Bottlers Seal Co. v. Rainey, 225 N. Y. 369, 373 (1919); but the passage referred to was dictum merely, and furthermore the discussion was with reference to the position of an assignee of an exclusive license. Clearly none of these cases is controlling on the eviction question raised in the De Wald case and in the case at bar. It does not appear whether the attention of Justice Hofstadter in the De Wald case was directed to the aspects of the eviction doctrine we have already discussed. At any rate we are constrained to believe that the apparent holding in the De Wald case is not in accordance with the law of New York as it would be declared by the highest court of that state.

IV. Repudiation

On September 18, 1947, several months after the filing of the complaint in the present case, Automatic wrote a letter to Hazeltine formally advising the latter, without more, that Automatic "has repudiated and terminated the License Agreement". Automatic asserts that this notice of "repudiation" extinguished its contract obligation to pay royalties. Perhaps a sufficient answer to this contention is that no such defense was set forth either in Automatic's answer or amended answer, or in its counter motion for summary judgment. Furthermore, giving every indulgence to Automatic's contention, such repudiation could operate only prospectively, and would not affect the judgment for minimum royalties for the contract year ending August 31, 1946, nor would it affect Automatic's liability for percentage royalties due for the period up to the date of such "repudiation". In addition to that, so far as it may be a question of federal law, in the absence of a cancellation option in the agreement, or of a substantital default by the licensor, the licensee cannot by any such unilateral notice of repudiation terminate its contract obligation under a license agreement having several years yet to run. St. Paul Plow Works v. Starling, 140 U. S. 184 (1891); Ohio Citizens Trust Co. v. Air-Way Elec. Appliance Corp., 56 F. Supp. 1010 (N. D. Ohio 1944). But cf. Martin v. New Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co., 255 Fed. 93, 94 (D. N. J. 1919). Assuming that local law governs the matter, we are satisfied that, even if repudiation by the licensee is, in some circumstances, a defense in New York to a suit for royalties, Automatic's letter of September 18, 1947, does not meet the stringent requirements set forth in Skinner v. Wood Mowing and Reaping Machine Co., 140 N. Y. 217 (1893).

The cases which have suggested the existence of some such doctrine of unilateral repudiation have explained that the licensee may announce unequivocally "that he no longer recognizes the binding force of the agreement, and that he will thereafter manufacture or use the article covered by the patent under a claim of right, founded upon the alleged invalidity of the patent, and in hostility to and defiance of the authority of the patent and the license, so that the licensor can thereafter proceed against him for an infringement of the patent, if he choose so to do." Martin v. New Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co., supra, 255 Fed. at 94. See Skidmore v. Fahys Watch-Case Co., 28 App. Div. 94, 101, 50 N. Y. S. 1016, 1021-22 (1898); L. Heller & Son, Inc. v. Lassner Co., 214 App. Div. 315, 318, 212 N. Y. S. 175, 180 (1925). But as we have already pointed out, under the license agreement in suit Automatic's liability for royalties does not depend upon its actual use of any of the licensed patents in the particular apparatus made and sold by it. If Automatic were permitted to repudiate the license agreement and in fact did not utilize any of the inventions covered by Hazeltine's patents, Hazeltine could not prevail in an infringement suit even if all its patents were valid; and Automatic would thus achieve immunity from liability by non-use of Hazeltine's patents, despite its contract undertaking to pay royalties, regardless of such use, for the right to make use of them. Hence, even assuming that a doctrine of unilateral repudiation might in some cases be recognized, such a defense certainly would not be available under the circumstances of the case at bar.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

[Dissenting Opinion]

WOODBURY, Circuit Judge, (dissenting). In my view the decisive question on this appeal is the enforceability of a licensing agreement requiring the licensee to pay royalties even though in fact he does not make any use whatsoever of any invention embodied in a patent owned by the licensor. Such agreements as I see it necessarily have the effect of expanding a patent beyond the legitimate confines of the monopoly granted therein, and for many years the Supreme Court, because of the public interest dominant in the patent system, has held licensing agreements having that effect unenforceable in spite of the business convenience or even necessities of the parties. Morton Salt Co. v. Suppiger Co., 314 U. S. 488, 492; B. B. Chemical Co. v. Ellis, 314 U. S. 495, 498; Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Co., 320 U. S. 661, 665 et seq., and cases cited. Therefore, by parity of reasoning with the above cases I would hold the licensing agreement here in suit unenforceable.

[¶ 62,477] Sunset Oil Company v. Fred R. Vertner.

In the Washington Supreme Court. 134 Washington Reporter, No. 5, 245. No. 30859. Department One. July 28, 1949.

Appeal from a judgment of the superior court for Yakima county, BARNETT, J., entered September 11, 1948, in favor of the plaintiff, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury rendered in favor of the plaintiff in a smaller amount. Reversed.

Washington Fair Trade Act, Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Act

Price-Fixing of Gasoline—Exclusive Dealing Contract—Antitrust Violation as a Defense.—A judgment, entered in an action taken by an oil company against a service station operator for breach of contract, was ordered reversed with instructions to enter judgment for the amount which the jury found to be owing. The gasoline dealer was held to be entitled to present to the appeal tribunal his defense that the contract should be held illegal and void under Section 1 of the Sherman Act and Section 3 of the Clayton Act even though his opponent's demurrer to this defense had been sustained and an amended answer and a supplemental cross-complaint had been filed. It was held that the contract under which the buyer agreed to resell at prices established by the seller pursuant to the Fair Trade Act did not provide for illegal price-fixing in violation of the Sherman Act. The Court found no basis in the record for holding that the buyer's undertaking not to handle directly or indirectly any petroleum products other than those secured from the seller was illegal.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1660.151, 1660.350.

For the appellant: Cheney & Hutcheson.

For the respondent: Meier & Murray and Brown & Hawkins.

BEALS, J.: At all times herein mentioned, Sunset Oil Company, the plaintiff in this action, has been and is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California, and authorized to do business in the state of Washington. Sunset Gas & Oil Company is a Washington corporation and a distributor for Sunset Oil Company.

June 9, 1945, Sunset Gas & Oil Company (herein referred to as Sunset Gas or seller) entered into a written "distributor's agreement" with Fred R. Vertner (the defendant herein) and Stanley A. Pemberton, copartners engaged in the business of selling petroleum products and other merchandise in the city of Yakima and vicinity, under the name of Marine Oil Company (referred to in the agreement as "distributor").

By the terms of this contract, the partnership agreed to purchase exclusively from Sunset Gas lubricating oils, gasoline, and other petroleum products for resale within a described area in Yakima county, during the period beginning June 9, 1945, and ending May 31, 1950.

In September, 1945, Mr. Pemberton sold his interest in the partnership to Mr. Vertner, and, in this opinion, we shall refer to Marine Oil Company as Vertner or distributor.

By the agreement above referred to, Vertner agreed to purchase each calendar month during the term of the agreement certain minimum quantities of petroleum products, namely, fifty thousand gallons of gasoline, one hundred gallons of lubricating oils, and fifty gallons of grease, the gasoline to be purchased at a price six and one-half cents per gallon less than the seller's posted retail price. The prices to Vertner of the other products were fixed by standards set forth in the agreement.

By paragraph No. 5 of the contract, in consideration of the seller's covenant to refrain from selling any of its branded products described in the agreement to third parties within the described territory, Vertner agreed not to "handle, directly or indirectly," any petroleum products for sale or distribution within this territory other than those secured from seller, pursuant to the contract.

By paragraph No. 7, Vertner agreed to pay cash for all purchases at the time of delivery, unless otherwise agreed in writing by seller's credit department.

Paragraph No. 8 of the agreement stated that Vertner understood that, pursuant to the provisions of the "Fair Trade Act," the seller had certain rights and privileges relating to resale prices, Vertner agreeing not to sell the products which he purchased from seller at less than the seller's posted service station tank wagon prices,

". . . unless said sales are made at retail, in which event Distribtutor agrees that he will not sell such products at less than the posted retail price established by Seller from time to time for the place of resale."

By paragraph No. 9, Vertner also agreed that he would not sell any products purchased from seller to any person, unless the purchaser first agreed not to resell the products at less than the seller's posted retail price at the place of resale.

The seller reserved the right to sell or assign its interest in the contract to a responsible oil company.

Paragraph No. 16 of the agreement reads as follows:

> "No waiver by either party hereto of any nonperformance or breach of any covenant or provision of this agreement shall be deemed to be a waiver of any preceding or succeeding breach of the same or any other covenant or provision. All remedies, rights and options accorded herein, or otherwise available to the Seller shall be cumulative, and no one such remedy, right or option shall be exclusive of any other, and the pursuit of any such remedy, right or option shall not be deemed to waive any other or different remedy or relief to which the Seller might otherwise be entitled, either at law or in equity. Distributor waives any claim against Seller as to price, quantity or quality of any delivery of petroleum products hereunder, as well as any claim for damages resulting from any breach of contract on the part of Seller, unless such claim is made by Distributor to Seller in writing within ten (10) days after receipt of said delivery or breach of contract."

Purchases by Vertner were shipped from the seller's plant at Seattle to Yakima by common carrier until December, 1945, after which Vertner transported such purchases by his own truck.

August 22, 1946, Sunset Gas assigned its interest in the contract referred to above to Sunset Oil Company, plaintiff in this action.

By lease or pursuant to "products agreements," Vertner controlled or owned interests in the following gasoline stations: (1) Moxee station in Moxee, Yakima county; (2) a station in Ellensburg, Kittitas county; (3) Curtis Cabin Camp station; (4) Yakima Truck Service station, and (5) a gasoline station, the latter three in the city of Yakima.

By its amended and supplemental complaint, upon which the action was tried, plaintiff pleaded six causes of action, alleging, in its first cause of action, the making of the contract above referred to, the assignment of the contract to plaintiff by Sunset Gas, and the performance thereof by plaintiff; that, during the month of October, 1946, defendant, orally and by a written notice, informed plaintiff of his intention to sell his business; that, at some date thereafter, defendant did sell his business to a person unknown to plaintiff; and that, October 16, 1946, defendant ceased to purchase gasoline and other petroleum products from plaintiff, as he was required to do pursuant to the contract, and thereafter purchased products from others, failing to purchase from plaintiff event the minimum quantity of gasoline he was obligated by the contract to purchase each month. Plaintiff then alleged the profits which it would have realized had defendant performed the contract, and demanded judgment for damages, on account of defendant's breach of the contract, in a sum exceeding sixty-eight thousand dollars.

In its second cause of action, plaintiff repeated certain allegations set forth in its first cause of action, and alleged that, during the month of September, 1945, defendant owned or controlled a service station at Moxee and requested plaintiff to paint that station; that plaintiff complied with the request, at a cost of $165.87, and that the parties hereto entered into a "service station advertising contract" for a term ending March 4, 1948. Plaintiff demanded judgment on its second cause of action for $165.87.

By its third, fourth, fifth, and sixth causes of action, plaintiff made similar claims on account of painting four other service stations owned or operated by defendant, demanding, by each cause of action respectively, judgment for sums ranging from $169.38 to $259.83.

To this complaint, defendant filed a second amended answer and supplemental cross-complaint, denying that he had breached the contract pleaded by plaintiff and denying that he was indebted to plaintiff upon any cause of action pleaded by plaintiff.

By way of a first affirmative defense, defendant alleged that plaintiff and its predecessor in interest had waived the provisions of the contract with regard to minimum monthly purchases thereunder by defendant, and alleged that, by its conduct, plaintiff was estopped from contending that defendant was required to purchase any minimum amount of products from the plaintiff.

By a second affirmative defense, defendant alleged that, by custom and practice, any liability from defendant to plaintiff on account of the five causes of action set forth in plaintiff's complaint, based upon painting service stations, and so forth, should be limited to the pro rata amount thereof for the remaining unexpired term of each of the agreements.

By his third affirmative defense, defendant alleged that, during the month of August, 1946, plaintiff, through its authorized officers, represented to defendant that plaintiff would not object to a sale of his business by defendant, provided that defendant gave plaintiff seasonable notice of such sale, and that defendant had given plaintiff such notice.

By a fourth affirmative defense, defendant alleged that plaintiff had materially and substantially breached the terms and conditions of the contract as alleged in detail by defendant, and had, without cause, repudiated the contract and refused to make further deliveries thereunder.

By way of a supplemental cross-complaint, defendant alleged that, by plaintiff's refusal to perform the contract, defendant had suffered damage, by reason of loss of profits which he would have made had the contract been performed by plaintiff, in an amount in excess of seventy-two thousand dollars, for which amount defendant demanded judgment against plaintiff.

Plaintiff replied to defendant's affirmative defenses and cross-complaint with denials and affirmative defenses.

The action was tried to the court, sitting with a jury, the jury having returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $669.45.

Defendant moved for judgment in his favor notwithstanding the verdict, which motion was denied by the court, and, in the alternative, moved for a new trial, this latter motion having later been waived by the defendant, as stated in the judgment.

Plaintiff did not move for a new trial, but moved for judgment in its favor notwithstanding the verdict, and, after argument, the court granted this motion, awarding plaintiff judgment against defendant, upon plaintiff's first cause of action, for the sum of $6,845.78. The court also granted plaintiff's motion as to its second to sixth causes of action, both inclusive, awarding judgment for the amounts, respectively, for which plaintiff had demanded judgment.

The court then entered findings of fact and conclusions of law in accordance with its order, granting plaintiff judgment upon its several causes of action as above stated, together with plaintiff's costs as fixed by the court, followed by a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendant in the amounts above stated.

From this judgment, defendant has appealed, assigning error (1) upon the overruling of appellant's demurrer to the complaint; (2) upon the trial court's ruling sustaining respondent's demurrer to appellant's first affirmative defense contained in his amended answer; (3) upon the denial of appellant's motion for judgment of dismissal notwithstanding the verdict; (4) upon the trial court's ruling granting respondent's motion for judgment for increased recoveries notwithstanding the verdict; (5) upon the making of eight specified findings of fact by the trial court; (6) upon the making of four specified conclusions of law; (7) upon the entry of judgment in favor of respondent; (8) upon the admission in evidence of an exhibit offered by respondent; (9) upon the court's refusal to enter judgment dismissing the action; and (10) upon the court's refusal to enter judgment in favor of respondent in an amount not exceeding the verdict of the jury, namely, $669.45.

The questions presented upon this appeal are somewhat confused, and extremely complicated.

At the outset, it may be noted that it is not disputed that appellant sold his business January 18, 1947.

We shall consider appellant's contentions in the order in which they are presented in his brief.

Appellant first argues that the contract between the parties, referred to above, is void for want of mutuality. The contract was prepared by respondent's assignor and should therefore, generally speaking, be construed in appellant's favor.

We quote the second portion of paragraph No. 5 of the contract:

> "In consideration of Seller's agreement not to sell any of the hereinafter described branded products in the above described territory, Distributor agrees to not handle, directly or indirectly, any petroleum products for sale or distribution in said territory other than those secured from Seller under and by the terms of this agreement. Seller, however, reserves the right at its option to solicit orders for the sale and delivery of any of the hereinafter described branded products in the territory of Distributor to any municipal, county, federal or other governmental or public body or agency, or to any common carrier or public utility within the territory aforedescribed."

Appellant argues that the contract is entirely unilateral, obligating appellant to sell no products other than those purchased from respondent, while respondent is free to sell its products in appellant's territory. Respondent, of course, is holder of the contract by assignment from Sunset Gas, the original seller named therein.

Appellant admits the assignment of the contract to respondent by the original seller, but argues that it nowhere appears that respondent assumed and agreed to perform the terms and conditions of the contract. Appellant contends that, as it does not appear that respondent agreed in writing to carry out the contract, and as the contract, by its terms, was not to be performed within one year, respondent was not obligated by the provisions of the contract, pursuant to Rem. Rev. Stat., § 5825 [P. P. C., § 577-3] (statute of frauds).

Assuming, for purposes of argument, that the situation falls within the statute referred to, respondent proceeded to perform the contract during the months of August and September, 1946, by making deliveries to appellant in accordance with the terms of the agreement, and the contract was partially performed by respondent by the sale to appellant of over one hundred sixteen thousand gallons of gasoline pursuant to the contract. Rowland v. Cook, 179 Wash. 624, 38 P. (2d) 224, 101 A. L. R. 180; Foelkner v. Perkins, 197 Wash. 462, 85 P. (2d) 1095.

It may be noted that appellant did not plead the statute of frauds in bar; but, in any event, in view of the record before us, the contract was not void for want of mutuality. The parties confirmed the contract by acting thereunder, and the cases cited by appellant in this connection are not controlling.

Appellant next argues that the contract upon which respondent relies should be held illegal and void under § 1 of the Federal statute referred to as the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, and § 3 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. A., §§ 1, 14).

Respondent contends that, upon the record before us, appellant may not at this time present this question.

Appellant pleaded this question by an affirmative defense in his original answer and by way of an affirmative defense in his amended answer, to both of which defenses respondent's demurrers were sustained. Appellant then pleaded over, filing his second amended answer and supplemental cross-complaint.

Respondent relies upon the well-known rule that the filing of an amended pleading, after a demurrer to the original pleading has been sustained, amounts to a waiver of any objection to the ruling of the trial court sustaining the demurrer. This is the general rule. However, the question now before us falls within the rule laid down in the case of Miller v. Sisters of St. Francis, 5 Wn. (2d) 204, 105 P. (2d) 32, in which we said:

> "There is an exception to that rule where a motion to strike has been granted and a demurrer sustained, if there remains a question of fact in the case, and the one to whom the ruling is adverse does not waive his right to have it reviewed on appeal by pleading over. [Citing cases.]"

In the recent case of Rathke v. Yakima Valley Grape Growers Ass'n, 30 Wn. (2d) 486, 192 P. (2d) 349, this court held that a sales contract, void under a Federal statute, was unenforcible.

Upon the record in the case at bar, appellant may present the question of the illegality of the contract under the Federal statutes referred to above.

In connection with the question now under discussion, Rem. Rev. Stat. (Sup.), § 5854-12 [P. P. C. § 989-103] (a portion of the fair trade act), and United States statutes, including those above referred to, may be considered.

It is not denied that all products purchased by appellant from respondent were branded or trademarked goods, sold under respondent's name or bearing its labels. In view of the applicable statutes, it appears that the provisions of the contract pursuant to which appellant was operating, which provisions fixed prices, were not void as in contravention of any state or Federal statute. We find in the record no evidence which would support a finding by the jury to the effect that there was, between the parties, any agreement which would be unlawful as involving illegal fixing of prices.

Appellant cites several Federal cases, including United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150, 84 L. Ed. 1129, 60 S. Ct. 811, and United States v. Frankfort Distilleries, Inc., 324 U. S. 293, 89 L. Ed. 951, 65 S. Ct. 661.

In view of the evidence in the record, the authorities cited by appellant do not support his contention that the contract was illegal for the reasons assigned.

Appellant also contends that the contract violates the Federal anti-trust act, because appellant was required to handle only respondent's products.

In the case of Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, 246 U. S. 231, 62 L. Ed. 683, 38 S. Ct. 242, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 1207, the supreme court considered many questions pertinent to this inquiry, and observed that each case must be decided upon the particular facts shown.

In 36 Am. Jur. 617, § 147, the rule is stated as follows:

> "Thus, the issue as to legality or illegality of the disputed contract or combination is ordinarily to be determined in view of the facts of the case. [Citing authorities.]"

The cases cited by appellant in this connection also approve this principle.

Appellant relies upon the opinion of the United States district court in the case of United States v. Standard Oil Co. of California, 78 F. Supp. 850, which concerned the validity of exclusive dealing contracts in the oil industry. In the course of the opinion, the court said:

> "As I understand the pleadings, and the Government's position at the beginning of the trial, a judgment is sought decreeing that the clause in the contracts which, by its language and actual effect, as shown by the evidence, restricts the stations not employee-operated to the sale and use of petroleum products and accessories produced or supplied by Standard is illegal per se. We cannot agree. To the contrary, as we read the cases, exclusiveness of outlet is not, in itself, illegal. It becomes illegal only if it result in a substantial lessening of competition or the creation of monopoly in the line of commerce." (Italics ours.)

Again, the opinion refers to the "proved facts" of the case (p. 853).

The case cited was appealed to the supreme court of the United States, which affirmed the judgment of the district court. Standard Oil Co. of California v. United States, — U. S. —, 69 S. Ct. 1051, — L. Ed. —.

In the case at bar, no evidence was introduced as to any particular facts, save that appellant made purchases under the agreement. The contract between the parties is the only evidence before us which may be considered in connection with the question now under discussion.

We find in the record no basis for holding that the contract between the parties is illegal and void, under the Federal anti-trust acts.

Appellant argues, as stated in his brief:

> "It is undisputed that in the latter part of October, 1946, or at least at all times on and after November 1, 1946, on orders of its main office at Los Angeles, respondent completely repudiated the contract and failed and expressly refused to make any further sales or deliveries to appellant thereunder."

The court instructed the jury (instruction No. 11) as follows:

> "You are instructed that if one party to a contract commits a material breach of the contract, the other party may refuse to proceed further under the contract and may treat the contract as terminated.
> "In this event, the injured party may bring immediate action for the damages he has sustained.
> "A material breach of a contract is a breach of a substantial part of a contract, as distinguished from a part of the contract which is immaterial or inconsequential. A breach may be material, even though it does not render performance of the remainder of the contract impossible or impractical."

No error is assigned upon this instruction, which is the law of the case, in so far as this appeal is concerned.

In the case of Knight v. Pang, 132 Wash. Dec. 230, 201 P. (2d) 198, appears the following:

> "It is a well-recognized principle of law that, when the sufficiency of the evidence to support a jury's verdict is questioned on appeal, the evidence will be interpreted in support of the verdict rendered."

There was evidence before the jury to the effect that, prior to the assignment of the contract by Sunset Gas to respondent, appellant at times had found it difficult to meet the terms of the contract by making the required cash payments for products delivered to him. After the assignment of the contract to respondent, the latter fixed a credit limit, to which appellant objected, whereupon a plan was considered pursuant to which appellant's business would be increased. However, these negotiations had no tangible result.

During the month of August, 1946, appellant purchased from respondent and its predecessor in interest over fifty-four thousand gallons of gasoline and, in the following month, over sixty-two thousand gallons. During October, 1946, appellant purchased considerable quantities of gasoline and other products from a Yakima dealer, as appears from an exhibit in the case, and, apparently, made no further purchases from respondent. The summons and complaint in this action were served upon appellant during the month of October, 1946.

November 1, 1946, appellant's tank wagon called at respondent's base in Seattle, but respondent's agent refused to deliver gasoline, stating that future deliveries would be made only on a cash basis.

From the evidence, which was conflicting, the jury was warranted in finding that appellant committed the first breach of the contract.

The trial court did not err in denying appellant's motion for judgment in his favor as a matter of law.

After the jury had returned its verdict, each party moved for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict, appellant arguing that the verdict in respondent's favor was not supported by the evidence, and respondent moving for judgment in its favor for a much larger sum than that allowed by the jury, arguing that such judgment in its favor should be granted upon uncontradicted and undisputed evidence, in connection with which mathematical computations would clearly show that respondent was entitled to judgment for larger amounts.

The court denied appellant's motion and, as above stated, granted respondent's motion and entered findings of fact and conclusions of law in respondent's favor, pursuant to which the judgment appealed from was entered.

The trial court did not entirely disregard the jury's verdict, as, in finding of fact No. 6, appears the following:

> "The finding of the jury in favor of the plaintiff establishes the foregoing finding of fact; namely, the defendant materially and substantially breached the contract on or about October 16, 1946."

Both parties having moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, in response to a suggestion from this court the parties filed briefs discussing the question of whether, in view of the motions of the respective parties, the jury's verdict should be given any consideration by this court.

Rule of Practice 23, adopted July 1, 1942, 18 Wn. (2d) 47-a, reads as follows:

> "A motion for a directed verdict which is not granted is not a waiver of trial by jury, even though all parties to the action have moved for directed verdicts."

The foregoing rule does not apply to motions for judgments notwithstanding the verdict of a jury; and, considering the motions made by the respective parties in the case at bar, we are of the opinion that, by their respective motions, the parties did not submit to the court the questions at issue between them for decision as matters of law. We, accordingly, hold that the verdict of the jury should be considered in determining the questions presented upon this appeal.

The verdict returned by the jury was a general verdict, in the sum of $669.45. The case was submitted to the jury March 24, 1948. It appears from the statement of facts that, after the jury had retired to deliberate upon its verdict, each party took exceptions to certain of the court's instructions, and that the court adjourned at 5:30 p. m., March 24, 1948.

The jury returned its verdict, which bears the clerk's stamp, "Filed for Record 3-24-48." The verdict is general, reading, after the title of the cause:

> "We, the Jury in the above entitled cause, find for the Plaintiff and assess the amount of recovery in the sum of Six hundred sixty-nine and 45/100 Dollars ($669.45). [Signed] L. J. Farley, Foreman."

In their respective briefs, the parties refer to a handwritten memorandum, which, it is stated without dispute, by some undisclosed method, appeared with the jury's formal verdict.

In a supplemental transcript, filed by respondent, appears the jury's general verdict and a typewritten document bearing the words "(Notation attached to Verdict)."

Pursuant to our directions, the original verdict has been forwarded to the clerk of this court and is before us. Attached to the general verdict by wire staples is a small piece of paper, containing handwritten letters and figures as follows:

"Cost	Unexpired Time	Unexpired Value
165	16/24	110.00
169	43/54	135.00
171	19/24	135.00
260	7/24	76.00
240	6-24	60.00
		516.00
Atty fees		50.00
		566.00
Gardner Gas to 10/24
10400 gal. gas at .0075		78.00
5800 stove oil at .00382		22.15
2000 Diesel .00165		3.30
		669.45"

The paper contains no other words or figures than as above set forth, nor is it anywise referred to in the verdict of the jury. The statement of facts discloses nothing which indicates when the jury returned its verdict, nor does it contain any reference to the handwritten paper.

Respondent contends that this paper writing should be considered in connection with the verdict. How the paper came into the possession of the court or the clerk of the court, we do not know. We have no information as to whether, when the verdict was returned by the jury and handed to the clerk of the court by its foreman, the paper was stapled to the verdict or whether it was so attached later. We do not know that the memorandum was seen or discussed by the jury, nor in what manner or for what purpose the jury used or considered the memorandum, if they did use or consider it. The memorandum itself bears no file mark whatever. The clerk's certificate with the supplemental transcript simply states that that transcript "is a true and correct transcript of such pleadings and files" in the case at bar as the clerk had been directed by respondent's attorneys to transmit to the supreme court. The certificate attached to the statement of facts, signed by the trial judge, contains no reference to the verdict.

Even assuming that the handwritten memorandum was delivered to the court by the foreman of the jury, it should, nevertheless, be disregarded as extraneous and superfluous. Martin v. Nichols, 110 Wash. 451, 188 Pac. 519; Pearson v. Arlington Dock Co., 111 Wash. 14, 189 Pac. 559; Lindsey v. Elkins, 154 Wash. 588, 283 Pac. 447; Rowe v. Safeway Stores, 14 Wn. (2d) 363, 128 P. (2d) 293.

It does not appear that the court instructed the jury to make any specific findings upon any particular questions of fact, or to return separate verdicts upon each of the six causes of action pleaded by respondent.

Respondent argues that the handwritten notation should be considered and that the verdict "was in effect a verdict on each cause of action." We do not agree with respondent's contentions upon this point. The verdict, as returned, is a general verdict.

The trial court might have submitted the case to the jury for a separate verdict on each cause of action, but was not required to do so. Yamamoto v. Puget Sound Lbr. Co., 84 Wash. 411, 146 Pac. 861; Olympia Water Works v. Mottman, 88 Wash. 694, 153 Pac. 1074; 53 Am. Jur. 721, § 1043.

The record contains evidence which, if believed by the jury, was, in law, sufficient to support a verdict in respondent's favor for some amount, upon each of the six causes of action pleaded by respondent, provided that the jury was of the opinion that, in consideration of all the evidence before it, the preponderance thereof was in respondent's favor. However, if, in the opinion of the jury, respondent was entitled to recover upon any or all of these causes of action, the amount or amounts to which respondent was entitled remained for the jury to determine, upon consideration of all of the evidence introduced.

As above stated, the trial court accepted the jury's finding that appellant was indebted to respondent, and denied appellant's motion for judgment in his favor notwithstanding the verdict. The question to be here determined is whether the trial court, having so far sustained the verdict of the jury, was authorized by the evidence to enter judgment in favor of respondent in an increased amount, notwithstanding the verdict rendered by the jury.

A motion by a party to an action for judgment in his favor in a larger amount than that which a jury has fixed, is a motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict. 3 Bancroft's Code Pleading, Practice and Remedies (Ten-year Supp.) 2267, § 1772; De Boer v. Olmsted, 82 Colo. 369, 260 Pac. 108.

In the case of Fargo Loan Agency v. Larson, 53 N. D. 621, 207 N. W. 1003, an action by the plaintiff for the conversion of wheat, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $43.43, whereupon the plaintiff moved for judgment for a larger amount notwithstanding the jury's verdict. The trial court granted the motion and entered judgment in favor of plaintiff in the amount of $406.08, from which judgment the defendants appealed. In the course of the opinion, the court quoted from the opinion of the supreme court of North Dakota in the case of Sheffield v. Stone, Ordean, Wells Co., 49 N. D. 142, 190 N. W. 315, the following:

> "'Judgment notwithstanding the verdict may be ordered only in a case where it clearly appears from the whole record that the party who moves for such judgment is entitled to a judgment on the merits as a matter of law.'"

In the case cited, the court held that certain facts were "either admitted by the defendants or are not contradicted by substantial evidence in the case," and that the plaintiff, as matter of law, was entitled to judgment in a sum in excess of the amount in the verdict of the jury. The court continued:

> "Nor can it be said from the record in the case that there is a reasonable probability that a different result would be reached should a new trial be granted."

The court held that the judgment entered by the trial court was too large, and directed the entry of judgment in an amount less than that entered by the trial court, but somewhat in excess of the jury's verdict.

The supreme court of Colorado, in the case of De Boer v. Olmsted, 82 Colo. 369, 260 Pac. 108, held that the trial judge had erred in substituting "his own judgment for that of the jury," and in determining that plaintiff before the trial court was entitled to recover an increased amount. The court observed that the evidence was conflicting and directed that the judgment be reduced to the amount of the verdict returned by the jury.

In the case of Peterson v. Rawalt, 95 Colo. 368, 36 P. (2d) 465, it appeared that, based upon conflicting testimony, the jury had entered a verdict for one hundred dollars in favor of the plaintiff, the amount of the verdict, apparently, not being based upon any evidence introduced by either party to the action. On plaintiff's motion, the trial court set the verdict aside and entered judgment for over six hundred dollars, the full amount claimed by the plaintiff. The judgment was reversed. In the course of the opinion, the court said:

> "We come now to the second contention, namely, that the trial court could not enter an independent and radically different judgment of its own in lieu of the jury verdict it set aside. The power of a nisi prius court to enter a judgment non obstante veredicto does not include the virtual abolition, apparent in this case, of the right to a jury trial. The judge here substituted a sum more than six times the sum awarded by the jury. This would have been proper only if the judge could legally have directed the jury to render a verdict corresponding exactly to the judgment so entered; that is, only in a case where the supporting evidence both as to liability and as to the amount of damages is uncontradicted and unimpeached. Here the evidence was in sharp conflict. The incongruous verdict herein naturally induces the belief that, as to damages if not also to the preliminary and vital question whether there was any liability at all, the verdict was a sheer compromise, and utterly worthless as an index of the jurors' bona fide conclusions, if any they had. When a flagrant and unexplainable understatement has been committed by a jury, the only fitting remedy is to have a new trial under normal conditions that will make similar confusion unlikely or impossible. So in the case at bar it was reversible error to enter judgment notwithstanding the verdict and then refuse to grant a new trial."

Respondent relies upon the opinion of this court in the case of Rawleigh Co. v. Graham, 4 Wn. (2d) 407, 103 P. (2d) 1076, 129 A. L. R. 596, in which this court, sitting En Banc, affirmed a judgment entered upon findings of fact entered by the trial court in favor of the plaintiff, notwithstanding a verdict rendered by the jury in favor of the defendant. After the rendition of the jury's verdict, the plaintiff moved for judgment in its favor notwithstanding the verdict or, in the alternative, for a new trial, which former motion was granted. The court then entered findings and conclusions in favor of the plaintiff, followed by the judgment from which the defendant appealed. A majority of this court found "no controversy in the evidence going to the merits of respondent's claim, upon which the jury was entitled to pass." In the course of the opinion, we said:

"It is, of course, the law that if in the opinion of the trial court there is no conflict in the evidence as to the issue of fact to be submitted to the jury, the court may grant a motion for a directed verdict, made at the close of the case, either simply in favor of the defendant, or for a particular amount, in favor of one party, if the undisputed evidence shows such sum to be due, or in favor of one party, the jury to fix the damages. It would seem that, if the supposed issue of fact has been submitted to the jury, the court, upon further consideration after the return of the verdict, and upon a motion for judgment in favor of the losing party notwithstanding the verdict, could not only grant the motion, if convinced that there was no disputed question of fact upon which the jury should pass, but could make findings in support of a money judgment, if, according to the undisputed evidence, the entry of such a judgment was proper. There would seem no good reason why the court may not do after the return of the verdict what it could unquestionably, in another way, do before."

If the court was of the opinion that there was no dispute whatever in the evidence, the question submitted for decision was one for the court to determine as matter of law.

In the case at bar, after the trial court had refused to submit certain questions for the jury's consideration, there remained several disputed questions of fact which the court properly submitted to the jury.

During the trial, appellant vigorously denied any liability whatever to the respondent and contended that, if he was liable in any amount, such liability was very much less than the amounts contended for by respondent.

It is clear that no motion by either party for a directed verdict would have been appropriate, and no such motion was presented.

There having been several disputed questions of fact in the case, which were properly submitted to the jury, and in view of our holding in the case of Rawleigh Co. v. Graham, supra, to the effect that a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict of a jury is, in essence, the same as a motion for a directed verdict, the trial court would have been warranted in granting respondent's motion for judgment in its favor notwithstanding the verdict only if, assuming appellant's basic liability as found by the jury, the amount of damages to which respondent was entitled was then undisputed.

Evidently, the trial court was of the opinion that, based upon respondent's exhibit No. 18 (an exhaustive compilation prepared on behalf of respondent showing the damages which respondent claimed followed a breach of the contract by appellant, as alleged in respondent's first cause of action), the evidence as to loss of net profits by respondent, resulting from appellant's breach of the contract, was uncontradicted.

Upon the evidence, the question of the amount of damages to which respondent would be entitled was a matter to be submitted to the jury.

It would seem, from the evidence, that the jury might have found that, even though appellant had violated his contract by the purchases he made from other oil companies during the month of October, such acts on his part did not amount to a definite breach of the entire contract which would support a judgment in respondent's favor for recovery of damages as to the entire balance of the contract. 3 Williston on Sales (Rev. ed.) 251 et seq., §§ 585a, 585b; 17 C. J. S. 973, § 472 et seq.

The jury might have found that these breaches of the contract, while rendering appellant liable for damages concerning these particular purchases, did not afford a basis for respondent to treat the contract, considered in its entirety, as broken. 12 Am. Jur. 966, § 389.

Before this court, appellant assigns no error upon any instruction which the court gave to the jury. By its instructions, the trial court explained to the jury the difference between a material breach of the contract, namely, a breach of a substantial part thereof, as distinguished from an immaterial or inconsequential breach of the contract. The jury was not instructed to return separate verdicts as to each cause of action, but returned a general verdict in respondent's favor.

In connection with its first cause of action, the burden rested upon respondent to prove definitely and within a reasonable degree of certainty, probability, and accuracy, the damages which it sought to recover. Quist v. Zerr, 12 Wn. (2d) 21, 120 P. (2d) 539; Hole v. Unity Petroleum Corp., 15 Wn. (2d) 416, 131 P. (2d) 150.

In the case of Pappas v. Zerwoodis, 21 Wn. (2d) 725, 153 P. (2d) 170, an action by a tenant against his landlord to recover loss of profits for breach of certain of the landlord's covenants, we said:

"In such case, however, the loss must be shown with a reasonable degree of certainty and accuracy, and the proof establishing the loss must be clear and convincing, free from speculation or conjecture."

The court instructed the jury as to the rights of the parties to this action in regard to their respective claims. Based upon evidence in the record, the jury, if it determined that respondent was entitled to recovery in the action, could have returned any verdict within the issues as defined by the court in its instructions.

Generally speaking, a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict is not the proper method by which an arbitrary or unreasonable verdict may be attacked. Such a situation should be met by a motion for new trial; but, in the case at bar, no such motion was made by respondent. The amount of the recovery in respondent's favor, as fixed by the jury, is within the issues presented by the pleadings and the court's instructions. Each party to the action claimed large damages against the other. As far as the record shows, the members of the jury all agreed with the verdict rendered.

It is true, as argued by respondent, that, in case of a breach by the purchaser of a contract for the future sale of merchandise, damages may be recovered for loss of profits. Respondent also admits that "such profits must be shown with reasonable certainty but need not be computed with mathematical accuracy."

This court has upheld judgments for damages for loss of profits occasioned by a breach of contract, in cases in which the causes of action concerned different branches of the petroleum industry.

The question before us for decision is whether, upon the record, the trial judge was justified in setting aside the general verdict of the jury, and was authorized to enter judgment in respondent's favor, as matter of law, for a different and larger amount.

A somewhat similar question was considered by this court in the case of McClure v. Wilson, 109 Wash. 166, 186 Pac. 302, 18 A. L. R. 1421, a tort action, in which it was held that the trial court had erred in granting the defendents' (respondents here) motion for a judgment in their favor notwithstanding the jury's verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

The record in the case at bar is voluminous, the statement of facts comprising approximately six hundred pages of testimony, and about forty-five exhibits having been introduced in evidence.

Examination of the extensive record convinces us that the questions presented were properly for the jury to determine, and that the trial court erred in granting respondent's motion for judgment in its favor notwithstanding the verdict.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, with instructions to enter judgment in respondent's favor for the amount which the jury, by its verdict, found that respondent was entitled to recover.

[¶ 62,478] Opinion of the Attorney General of Minnesota.

Addressed to J. W. Clark, Commissioner, Department of Business Research and Development, by J. A. A. Burnquist, Attorney General, Charles E. Houston, Assistant Attorney General. August 5, 1949.

Minnesota Trusts and Combination Act

Joint Advertising—Price-Fixing Not Involved—Restraint of Trade Not Involved.— Members of a corporation do not violate the antitrust provisions of the Minnesota Statutes by advertising jointly in a newspaper in regard to merchandise to be sold by them. Since regulation of price is not involved, such concerted action does not constitute a restraint of trade in the opinion of the Attorney General.

See the Minnesota Trusts and Combinations Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8435.

Your letters of July 15 and July 28 refer to a corporation organized under Minnesota law. A copy of the articles of incorporation and by-laws has been submitted. The purpose of your investigating this corporation is to determine whether it appears to be operating within the law.

The purposes of a corporation and the business in which it may engage are to be ascertained from the declared purposes in the articles of incorporation. I have examined the articles submitted and I am of the opinion that the declared purposes of the corporation are within the law.

[Facts]

You state that the members of the corporation propose to engage in joint advertising. That is to say, a newspaper advertisement will appear, advertising an article of merchandise which various members sell at a certain price on a particular day or period, and on this advertisement appears a list of names and addresses of the member retailers where the item may be purchased. You have asked the

Question

Do such facts disclose a violation of M. S. A. 623.01?

Opinion

The section mentioned prohibits trusts and combinations in restraint of trade. I fail to see that such facts indicate an agreement, combination, or understanding between such members in restraint of trade. I fail to see that such arrangement limits, fixes, controls, maintains or regulates the price of an article of trade. These members merely offer to the public that they will sell such article at such price. There is nothing in the facts considered which shows that the members limit competition in such sales.

Proceedings

[Digest] MR. BRITT: I have here, which I now hand to you, copy of an opinion written by Judge Kirkpatrick in Philadelphia last week which relates to the exact problem which we have here now, growing out of almost exactly the same kind of case. The subject matter of the case is not exactly the same, but it does relate to interrogatories, the nature of which is not stated or referred to in that opinion, but in effect it says that, as I have been arguing to your Honor the last few trips that I have made here, in an Anti-Trust suit where injunctive relief is sought, which involves the violation of a criminal statute, it takes on not only privileged treatment, under Rule 34 and 26 (d), but under certain provisions the question of dealing with public policy which the Attorney General has to take into consideration in dealing with letters, or other communications, written by customers of the defendant, and states that they should not be produced by the Attorney General, if he decides that they should not be produced.

MR. O'QUIN: If your Honor pleases, I say that this is one opinion, by one District Judge, passing upon a matter that your Honor has already passed upon three times.

In the case which Mr. Britt has handed to your Honor the judge there had the choice of saying yes or no; that they would either produce them, or not produce them. In this case your Honor has the right under your previous ruling to view these documents and see whether they are privileged, or whether it would be against public interest to divulge them, before we are even given an opportunity to see them. You will protect the public interest yourself.

MR. BRITT: Here you will see, by reading the opinion, I think, that it is on all-fours with the situation we have, almost identical with the situation we have here. Your Honor will see, by reading that opinion, that we do not have to produce the reports or letters of the customers themselves even to the Court, and I think, if your Honor will study this opinion, it will persuade you to the effect that we do not have to produce these documents even to your Honor.

THE COURT: Well, the situation is that I am confronted with the problem of determining whether I shall order these records produced and given to the defendant, or whether the Attorney General shall decide the matter. That is what I am confronted with.

Afternoon Session

THE COURT: Gentlemen, I have considered this opinion of Judge Kirkpatrick, and that examination has not served to change my views as to what should be done to determine whether or not the documents called for in the motion to produce are privileged within the meaning of the Rules of Civil Procedure.

Here the Court has heard the parties on the motion to produce and concluded that the only way in which it can determine the question of privilege is by inspecting the document itself before production in court, and has, accordingly, directed that counsel for the Government list and indicate by proper means in the files those documents claimed to be privileged. Counsel for the Government states that each of the files does not fall within that category, and has agreed to furnish some of it. To say that this ends the matter is to state that counsel for plaintiff, or the Government, is the exclusive judge of whether the documents are privileged.

I am not convinced that the matter of privilege should be left exclusively to the Attorney General, but I believe it is my duty to determine this question by an examination of the documents.

MR. BRITT: May it please the Court, as I indicated this morning, I have been ordered to come before your Honor and say that I have the reports with me, but it is my instruction to respectfully decline to produce them to your Honor under these circumstances.

THE COURT: Mr. Britt, the only alternative then, as I appreciate it, is to direct you to do that within a fixed time, and if it is not done within that fixed time to dismiss the suit.

MR. BRITT: I am perfectly willing for the time to start now, if your Honor pleases. I have them here, and I still refuse to produce them.

THE COURT: All right, let the suit be dismissed at this time.

[¶ 62,480] United States v. Greater Kansas City Retail Coal Merchants' Association, et al.

In the United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri, Western Division. No. 17,328. July 26, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Coal Retailers—Sufficiency of Indictment—Motion to Dismiss Denied.—A motion made by coal companies, officers, and individuals to dismiss an indictment charging conspiracy to fix coal prices was denied. The time, place, manner, means and effect of the offense were generally alleged so as to establish a violation of the Sherman Act. Factors such as when and where the conspiracy was formed, whether it consisted of an express or an implied agreement were more properly addressed to the indictment by way of a motion for a bill of particulars and not through a motion to dismiss. Motions to strike out pleadings were overruled on the ground that the government had the right to reveal the entire operations of the parties to a conspiracy, how they conducted business, and the means they used in making proof of the conspiracy. The court refused to grant the motion for a bill of particulars since to do so would limit the evidence of the prosecution.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1630.225, 1630.355.

Miller-Tydings Amendment

Coal Retailers—Sufficiency of Indictment—Competitors on Horizontal Trade Basis.— The indictment charging retail coal dealers with conspiracy to fix prices was found to be sufficient even though it did not negate the proviso contained in the Miller-Tydings amendment. That enactment makes no exception as to competitors on a horizontal trade basis. The retailers in this case are, but for the combination alleged, clearly established to be competitors with each other.

See the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 7076.

Memorandum on Motion to Dismiss and for Bill of Particulars

[Digest] The indictment herein, revealing the following facts, charges the defendants (seven corporations, six of the officers thereof, and nine individuals) with forming a combination and conspiracy to fix, stabilize, maintain and raise the price of coal sold and distributed at retail in the greater Kansas City area. The coal so purchased by dealers is carloaded at mines and transported therefrom in interstate commerce to sidings of the dealers, from whence a substantial quantity of it is delivered to users immediately after arrival of said cars. Some dealers stock pile said coal and make deliveries to users therefrom.

The indictment charges that since approximately September 15, 1933, the exact date being unknown, and continuously up to and including the day of the presentation of the indictment, the defendants have been engaged in a combination and conspiracy to fix, stabilize, maintain and raise the price of coal sold and distributed in said area, in restraint of interstate trade and commerce in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

[Grounds of Motion to Dismiss]

Defendants challenge the sufficiency of the indictment, by way of motion to dismiss, because the indictment fails to allege:

"the names of those who formed the alleged conspiracy or combination; when and where it was allegedly formed; the manner and means by which it was allegedly formed; whether the alleged combination or conspiracy consisted of an express or an implied agreement; whether the alleged conspiracy was formed by an oral or a written agreement; the names of those who joined the alleged conspiracy or combination after its formation; when and where each of such parties allegedly joined; the manner and means by which each allegedly joined; whether each such alleged joining consisted of express or implied agreements; whether each such alleged joining was done in writing or orally; what particular part it is claimed each defendant had in the alleged combination or conspiracy; when, where, in what manner, and which defendants performed overt acts in furtherance of the alleged conspiracy; what acts were performed in furtherance of the alleged combination or conspiracy within the jurisdiction of this court within the applicable period of the statute of limitation; when and where they were performed; and by which defendants."

[Reasons for Denial of Motion]

Such challenge cannot be sustained when considered either separately or collectively. All such factors are more properly addressed to the indictment by way of a motion for bill of particulars and not through motion to dismiss for failure of the indictment to allege facts sufficient to charge an offense. Glasser v. United States, 315 U. S. 60, 62 S. Ct. 457, 86 L. Ed. 680.

The constituent elements of time, place, manner, means and effect through which the government here charges defendant with violation of the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 1 and 2) are generally alleged in the instant indictment so as to establish a violation of that act.

> "The particularity of time, place, circumstances, causes, etc., in stating the manner and means of effecting the object of a conspiracy, for which (defendants) contend, is not essential to an indictment" returned under the Sherman Act. Glasser v. U. S., supra. Such an indictment is legally sufficient if it generally charges all the essential elements of the offense with sufficient clarity to advise the defendants of the accusation made against them, to enable them to prepare their defense, and to enable them to plead a judgment of conviction or acquittal thereon in bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offense, (Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375) even though the generality of the charges made may be subject to be particularized. Cf. United States v. The Central Supply Association, et al., 40 F. Supp. 964.

In regard to the "time" of the conspiracy here charged, it is alleged as beginning September 15, 1933, and continuing thereafter up to and including the day of the presentation of the indictment. The conspiracy thus alleged is in effect charged to have been renewed each day during its continuance. U. S. v. Borden Co., 308 U. S. 188, 202. The "place" where such conspiracy was entered into and performed in part is alleged to be in the "greater Kansas City area", within the jurisdiction of this district court.

> "The allegation that the conspiracy was entered into and carried out in part within the district in which the indictment was returned was sufficient in respect to place, as against an attack by motion or demurrer on the ground of complete infirmity of the indictment." Frankfort Distilleries v. United States (10 Cir.), 144 F. (2d) 824, 832.

The manner and means by which defendants are alleged to have unlawfully conspired are detailed by the agreements and concert of action that the government charges defendants concluded to establish uniform retail prices of coal to users; in submitting bids on agreed prices; and in agreeing and establishing uniform charges for extending credit to purchasers of coal. These things the indictment charges constituted a conspiracy to restrain interstate trade and commerce, to diminish competition between coal dealers, or to control or limit the supply and movement of coal in such trade and commerce, as the case may be. Such particularity is all that is essential to allege the manner and means of effecting the conspiracy here charged. Glasser v. United States, supra. Nash v. United States, 229 U. S. 373; United States v. Empire Hat and Cap Mfg. Co., et al., 47 F. Supp. 395; United States v. Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co., et al., 163 Fed. 66.

The indictment names the defendants as those who formed the conspiracy. It charges such conspiracy to be a continuing one, so that defendants are informed thereby that each day of its continuance they are charged with the formation and continuance of the allegedly unlawful conduct in violation of the Sherman Act. (Cf. U. S. v. Borden, supra.) Whether the agreement constituting the conspiracy and combination was express or implied among defendants, oral or in writing, is immaterial. The essential element of the offense is that such an agreement is charged to have existed between the defendants and that is all that is necessary to allege in the indictment to sufficiently state the crime here considered. U. S. v. H. Piowaty & Sons, et al., 251 Fed. 375. When and where the defendants individually joined the alleged conspiracy, the manner and means by which they joined, whether by express agreement, orally or in writing, and the particular part each defendant performed in the conspiracy are not essential allegations to charge the offense. The indictment sets forth specific overt acts performed in furtherance of the conspiracy and alleges that the conspiracy was entered into and carried out in part in this district. When and where within the district, in what manner, and which defendant performed such acts are not essential allegations in testing the sufficiency of the instant indictment. It is not necessary that a conspiracy indictment set forth in detail each separate transaction and the part each of the individuals engaged therein performed. United States v. Patterson, 201 Fed. 697. The venue of the crime here charged is laid by allegation of facts, revealing overt acts committed within the jurisdiction of this United States District Court. Identical venue allegations have been sustained as sufficient to establish where and when the offense of conspiracy under the Sherman Act was consummated and the jurisdiction of the courts thereover. United States v. Trenton Potteries, 273 U. S. 392; United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150; United States v. N. Y. Great Atl. & Pac. Tea Co. (C. C. A. 5), 137 F. (2d) 459.

[Miller-Tydings Amendment]

Defendants' challenge of the sufficiency of the indictment for failure to negative the proviso in Section 1 of the Sherman Act, supra, (the Miller-Tydings Amendment) cannot be sustained. It is not required that an indictment contain allegations negativing every possible theory of innocence of an accused, (Evans v. United States, 153 U. S. 584) or such possible defenses as may be set up by the defendant. (Stokes v. United States, 157 U. S. 187.) Where the language of a statute defining the offense is so entirely separable from the exception therefrom that the ingredients of the offense may be stated without reference to the exception, such matter need not be referred to in an indictment. McKelvey v. United States, 260 U. S. 353; United States v. Cook, 17 Wall (U. S.) 168. It is only where a statute defining an offense contains an exception or proviso in its enacting clause, which is so incorporated with the language describing and defining the offense that the ingredients of the offenses cannot be accurately and clearly stated if the exception is omitted, that it is necessary to negative such exception or proviso in an indictment. United States v. Britton, 107 U. S. 655. Under Section 1 of the Sherman Act the substantive offense of conspiracy, aliunde a contract for resale, may be accurately and clearly described without reference to the proviso in said section. Manifestly a conspiracy or combination among retail dealers engaged in a single line of business themselves, to lessen competition and to raise prices, could not be within the ambit of the Miller-Tydings Amendment. Such retail dealers are, but for the conspiracy and combination alleged, clearly established to be competitors with each other under such circumstances. The Miller-Tydings Amendment makes no exception as to competitors on a horizontal trade basis. United States v. Univis Lens Co., 316 U. S. 241; United States v. Bausch & Lamb Opt. Co., et al., 45 F. Supp. 387. Consequently the indictment here under the above related facts cannot be held defective for failure to negative the provision contained in Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

[Interstate Commerce Involved]

Defendants' further attack against the indictment on the ground that the facts alleged only reveal intra-state price fixing in the retail sale of coal is without merit. Restraints on interstate commerce to be effective "do not have to be applied all along the line of movement of interstate commerce. The source of the restraint may be intrastate, as the making of a contract or combination usually is; the application of the restraint may be intrastate, as it often is; but neither matters if the necessary effect is to stifle or restrain commerce among the states. If it is interstate commerce that feels the pinch, it does not matter how local the operation which applies the squeeze." U. S. v. Women's Sportswear Manufacturers Association, et al., 336 U. S. 460, 464. It is too late in the day to say that a conspiracy or combination to fix and maintain prices, either at the beginning or end, of goods customarily and normally moved and shipped in interstate commerce, does not operate directly to restrain and monopolize interstate commerce. Local 167 v. U. S., 291 U. S. 293; U. S. v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150; U. S. v. Gypsum Co., 333 U. S 364: Eastern States Lumber Assn v. U. S., 234 U. S. 600; U. S. v. Trenton Potteries Corp., 273 U. S. 392; Mandeville Island Farms, Inc., et al., v. American Crystal Sugar Co., 334 U. S. 219.

The indictment herein charges a single continuing conspiracy. As laid, it alleges several related acts and means, occurring over a stated period of time, for making the conspiracy effective.

> "The several acts and means of making the conspiracy effective are related acts which enter into the crime, but still the single crime is that of combining and conspiring together to restrain interstate trade and commerce, or to monopolize such trade and commerce. Duplicity in an indictment means the charging of two or more separate and distinct offenses in one count, not the charging of a single offense into which several related acts enter as ways and means of accomplishing the purpose." Frankfort Distilleries v. U. S., 144 F. (2d) 824, 832.

It is rudimental law that a conspiracy, once shown to exist, is presumed to continue whenever one conspirator does some act in furtherance of its purpose. U. S. v. Perlstein, 126 F. (2d) 789. In a continuing conspiracy proof of an overt act is necessary only to establish the continued existence of the agreement and to bring the existence thereof within the applicable period of limitation, and not as an essential part of the conspiracy itself. Safarik v. U. S., 62 F. (2d) 892.

Even though the offense under the Sherman Act is complete when a conspiracy is formed, yet when the indictment charges that the unlawful conspiracy continued throughout a given period and an overt act is shown to have been committed within the applicable statute of limitation, prosecution thereof is a single offense and evidences may be offered commensurate with the entire time the conspiracy is alleged to have been formed and continued. U. S. v. Kissell and Harned, 218 U. S. 601. In charging a continuing conspiracy committed by several means for the single purpose of fixing, stabilizing, maintaining and raising prices of coal in restraint of interstate trade and commerce, the indictment herein is not defective because of duplicity.

From what has heretofore been said it clearly appears that jurisdiction and venue of the crime here considered is properly lodged in this district court. Therefore the separate motion of Apex Coal Company and the joint and several motions of defendants, Greater Kansas City Retail Coal Merchants Association, et al., are by the court overruled.

Motions to Strike

In prosecutions for conspiracy the government has the right to show the whole history of the conspiracy from the commencement thereof to its conclusion. It is no objection that the evidence covers a period of time prior to the statutory limitation within which the prosecution may be maintained, if the facts shown have a bearing on the existence of the conspiracy continuing within the statutory period. Baker v. U. S., 276 Fed. 283; St. John v. U. S., 268 Fed. 808; Haywood v. U. S., 268 U. S. 795, cert. den. 256 U. S. 689; Nyquist v. U. S., 2 Fed. (2d) 504, cert. den. 267 U. S. 606.

There is no allegation in the indictment relating to the sale of branded coal in the state of Kansas. If such fact exists and the evidence at time of trial further shows that it was sold within the ambit of the Miller-Tydings Amendment, then such sales of course would be no evidence of the conspiracy charged. A proper objection thereto at time of trial may result in deleting or limiting testimony thereon. There is no allegation to strike from the indictment because of the existence of that fact, even if true, at this time.

The same is true with reference to the period covered by the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942. If defendants merely sold coal at maximum prices during the enforcement period of that Act, without the existence of any agreement between them to fix, stabilize and maintain the price of coal at such maximum, the fact that each of them so retailed coal to users could be no evidence of a conspiracy. However, though defendants were by the regulations promulgated under the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 lawfully authorized to charge a maximum price for coal, yet if they did so by agreement to fix, stabilize and maintain such price at the allowable maximum, then we do not perceive how defendants can exclude testimony concerning that fact, if introduced solely because of the enactment of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942. What defendants may have legally done separately under that act would, if done in concert, resulting in restraint of interstate trade and commerce, be a violation of the Sherman Act.

Sub-paragraphs (f) and (g) of Paragraph 17 allege facts from which it may be inferred that the government charges that defendant Association herein policed its membership and placed obligations on its members to prevent competition among such members, promote uniform prices, and lend inducement to such members to remain in participation of the conspiracy charged. Although from the allegation of sub-paragraph (f) we fail to perceive how the facts there stated, if true, tended to fix and stabilize the price of coal as charged, in restraint of trade and commerce, we hesitate, without some reason other than that stated in the motion to strike, to cause such allegation to be deleted from the indictment. The government has the right to reveal the entire operations of the parties to a conspiracy, how they conducted their business, the means they used, etc., in making proof of the conspiracy. Though such a showing may be more than embarrassing to the conspirators and inflame the jury against them, yet such matters, tending to reveal the modus operandi of the conspirators, would be relevant and proper subjects of inquiry. The court cannot now determine what importance the government attaches to such circumstance. It does not clearly appear that the allegations made in sub-paragraph (f) are wholly irrelevant, and the court cannot say that they are of such a character as to be prejudicial per se to defendants.

The several motions of the defendants to strike are overruled.

Bill of Particulars

We have heretofore considered many of the matters defendants seek to have the government set forth by way of Bill of Particulars, from the standpoint whether such matters are essential allegations to the charging of an offense for violation of the Sherman Act, and have held that a detailed statement thereof is not necessary in the instant indictment. It is a fundamental principle concerning bills of particulars that where the offense charged in an indictment is stated with sufficient clearness and definiteness that defendants are informed of the nature of the charge made against them, so they might plead former acquittal if subsequently charged with the same offense, and defendants might reasonably be expected to prepare a defense, without surprise, such motions will be refused. (United States v. General Electric Co., 40 F. Supp. 627, and cases there cited by Judge Liebell.) Such motions are seldom granted where to do so will unduly limit the evidence of the prosecution. Mulloney v. U. S. 79 F. (2d) 566, cert. den. 296 U. S. 658. In a prosecution under the Sherman Act, the existence or non-existence of the conspiracy charged is the sole issue for determination. Proof thereof is usually made by circumstantial evidence. It is readily apparent that from the nature of such a prosecution a too detailed statement of the ultimate facts, either in an indictment or bill of particulars, would seriously interfere with the government's presentation of such actions. U. S. v. General Petroleum Corp., 33 F. Supp. 95.

To grant defendants' first and second request for bill of particulars herein would be to require the government to set forth practically all the evidence it has in this case. The conspiracy here charged is alleged to have come into existence about the time the defendant, Greater Kansas City Coal Merchants Association, Inc., was incorporated. Whether the then incorporators and officers of such corporation or the then officers of the other corporate defendants or individuals named in the indictment were the parties who formed the alleged conspiracy, and the manner and means they used in its formation, are matters which the evidence at time of trial will probably reveal, but the government should not be required to state such matters at the present stage of the case. The precise date when either, or any, of the defendants joined, if so, the conspiracy is likewise a matter of evidence which the court should not now require the government to adduce, and thereby limit the proof of the government. Specific identification and detailed statement of particular constituent facts establishing proof of the formation, existence and joining of a conspiracy should not be required to be stated by the government. To do so would be to unduly limit the government in its proof and compel the prosecution to reveal its evidence before time of trial. It is not the function of a bill of particulars to force the government to reveal its evidence in advance of trial, or the kind of testimony it will offer.

The matter and events which defendants seek in the remaining items of their motions for bill of particulars relate to overt acts alleged to have been committed in furtherance of the conspiracy. Overt acts are no part of the crime of conspiracy denounced by the Sherman Act. Nash v. U. S., 229 U. S. 373, 378. Consequently allegations revealing such acts are not required to be alleged in an indictment. The fact that overt acts are alleged in the instant indictment is of distinct benefit to defendants, as said allegations inform the defendants of the character and trend the government's evidence will take at the trial. This we think is all that defendants are entitled to, and that the government should not be required to state what particular part each defendant head in the alleged conspiracy, or where, when and how such overt acts were committed.

The indictment here returned against defendants contains but a single charge of violation of the Sherman Act. The conspiracy and combination alleged is delimited as to time, place, manner, means and effect. The defendants are fully informed as to such matters and the period the conspiracy is alleged to have been in existence. Whether defendants ever participated in the conspiracy to effect its object, as alleged in the indictment, must be known by them. If defendants did not so conspire they can readily defend against the charge so made. Successfully so defending, each of the defendants can plead former acquittal for any offense subsequently charged against them for violation of the Sherman Act by the manner and means here alleged on any date between September 15, 1933, and the date of the returning of the instant indictment. The defendants cannot be hereafter taken by surprise by any additions made to the nature of the charge here alleged. They may be astonished by such charge and the course the evidence introduced at time of trial takes, but such factors are not grounds for sustaining their bill of exceptions addressed to the instant indictment.

Defendants' motions for bill of particulars are severally overruled.

Immunity

Certain of the individual defendants have filed supplemental motions to dismiss, claiming immunity from prosecution in this action because of becoming witnesses and producing documents and records before the Grand Jury on subpoena of the government. The government has filed with their brief excerpts from the transcript of testimony given before the Grand Jury by said defendants. Defendants have filed motion for hearing on their said motions as to be afforded an opportunity to refute such transcript and establish the extent of the immunity so claimed. Defendants are entitled to such a hearing in open court. Such hearing will be granted, limited, however, to the nature, character and extent of the testimony claimed to have been given by said defendants before the Grand Jury, and the nature and character of documents produced, if so, by said defendants. The court does not hereby intend to sustain that portion of said defendants' motions seeking to require the government to produce a complete transcript of all testimony given before the Grand Jury and the documents said defendants adduced before the Grand Jury. The government need not produce such documents at said hearing. The hearing aforesaid is now set for Friday, July 29, 1949, at 10:00 o'clock a. m.

New York Fair Trade Act

Retail Sale of Television—Selling Below Price of Competitors—Total Failure to Comply with Statute.—A television manufacturer who failed to avail itself of the price-fixing features of the New York Fair Trade Act was denied a temporary injunction to prevent a department store from advertising television receiver sets below the price claimed to have been agreed upon by the manufacturer and its dealers and distributors.

See the New York Fair Trade annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.75, and the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7352.

[Parties]

GREENBERG, J.: The plaintiff manufactures television receiving sets which it sells through dealers and distributors under the trade name of "DuMont." It alleges that in order to maintain the cordial relationship existing between it and its dealers and distributors, it has, among other things, sought to prevent price cutting and that in furtherance of this policy all its dealers and distributors have been and are appointed by written agreement granting to dealers what is termed a "franchise." In spite of its asserted policy plaintiff has not price fixed its merchandise and it is, therefore, not entitled to the protection of the provisions of the Feld-Crawford Fair Trade Act. In fact there is no claim, as there could be none, that defendant has violated the Fair Trade Act.

The defendant, R. H. Macy & Co., Inc., is a nationally known concern. It has for many years operated department stores in this city and in various other cities of the United States. Among the myriad of articles it sells is home receiving television sets. It also maintains facilities for installing, servicing and repairing such sets. The defendant has an established merchandising policy of endeavoring to sell its free priced merchandise at 6 per cent below competitors and such a policy the defendant avers is known throughout the trade.

The plaintiff, claiming that the defendant has been guilty of certain practices calculated to injure its business, namely, the advertising and the selling of DuMont Television Receiving Sets below the price claimed to have been agreed upon between plaintiff and its dealers and distributors, obtained an order to show cause with a sweeping temporary stay, restraining the defendant from (1) advertising and selling DuMont Television Receiving Sets at cut prices; (2) taking orders from its customers for sale and delivery to its customers of DuMont Television Receiving Sets; (3) purchasing DuMont Television Receiving Sets from dealers and distributors of the plaintiff for the purpose of resale to defendant's customers; (4) publishing advertisements to the effect that defendant will continue to have a wide selection of DuMont Television Receiving Sets or that defendant will continue to deal in, handle or sell DuMont Television Receiving Sets or that defendant is a dealer or distributor of DuMont Television Receiving Sets. The motion came on to be heard at Special Term. Part I.

Following the argument of the motion, this court vacated all of the provisions of the temporary stay except the one which restrained the defendant from advertising that it is an authorized dealer or distributor of DuMont Television Receiving Sets.

[Allegations]

The principal application is now before the court for disposition. Plaintiff alleges that shortly prior to July 5, 1949, defendant's vice-president conferred with its general manager concerning the granting of a dealer franchise to the defendant; that the latter's vice-president assured plaintiff's general manager that if defendant were appointed a dealer it would adhere to plaintiff's price and merchandising policies and would not advertise plaintiff's receiving sets at cut rate prices; that plaintiff relied on these representations and appointed the defendant an authorized dealer, but subsequently the defendant, in violation of the assurances given by its vice-president, caused to be published in various newspapers an advertisement of the sale of plaintiff's product at cut rate prices. The plaintiff thereupon terminated defendant's franchise and demanded that defendant cease what plaintiff terms its "illegal activities" in that regard. Defendant refused to comply with plaintiff's request and thereupon plaintiff instituted this action for an injunction and is seeking temporary relief pending the trial.

The defendant (hereinafter referred to as Macy's) denies all of the material allegations of the moving papers and accuses the plaintiff of bad faith and breach of what the defendant asserts is the true arrangement between the parties. In support of its position the defendant sets forth that its six per cent trade policy was well known throughout the business world and that in conferences with the representative of plaintiff it insisted that it would enter into no arrangement that did not take this policy into account. Plaintiff's consent was obtained to this arrangement, since it was anxious to liquidate its 1949 line of television receiving sets in order to make way for the new 1950 television sets.

After considerable conversation and, on July 5, 1949, the representative of plaintiff concededly delivered to the representative of the defendant a written dealer franchise agreement for one year, signed by plaintiff. It was agreed that pending the signature of the contract by the defendant, Macy's might purchase merchandise and consider itself an authorized dealer. Accordingly, and this stands without contradiction in the record, on July 11, 1949, defendant drew up advertising copy for the sale of DuMont Television Sets. This advertisement was to be inserted in the New York newspapers on July 14, 1949. The copy was shown to and examined by DuMont's advertising manager whose approval appears on the proof as corrected. This advertisement appeared in the newspapers on July 14, 1949.

Shortly after this advertisement appeared, and unknown to it, a number of DuMont dealers in the City of New York protested to DuMont against Macy's competition. Their further complaint was to the effect that they were stocked with 1949 merchandise purchased before DuMont reduced its wholesale prices and that they could not as readily reduce their retail prices to the same extent as Macy's. DuMont, the defendant alleges, having been criticized for the situation, attempted to lay blame on Macy's by pretending that it had acted without DuMont's approval. On July 21, 1949, the defendant's representative contacted plaintiff's representative. There was some talk about the signing and return of the contract to DuMont. Defendant said it would mail the contract; plaintiff said it would send for it which it did on the 21st of July. The very next day, July 22, without further conversation of any kind with Macy's, DuMont mailed to Macy's a letter undertaking to cancel the franchise without cause, on ten days' notice. Owing to the fact that this notice was sent by registered mail, addressed simply to R. H. Macy & Company, it did not, according to the allegation of the opposing affidavit, reach a responsible officer of Macy's until the morning of July 28. Macy contends that the cancellation of the contract on July 22, 1949, one day after it had been signed and returned by it and received by plaintiff, indicates the utmost bad faith, and demonstrates a calculated design on the part of plaintiff to embarrass the defendant by announcing to the trade that DuMont had disenfranchised Macy's because of certain claimed improper practices. Macy's thereupon, and on August 3, 1949, published the advertisement of which plaintiff complains. This advertisement states that Macy was cutting prices. Macy's argues that it was justified in inserting this advertisement in the New York newspapers because of what it claims was the plaintiff's bad faith in canceling the dealer contract almost immediately upon its receipt.

In the main, the facts here set forth present the picture which obtained at the time the plaintiff sought its order to show cause.

[Equitable Interference Not Justified]

Sharp issues of fact are involved which it is obvious should not and cannot be adequately disposed of on motion papers. The verity of the claims of the contending parties can only be properly evaluated and determined after a formal trial where the parties and the witnesses may be subjected to cross-examination and the conflicting claims more appropriately inquired into. Injunction is a drastic remedy and it is well established law that before it will be granted plaintiff must make out a clear case entitling it to the relief sought. Moreover, it is also well settled law that a party will not be granted on motion the same relief to which it would be entitled, if it would be entitled to it at all, only after a trial of the action upon the merits.

A very careful consideration of all of the papers, voluminous in character, which have been submitted to this court, compels the conclusion that not only is plaintiff not entitled to equitable interference but that the equities weigh heavily in favor of the defendant. The claim by plaintiff that the defendant has been guilty of inducing breach of contract is nowhere borne out by the papers; the complaint of the plaintiff that the advertisement of August 3 violates the agreement entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant fails to find support in the conceded facts—the advertisement of July 14, which was approved by the plaintiff, states that plaintiff's product could be purchased at Macy's at a lower price, and the advertisement of August 3, 1949, in substance carries the same advertised thought, namely, that DuMont televisions could be purchased at Macy's at a lower price. There is, therefore, no occasion for complaint in so far as the advertisements are concerned. It seems to this court that the plaintiff is complaining, not so much because of what it conceives to be the defendant's breach of contract, but because the price at which defendant is offering the television sets for sale is lower than plaintiff, at the present time, considers appropriate. Plaintiff could easily have protected its position, if it desired to do so, by the simple process of price fixing the merchandise under the Fair Trade Act. Having failed to avail itself of the protective features of the Fair Trade Act, it clearly has no right to challenge the defendant's sale of DuMont televisions below the price which the plaintiff, in the light of past happenings, considers to be fair and proper.

[Injunction Denied]

Accordingly, plaintiff's motion for an injunction pendente lite is denied and the remaining portion of the stay contained in the order to show cause is vacated. Settle order on one day's notice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Separation of Patent and Antitrust Causes—Excusable Neglect—Jury Trial Granted.— An antitrust cause having been separated from a patent infringement claim, the former was ordered to be tried by a jury even though the request for such mode of trial was not made within the prescribed time. The failure to make a timely demand was found to be excusable since at the time it was assumed that both claims would be tried simultaneously and one was not appropriate for consideration by the jury.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.634.

For the plaintiff and additional defendant: Richard F. Corroon (Sutherlans, Berl & Potter) of Wilmington, Del., and Mark F. Hughes and Raymond C. Murphy (Wilkie, Owen, Farr, Gallagher & Walton) of New York, N. Y.

For the defendant: Alexander L. Nichols (Morris, Steel, Nichols & Arsht) of Wilmington, Del., and Marvin C. Harrison and Allan Hull (Harrison, Thomas, Spanbenberg & Hull) of Cleveland, Ohio.

[Issue Before the Court]

Opinion of RODNEY, D. J.

[Digest] The question here is whether a jury trial should be ordered by the court upon a motion therefor by the defendant when no timely demand therefor has been made.

Neither party demanded a jury trial within the time specified in Rule 38 (b).

[Grounds Supporting Motion for Jury Trial]

Subsequent to the court's decision granting a separation for trial, defendant moved under Rule 39 (b) for a trial by jury of the issues involved in the first (anti-trust) claim or cause of action in the counterclaim. In support of the motion is filed an affidavit by one of counsel for defendant, the gist of which is that the question of a trial by jury of the first claim in the counterclaim was considered by defendant's counsel; that inasmuch as it was assumed then that the first and second claims would be tried simultaneously and the second claim, being one relating solely to patent matters, was not appropriate for consideration by a jury, it was decided not to demand a jury trial of the first claim; that defendant's desire for a jury trial of the anti-trust issues will no longer interfere with the trial of the patent issues, in view of the court's order for separation; that the decision of defendant to waive its right to a jury trial of the anti-trust issues was based upon the assumption that there would be a trial of all issues at one time; and that since the court has ordered separation, it is just and equitable that defendant be permitted to obtain a jury trial of the anti-trust issues.

No affidavits in opposition have been submitted by plaintiff or the additional defendant.

[Exercise of Court's Discretion]

It is clear that the defendant would have been entitled to a jury trial of the anti-trust issues as of right upon making a timely demand therefor. See Ring v. Spina, 2 Cir., 1948, 166 F. 2d 546. The only question here is whether the court's discretion should be exercised in favor of a jury trial as requested. The discretion to be exercised under the rule should be exercised in accordance with law and reason.

If there had been a separation of the issues and provision for separate trial of those issues at an earlier stage of the proceedings and before any right to a jury trial had expired, I am assured that the defendant would have requested a jury trial on the issues triable by jury. The mere fact that the motion of the plaintiff for separate trials was not made until after the expiration of the time for electing a jury trial should not militate against the grant of that fundamental privilege to the defendant.

The right to a jury trial, of course, is fundamental, and the courts should indulge every reasonable presumption against waiver of such right. Aetna Ins. Co. v. Kennedy, 1937, 301 U. S. 389, 393. Under the circumstances outlined in the uncontroverted affidavit in support of defendant's motion, this court cannot presume that defendant intended to waive its right to a trial by jury of the anti-trust issues if such issues were to be tried separately from the other issues in the case.

[Reasonable Excuse]

The excuse submitted on behalf of defendant in explanation of its failure to make a timely demand for a jury trial is reasonable and constitutes "excusable neglect" for not making a timely demand therefor.[1]

Federal Trade Commission Act

Bottle Cap Manufacturers—Unfair Competition—Sufficiency of Evidence and Findings. —Petitions to set aside a Federal Trade Commission order were refused when an appeal court modified the order by requiring that references to the individuals named and to cork discs be stricken out. In the opinion of the court the Commission's findings of fact as to the lack of price competition, standardization of the product, equalization of freight, and that the named bottle cap manufacturers and their trade association control 85 per cent of the industry were supported by the evidence and sufficient to base a finding of conspiracy and combination in restraint of trade in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Act. The order which commanded the petitioners to desist from carrying out any planned common course of action with respect to the practices involved in the conspiracy was affirmed and enforced as modified.

Ingersoll (Rex Rowland, and Smith, Buchanan & Ingersoll on brief) for Petitioners in No. 5817.

For the respondent: Donovan R. Divet, Special Attorney, Federal Trade Commission, (W. T. Kelly, General Counsel; Walter B. Wooden, Associate General Counsel, and James W. Cassedy, Associate General Counsel, Federal Trade Commission, on brief).

PARKER, Circuit Judge: These are petitions to review and set aside an order of the Federal Trade Commission finding that the petitioners have been parties to a conspiracy and combination in restraint of trade constituting an unfair method of competition in violation of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (38 Stat. 719, 15 USC sec. 45) and commanding them to cease and desist from carrying out any "planned common course of action" with respect to certain acts and practices found to be involved in the conspiracy. The petitioners are corporations engaged in manufacturing crown bottle caps, a trade association of these manufacturers and certain individuals holding office either in the corporations or the association. The commission in its brief filed in this court consents that its order be vacated as to the individual petitioners, and no further attention need be given to them. The manufacturing corporations and the association ask that the order be vacated because not based on sufficient findings and because the findings are not supported by substantial evidence.

The case was heard before a trial examiner, who filed a report recommending that the commission find that there had been no conspiracy in restraint of trade or unfair trade practice in violation of the Trade Commission Act and that it dismiss the petition. Exceptions were filed to this report, and the commission made a complete finding of facts covering every aspect of the case and reached the conclusion that a combination and conspiracy in restraint of trade did exist and that a cease and desist order should issue. The findings of the commission are that the manufacturing petitioners control 85% of the business in question, that there is no price competition of any sort among them, but that absolute uniformity of prices and discounts has prevailed since 1938; that, through their association they considered uniform pricing techniques and a uniform contract in the year 1928, and that, although this uniform contract was not adopted, its provisions have been followed by petitioners; that through the association petitioners have worked out a standardization of product so that even in the matter of decoration the product of all petitioners is precisely the same; that in connection with patent licensing agreements the petitioner Crown Cork & Seal Company, which was the largest manufacturer of crown bottle caps, furnished lists of its prices to all the other petitioners for a period of many years and ceased only a short while before the institution of this proceeding; that such license agreements provided that the licensees should not sell at prices lower than those of Crown Cork & Seal; and that all of the manufacturing petitioners follow the uniform practice of equalizing the freight on shipments, with the result that the cost of goods plus freight is the same at any given point anywhere in the United States, no matter from which of petitioners the purchase is made. Upon these facts the commission found the existence of the conspiracy charged in the following language (13th finding):

> "The commission is of the opinion that in the circumstances shown to exist an understanding or agreement under which the respondents acted and still act in concert may be inferred. The intention of the parties participating in the meeting of respondent association, held on July 24, 1928, for all members of the association to sell their products at one and the same price and under identical terms and conditions is clearly evident from the minutes of that meeting. The subsequent use by all such parties of the general pricing plan then formulated, including the schedules of deductions, additions, and differentials, and the adoption of such plan by all of the other respondent manufacturers, with the resulting uniformity in prices, terms and conditions of sale as among all such manufacturers, indicates just as clearly an intention of all of the parties to continue in effect the original understanding. In the opinion of the commission, there is a direct connection between this understanding and the admitted efforts of the respondents to standardize their products to such an extent that a prospective purchaser would have no choice in the realm of coloring, lettering, and decorations as between the products of any two manufacturers; and the concurrent use by all of the respondent manufacturers of the freight-equalization plan serving to maintain identical delivered prices for all purchasers at any given destination, adds materially to the combination of circumstances showing a deliberate and concerted effort on the part of the respondents to completely remove effective competition as among the sellers of crown bottle caps and discs used in connection therewith. Considering, in addition, the price-fixing provisions of the various license agreements, all of which exceeded the legitimate rights of the licensors to protect themselves in the enjoyment of the fruits of their inventions, the sum of all the other incidents referred to in the foregoing paragraphs, the commission has no difficulty in concluding, and therefore finds, that the respondents have in fact entered into and have engaged in and carried out an understanding, agreement, combination or conspiracy among themselves to restrain and suppress competition in the sale of their products. While the record does not show that each of said respondents has participated in all of the activities relied on to establish said understanding, or agreement, each has acted in concert and cooperation with one or more of the others in doing and carrying out some of the acts and practices herein set forth in furtherance of the understanding or agreement common to them all."

We think there can be no question but that this finding supports the order of the commission and we think it equally clear that it, in turn, is supported by the findings as to evidentiary facts which precede it and by the evidence in the case.

Crown bottle caps are the closures for bottles used by the brewing and bottling industry. They consist of metal shells enclosing cork discs and have long been substantially identical in construction and dimension. The Crown Cork & Seal Company, one of the petitioners, manufactures approximately 50% of those produced in this country and the other petitioners approximately 35%. In 1925 the trade association was organized and most of the petitioners were members of it. One of the first things that it did was to bring about more complete standardization of product in that, by agreement of the manufacturers, the decoration of the caps was made uniform, so that those sold by all manufacturers were identically the same. Another matter discussed at an early meeting of the association was the technique of arriving at prices with a view of having uniformity throughout the the industry in the schedules of deductions, additions and differentials from base prices. This was to be incorporated in a standard form of contract; and, while the standard form was never adopted, the evidence is that throughout the industry there is as much uniformity in the deductions, additions and differentials allowed from base prices as if it had been adopted. No form of contract of any sort is used, but sales are made informally by correspondence or oral negotiation; and it appears that no written contract is needed, in view of the uniformity that has been attained throughout the industry with respect to matters which a contract would ordinarily embrace within its terms.

There is no proof of any express agreement to charge uniform base prices; but the evidence shows that since 1938 the prices of all the manufacturing petitioners have been the same. Prior to 1938, there were but few changes, the same price, with minor variations, was charged by all, and, when changes in prices were made, they were made by all at about the same time. In 1933 Crown Cork & Seal granted licenses under patents which it held to most of the other manufacturing petitioners; and in connection with these licenses they agreed not to sell at a less price than that which Crown Cork & Seal established. It is significant that, in connection with these licenses, Crown Cork & Seal furnished a list of its prices to the licensees, who were under agreement not to sell for less. In the case of petitioner Gutman, where mutual licensing following the adjustment of patent litigation, there was an exchange of prices, although neither party used the patents of the other. Not until 1941, shortly before the institution of the proceeding before the commission, was this furnishing of prices discontinued. Its continuance over so long a period of time furnishes adequate explanation of the uniformity of prices attained. The commission has found that, when it was discontinued, it was no longer necessary to maintain uniformity. Certainly, there have been no changes in prices of bottle caps since that time, notwithstanding the fluctuations in the prices of all other commodities. The question which arises with respect to these patent agreements is not whether a patentee may exact an agreement as to prices from a licensee who uses the patent, but whether such agreements under the circumstances here appearing support the charge of conspiracy to destroy competition and fix prices throughout the industry. See United States v. U. S. Gypsum Co., 333 U. S. 364.

The freight equalization practice to which reference has been made goes back at least as far as 1921. That practice is to sell the bottle caps f. o. b. the plant of the manufacturer with an agreement that the purchaser shall be credited with the difference between freight actually paid and that which would have been paid if purchase had been made from the nearest manufacturer. This practice has all the vice of the basing point system in that the purchaser pays the same delivered price, whatever manufacturer he purchases from, and the manufacturer must absorb the freight differential, so that the net selling price which he receives is different for different customers, depending upon their location. The effect of this practice in destroying competition and its importance in establishing the existence of the conspiracy charged is well stated by the commission in its ninth finding, from which we quote as follows:

> "This uniformity in base prices, together with the concurrent use by all the respondent manufacturers of the freight-equalization plan, inevitably means that a purchaser at any given locality will be required to pay exactly the same delivered price for crown bottle caps regardless of the manufacturer from which he purchases. It is undisputed that since 1938, at least, it has been impossible for any purchaser at any location to obtain crowns from any respondent manufacturer for a less price or on better terms than the prices charged or the terms imposed by any other respondent manufacturer. Even on privately decorated crowns the extra charges made by all of the respondent manufacturers have been the same. * * * Thus every respondent manufacturer is informed at all times of both the prices and the terms of sale quoted and offered by all of the others. In addition to knowledge of the base prices of all of the other respondent manufacturers, each such respondent manufacturer knows that every other respondent manufacturer uses the plan of equalizing freight with the location of the manufacturer nearest the purchaser. It knows, too, that by the use of this plan each will be able to deliver its products to every purchaser at any given destination for exactly the same delivered price as others using the plan, and thus all users of the plan will be able to present to a prospective purchaser a condition of matched prices in which such purchaser is deprived of any choice on the basis of price. * * * In order to produce such matched prices sellers of crowns must, at numerous destinations, accept net receipts for their products varying in amount according to the freight absorbed as a result of the closer proximity to the purchaser of some other seller. Each participant in the use of the plan consciously intends that no attempt be made to exclude any seller of crowns from the natural freight-advantage territory of another, and by the use of the plan invites other sellers to share the available business in his natural market in return for similar treatment for itself in the trade territories of all other participating sellers. The price rigidity existing in the crown bottle cap industry since 1938, and the failure of prices of crown bottle caps to respond in any way to changing conditions of supply and demand are not consistent with the existence of effective competition. The complete standardization of crowns as a result of the admitted efforts made by respondents, and other circumstances showing an overriding desire on the part of the respondents to present to a prospective customer a completely united front insofar as products, prices, and terms of sale are concerned, indicate the total absence of such competition. When, as in this industry, the price of the seller nearest the purchaser is always accepted by other sellers and there is no bargaining on any basis between buyers and sellers, fundamental requirements of a true competitive market are lacking and prices are not the result of market action in the economic sense, but are mere expressions of an artificial and monopolistic price structure."

Innocent explanations are offered as to each of the circumstances relied on by the commission, and if it were permissible to consider each of the circumstances out of connection with the others, there would be much force in the argument of the petitioners. When all of the circumstances are considered together, as they must be, however, there can be no question as to their sufficiency to support the findings and conclusions of the commission. The standardization of product, for example, would be innocent enough by itself, but not when taken in connection with standardization of discounts and differentials, publication of prices with agreements not to charge less than a minimum under patent license agreements affecting practically the entire industry, the freight equalization which we have described and such uniformity of prices throughout the industry as to leave no price competition of any sort anywhere. The practice of freight equalization might be all right if used by the manufacturers individually, but not when used in connection with standardization of product, patent control, price publication and uniformity of discounts and trade practices in such way as to destroy price competition. As in the case of most conspiracies to restrain trade and destroy competition, there is no direct evidence of any express agreement to do what the law forbids; but no such evidence is required, nor is the commission required to accept the denials of those charged with the conspiracy merely because there is no direct evidence to establish it, for it is well settled that "The essential combination or conspiracy may be found in a course of dealings or other circumstances as well as in any exchange of words". Fort Howard Paper Co. v. Federal Trade Com'n, 7 Cir., 156 F. 2d 899, 905. Where, as here, the evidence is sufficient to support the findings of the commission, it is for that body, and not the courts, to say what conclusions are to be drawn from it. Federal Trade Com'n v. Standard Education Society, 302 U. S. 112, 117; Federal Trade Com'n v. Algoma Lumber Co., 291 U. S. 67, 73.

And the rule just stated is no different, as some of the petitioners seem to think, because the trial examiner reached a conclusion different from that of the commission. N. L. R. B. v. Laister Kauffmann A. Corp., 8 Cir., 144 F. 2d 9, 16-17. It is the commission, not the trial examiner, that is charged with ultimate responsibility for finding the facts; and it is the commission's findings and order that we are authorized to review under the express limitation that "the findings of the commission as to the facts if supported by evidence shall be conclusive". 15 USC 45 (d). In point is Beard-Laney Co. v. United States, 73 F. Supp. 27, 33. In that case, it appeared that the order of a hearing division of the Interstate Commerce Commission had been reversed on rehearing and it was argued that the usual rules for review of orders of the commission should not be applied for that reason. In answering this contention, the special statutory court of three judges said:

"The rules to be applied in reviewing the order of the commission are not different because that order resulted from a reversal of a prior decision of the hearing division upon a petition for rehearing. The fact that a rehearing was granted shows that the questions involved were carefully considered and the ultimate decision of the division, which received the approval of the commission, was the final and definitive action of the commission, which is what we are authorized to review; and it is to be reviewed in the same way and under the same limitations as other reviewable orders. We may not substitute our judgment for that of the commission because upon a rehearing and fuller consideration of the facts it has arrived at a different conclusion from that which its hearing division had first expressed. Lang Transp. Co. v. United States, D. C., 75 F. Supp. 915, 925."

There has been a great deal of argument with regard to the practice of freight equalization. It should be noted in this connection, however, that the question in this case is, not whether such practice may be enjoined as constituting of itself an unfair trade practice, but whether it may be considered along with the other facts and circumstances to which we have adverted as tending to establish the conspiracy and combination in restraint of trade, which is the only charge of the complaint. We think that it was properly considered for that purpose. Federal Trade Com'n v. Cement Institute, 333 U. S. 683; Triangle Conduit & Cable Co. v. Federal Trade Com'n, 7 Cir., 168 F. 2d 175; Milk & Ice Cream Can Institute v. Federal Trade Com'n, 152 F. 2d 478. As was well said by Judge Major of a similar freight equalization plan in the case last cited:

"It is argued, perhaps correctly, that such a freight system had long been employed by industry so that members thereof might deliver their product at the same price. In fact, the commission recognizes that this freight equalization plan was used by petitioners prior to the organization of the Institute. Such being the case, the fact still remains that it was employed by petitioners for the purpose of fixing the delivered price of their product and by such use price competition was eliminated or at any rate seriously impaired. On the face of the situation, it taxes our credulity of believe, as argued, that petitioners employed this system without any agreement or plan among themselves. * * *"

Whether viewed as an unfair labor practice in itself, or as evidence of the existence of a conspiracy, we see no practical distinction between the freight equalization practice here involved and the multiple basing point system before the Supreme Court in Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, supra, 333 U. S. 684. Both result in "identity of prices and diversity of net returns". In speaking of the single basing point system, which had been condemned in Corn Products Co. v. Federal Trade Com'n, 324 U. S. 726, and Federal Trade Com'n v. Staley Co., 324 U. S. 746, the Supreme Court, in the Cement Institute case, pointed out the results that flow from that system, saying:

"One is that the 'delivered prices' of all producers in every locality where deliveries are made are always the same regardless of the producers' different freight costs. Another is that sales made by a non-base mill for delivery at different localities result in net receipts to the seller which vary in amounts equivalent to the 'phantom freight' included in, or the 'freight absorption' taken from the 'delivered price'."

The court then pointed out that

"the multiple and single systems function in the same general manner and produce the same consequences—identity of prices and diversity of net returns. Such differences as there are in manners here pertinent are therefore differences of degree only."

The same is true of the freight equalization practice here under consideration.

It is argued that the case here is distinguishable from the Cement Institute case because no "phantom freight" is involved; but there is involved freight absorption, resulting in equal delivered prices by all manufacturers selling in a given locality and unequal net returns to the manufacturers from sales to customers in different localities. So far as the questions before us are concerned, there can be no difference between phantom freight and freight absorption. See 333 U. S. at 725. Another argument is that the case here is distinguishable because there is no prohibition of the purchaser's taking delivery at the point of manufacture and thus eliminating freight altogether; but, so far as appears, no one has ever availed himself of this right, and the distinction does not seem to be one of any practical value. We need not decide, however, whether the freight equalization practice here involved constitutes of itself an unfair trade practice or whether it may be condemned as systematic price discrimination in violation of sec. 2 of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 49 Stat. 1526, 15 USC 13, as was held of the multiple basing point system in the Cement Institute case, as those questions are not before us. The practice unquestionably constitutes evidence to be considered, along with other facts and circumstances, as tending to establish the conspiracy charged; and that was the only purpose for which it was considered by the commission.

We conclude the discussion on the sufficiency of the evidence by adverting again to the indisputable fact that through the business practices followed by petitioners it has resulted that in an industry of which they control 85% there has been no price change in ten years and absolutely no price competition whatever. The product has been so standardized that there is no choice of any sort between the products of different producers, and a purchaser anywhere in the country can purchase at the same price including freight from any producer. It is argued that all this is the result of the free play of economic forces, but the commission did not think so; and this is just the sort of question that Congress intended the commission to decide. As was said by the Supreme Court of a similar argument in the Cement Institute case:

> "The commission did not adopt the views of the economists produced by the respondents. It decided that even though competition might tend to drive the price of standardized products to a uniform level, such a tendency alone could not account for the almost perfect identity in prices, discounts, and cement containers which had prevailed for so long a time in the cement industry. The commission held that the uniformity and absence of competition in the industry were the results of understandings or agreements entered into or carried out by concert of the Institute and the other respondents. It may possibly be true, as respondents' economists testified, that cement producers will, without agreement express or implied and without understanding explicit or tacit, always and at all times (for such has been substantially the case here) charge for their cement precisely, to the fractional part of a penny, the price their competitors charge. Certainly it runs counter to what many people have believed, namely, that without agreement, prices will vary—that the desire to sell will sometimes be so strong that a seller will be willing to lower his prices and take his chances. We therefore hold that the commission was not compelled to accept the views of respondents' economist-witnesses that active competition was bound to produce uniform cement prices."

Petitioners contend that even though the order of the commission be upheld, the fifth paragraph, which relates to the practice of freight equalization should be stricken therefrom on the ground that it will interfere with the independent use of the practice of freight equalization by petitioners individually. The prohibitions of paragraph 5 have application, however, only to acts done in carrying out a "planned common course of action, understanding, agreement, combination or conspiracy". We dealt with the question here involved in American Chain & Cable Co. v. Federal Trade Com'n, 4 Cir., 139 F. 2d 622, where petitioner had suggested to the commission, without success, that it clarify a similar order by inserting a declaration that nothing therein was intended to prevent a manufacturer from independently continuing to engage in a given course of action. In affirming the action of the commission, this court, speaking through Judge Soper, after pointing out the history of the present form of the order and the fears of arbitrary action entertained by the petitioner, said:

> "It does not seem to us that the order needs further clarification. It is of course true that a cease and desist order must be certain and unambiguous in its prohibitive terms because business men must operate under it at their peril. * * * But, there can be no doubt that to sustain a charge of violation of the order in this case it must be shown that the prohibited acts have been performed as the result of an agreement or conspiracy, or as the result of a common course of action, that has been agreed upon or planned between two or more persons. If, as the result of such agreement or plan, the petitioners continue to co-operate in a common course of action which has been found to violate the statute, they make themselves liable to the prescribed penalties; and they have no just cause for complaint if in appraising the evidence in any case the triers of fact seek to determine whether there is any relation or connection between their past illegal acts and the conduct under examination. If such a relation or connection is found it may properly be condemned as a continuance of an unlawful conspiracy. Of course the influence of changed business conditions must be taken into account in reaching a decision; but there is no reason to believe that the Federal Trade Commission will fail in its duty in this respect or that the courts will hesitate to modify or reverse an order that is based on inferences not supported by the evidence."

As we have already indicated, the commission consents that its order be modified so as to eliminate the individual petitioners. We think it should be modified, also, to eliminate its application to cork discs. There is no sufficient evidence of any conspiracy or combination in restraint of trade with respect to cork discs, and no finding sufficient to support the application of the order to dealings therein. The evidence discloses that most of the manufacturers of crown bottle caps manufacture the cork discs which they use; and the inclusion of the latter commodity in the order does not seem to have any practical significance.

The order of the commission will be modified by striking therefrom the names of L. C. McAuliffe, E. J. Costa, Joseph C. Feagley and Benno Cohn and by striking the words "or cork discs" from the main body of the order and from the paragraph numbered one; and, as so modified, the order of the commission will be affirmed and enforced.

[¶ 62,484] Bruce's Juices, Inc. v. American Can Company.

In the United States District Court in and for the Southern District of Florida, Tampa Division. No. 569-Civil T. August 10, 1949.

Clayton Act, Robinson-Patman Act

Discrimination Between Fruit Juice Companies—Quantity Discounts—Freight Equalization Policy.—Treble damages were ordered to be paid by a can manufacturer to compensate a fruit juice company for injury received as a result of price discriminations made between the latter company and its competitors in regard to their purchases of cans of like grade and quality. Giving quantity discounts to large customers and allowing them to pool their purchases as well as offering them freight equalization rates while refusing to deal with the smaller complaining firm on this basis was declared to constitute a violation of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2024.49, 2024.57, 2024.62, and the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212.305, 2212.385, 2212.770.

For the plaintiff: Fowler, White, Gillen, Humkey and Yancey, Tampa, Florida, and R. W. Shackleford, Tampa, Florida.

For the defendant: John M. Allison, Tampa, Florida, and G. A. Gesill, New York, New York.

Findings of Fact

Entered by WILLIAM J. BARKER, District Judge.

[Digest] 1. That plaintiff, Bruce's Juices, Inc., is and was during the period involved, a Florida corporation, incorporated in 1928, with its principal place of business at Tampa, Florida, and engaged originally in the canning of citrus juices and later apple and tomato juices, all of which were sold through grocery stores.

4. That the defendant, American Can Company, is a New Jersey corporation, with its offices in New York City, engaged in the manufacture and sale principally of cans, including packers or sanitary cans. Such cans were sold throughout the United States, the Hawaiian Islands and Alaska. (Answer to Plaintiff's Interrogatory No. 1).

5. That both the plaintiff and the defendant were, during the period in question, engaged in Interstate Commerce.

6. That during the entire period in question, plaintiff purchased all of its cans, with a single minor and unimportant exception, from the defendant. (R. 43).

7. That those who sold fruit and vegetable juices in the grocery trade, in the same area, were in competition, whether selling the same juice or not. Those who sold fruit and vegetable juices in the iscan, in the same area, were in competition, whether selling the same juice or not. (R. 341, 667, 668, 720).

14. That in the latter part of 1936 and the early part of 1937 the defendant proceeded to group or classify its customers into three general classes, which it designated as "A", "B" and "C". (R. 899, 900, 901). The "A" customers being those whose purchases from the American Can Company of packers or sanitary cans exceeded $7,000,000 annually; the "B" customers being those whose purchases were from $500,000 to $7,000,000 annually; and the remaining "C" customers being those who purchased under $500,000.00.

15. That competitors of Bruce's Juices purchased cans substantially under contracts identical in many places. (Defendant's Answers to Interrogatories Nos. 5 and 6), including Hawaii and Alaska, where the competitors had canneries, and the American Can Company in determining the quantity discount allowed to plaintiff's said competitors totaled all purchases, regardless of where same were made. (Def. Ans. to Int. 49).

16. That the plaintiff's purchases of cans, during each of the years in question exceeded the respective purchases of the California Packing Corporation and Stokely Brothers, at Tampa, in every year except 1941, each of which corporations had a plant in Tampa, and each of which was engaged in the canning of juices.

17. That defendant gave no consideration to the differing costs of sales in any of the districts into which it divided the United States and its territories, nor was consideration given to the various classes of customers in the different localities and that commissions and other expenses were incurred in some districts and not in others.

18. That the discounts allowed by the American Can Company to California Packing Corporation, Stokely Brothers, Libby, McNeill & Libby, Morgan Packing Company, Hawaiian Pineapple Company, Ltd. and The Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, competitors of Bruce's Juices constituted discriminations in price between purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, and made other than only due allowance for difference in the cost of manufacture, sale or delivery resulting from the differing methods or quantities in which its products are sold or delivered to its customers above named.

19. That the quantity discounts granted to plaintiff's competitors on their purchases of cans of like grade and quality, were based upon the aggregate dollar volume of annual sales rather than upon individual transactions.

20. That the purchases of cans made by said competitors of Bruce's Juices from the defendant, upon which said purchasers received quantity discounts, were made within relevant periods of time as plaintiff's purchases and the said companies and the plaintiff were selling the respective juices in open rivalry in the same markets or communities, and at the same times or within relevant periods of time.

21. That the quantity discount schedule and the defendant's subsequent classification of its customers into classes "A", "B" and "C" was not a good faith effort to formulate a plan whereby discounts would be functionally available to all.

22. That the system provided in defendant's quantity discount schedule, which it carried out in actuality, whereby large customers were permitted to pool or aggregate their purchases made in various plants throughout the country, constantly enabled such customers to purchase their cans for less money than was required to be paid for cans by plaintiff and other independent merchants who operated only one plant.

23. That the result and effect of defendant's quantity discount schedule and its operations thereunder was to enable defendant's larger buyers—larger customers Class "A" and Class "B", California Packing Corporation, Stokely Brothers, Libby, McNeill & Libby, Morgan Packing Company, Hawaiian Pineapple Company, Ltd. and The Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, plaintiff's competitors—to secure a competitive advantage over plaintiff, solely because of the large buyer's quantity purchasing ability.

24. That the granting of the quantity discounts to plaintiff's said competitors resulted in actual and substantial injury and damage to the plaintiff.

26. That Engelman Gardens was in competition with Bruce's Juices in the sale of juices in Iscans during the period in question.

27. That Morgan Packing Company was in competition with Bruce's Juices in the sale of juices in Iscans from June, 1940, through 1942.

31. That the effect of the granting of this quantity discount and the lower price thereby secured by said competitors of Bruce's Juices may be to substantially lessen competition or may tend to create a monopoly or to injure, destroy or prevent competition.

32. That the cannery of Morgan Packing Company at Austin, Indiana, was during the period in question connected with a plant of the defendant company by means of a runway.

33. That such runway effected savings in transportation only in the event the cans so transported were manufactured at Austin, Indiana.

34. That defendant allowed the Morgan Packing Company a discount of 45¢ per thousand on all cans transported across the runway, although a substantial number of grocery cans and all Iscans were manufactured in plants of the American Can Company situated at a point or points other than Austin, Indiana.

37. That the runway allowance granted to Morgan Packing Company on cans which were not manufactured by defendant in its plant at Austin, Indiana, enabled said Morgan Packing Company to purchase its cans for less money than was paid for cans of like grade and quality by the plaintiff and thus gave to Morgan Packing Company a competitive advantage over plaintiff.

38. That the price differential which resulted from the defendant's granting of the runway allowance to Morgan Packing Company and the practical operation thereof made other than due allowance for differences in the cost of manufacture, sale or delivery resulting from the different methods or quantities in which its products were sold or delivered. (Plaintiff's Exhibit 46, Defendant's Exhibit A-44).

39. That the granting of the runaway allowance to Morgan Packing Company resulted in actual and substantial injury to the Plaintiff.

40. That the effect of the discrimination in price resulting from the granting of the runway allowance to Morgan Packing Company may be to substantially lessen competition and may tend to create a monopoly or to injure, destroy or prevent competition.

42. That the freight policy of the defendant was that regardless of where the cans were manufactured freight was equalized to a point where the nearest plant of the American Can Company was located, and freight from the location of the nearest plant of the American Can Company to the customer's canner was paid by the customer.

46. After the low price was given Engelman Gardens it greatly increased its volume of purchases of cans, accelerated its advertising, and inaugurated an ambitious sales program.

47. That Engelman Gardens in the year 1939-40 overpacked, which resulted in it not being able to sell the increased volume of its juice, forced it to store great quantities in warehouses, and caused it to carry over one-half of its pack into the next season. As a direct result of its action the Iscan market became flooded and chaotic, which caused injurious competition to the plaintiff.

49. That the defendant refused to sell Bruce's Juices the 3.12 can in accordance with its long established policy of paying the freight from Baltimore to its Tampa plant, but informed Bruce's Juices that it would have to pay the freight from Baltimore to Tampa.

51. That the action of the American Can Company compelled Bruce's Juices to abandon its planned operations in Delaware and Texas for 1940 and thereby injured and damaged Bruce's Juices.

53. That the American Can Company continued its policy of paying freight from Indianapolis, Indiana, to Austin, (Defendant's Exhibit A-44), yet at the same time it violated its own freight policy with Bruce's Juices in that on the same 3.12 Iscan as purchased by Morgan Packing Company it refused to pay the freight from Baltimore to Tampa for Bruce's Juices.

56. That the defendant's refusal to equalize the price of the various Iscans, and likewise its refusal to follow its price established freight policy, occasioned injury and damage to Bruce's Juices.

57. That the rate of growth of the industry of canning citrus juices in Florida greatly increased between the years 1937 and 1942. (Pltf. Exhibit No. 35)

58. That for several years prior to 1937-38 Bruce's Juices increased its business at a greater rate than did the canning industry as a whole in the State of Florida. In the year 1937-38 its business had increased to a point where it sold 798,000 cases of grocery size cans. (Plaintiff's Exhibit 40).

59. That after said date Bruce's Juices rate of growth fell substantially behind that of the industry and likewise fell far below its own rate of sales in grocery size cans, as follows:

1938-39	694,000 cases
1939-40	331,000 cases
1940-41	496,000 cases
1941-42	259,000 cases

60. That the failure of Bruce's Juices to maintain pace with the growth of the citrus industry in Florida and likewise its failure to maintain its prior volume of sales of grocery size cans directly resulted from the injuries following the discriminations of the American Can Company, as hereinbefore set forth.

61. That in February, 1942, the Government put into effect a regulation known as Order M-81, as the result of which the quota system was thereafter enforced, and which limited a canner's pack to 125% of his 1940-41 pack.

62. That the unlawful discriminations of the American Can Company resulted in reducing the number of cans sold by Bruce's Juices in the base year 1940-41, and had the effect of restricting its quota for the duration of the war.

63. The discrimination of the American Can Company as aforesaid having reduced the number of grocery and Iscans which Bruce's Juices sold in the base year 1940-41 caused Bruce's Juices to receive a quota allowing it a lesser number of cans than it otherwise would have obtained.

64. That in the areas where both the grocery and Iscans were sold the promotional activities incident to the sale of Iscans resulted in a substantial increase in the volume of sales of grocery size cans. Any reduction in the sales of Iscans was reflected in loss of sales in the grocery trade.

65. That Bruce's Juices had throughout the years of its business activities built up a good name, reputation and good will, which were of substantial and real value. That as a result of defendant's discriminatory practices this good will was injured and Bruce's Juices sustained damage thereby.

Conclusions of Law

1. That the court has jurisdiction of the parties hereto and of the subject matter of this cause.

2. That the defendant was, during the period in question, engaged in commerce and the discriminations referred to in the Findings of Fact arose in the course of such commerce.

3. That the purchases referred to in the Findings of Fact were of commodities, i. e., cans, which were of like grade and quality, and said purchases were in commerce and the cans were sold for use or re-sale in the United States.

4. That the effect of defendant's discriminations set forth and referred to in the Findings of Fact were in violation of Section 13 of Title 15 of the United States Code Annotated.

5. That the defendant's actions and conduct, as enumerated and referred to in the Findings of Fact constituted unlawful discriminations violative of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act.

6. That the effect of the discriminations and each of them, as set forth in the Findings of Fact, injured the plaintiff in its business or property.

7. That as the result of the injuries sustained by the plaintiff from the defendant's said unlawful discriminations, plaintiff is entitled to recover against the defendant its actual damages suffered thereby.

8. That in accordance with the Clayton Act, Section 15, Title 15, of the United States Code Annotated, the plaintiff is entitled to recover treble the actual damages sustained, and plaintiff having sustained damages in the minimum sum of Sixty Thousand Dollars ($60,000.00) is entitled to have judgment in the sum of One Hundred Eighty Thousand Dollars ($180,000.00), together with a reasonable attorney's fee, which heretofore has been found to be Thirty-five Thousand Dollars ($35,000.00).

9. That the plaintiff is not entitled to interest from the time of the sustaining of any of its injuries to the time of entering of judgment.

Opinion of WILLIAM J. BARKER, District Judge.

[Digest] I am satisfied from the evidence adduced by the plaintiff—indeed no countervailing evidence was brought forward—that the various cans which are herein question were of "like grade and quality". Proof on this issue established that the cans were all of commercial grade and quality and gave substantially identical performance. Certainly all of the cans were adapted for the function for which they were sold and purchased, to wit, as containers of juice, and they were "the same kind of goods".[1]

The proof establishes and indeed the court will take judicial knowledge that all fruit and vegetable juices sold through grocery stores are competitive with each other. Likewise the evidence has established that defendant's customers mentioned in this opinion were in competition with the plaintiff inasmuch as each of said companies packed their juices in defendant's cans and sold same—in open rivalry—in the same markets during relevant periods of time. To labor this point would be but to confuse the obvious.

Consideration of the entire record convinces me that the defendant's transgressions of the Act of necessity did have an adverse effect upon competition.[2]

It stands admitted, that under the system employed by the defendant, prior to the passage of the Robinson-Patman Act, that the same favored customers received discounts ranging as high as 14%. The fundamental purpose of the Congress[3] in amending the Clayton Act was to abrogate the very practice which defendant was at that time routinely pursuing. I can reach no other conclusion than that the quantity discount system which the defendant subsequently adopted was motivated by defendant's keen desire to retain the accounts and good will of its largest customers. It sought to, and in fact did, achieve this purpose by continuing said customers in a favored discount position.

Defendant's classification of its customers was bottomed merely on the dollar volume of their purchases and the classification bore little or no relation to the actual cost of selling. The end result of defendant's discount system, as it was operated, thus appears from the record: 98% of defendant's customers failed to qualify for any discount; of the 2% which received a discount, only three qualified for the 5% discount in any one of the years here in question. The evidence warrants no other conclusion than that the cost of selling was not proportioned or allocated by customers or even by plants, but was arbitrarily made and favored a few large customers.

Realizing the burden placed upon it by the Act, the defendant has sought to justify its system by urging on the court that it charged or allocated each of the various classes of its customers certain expenses which it contends were incurred by that class. This contention cannot prevail as it is evident to me that the plan followed by the defendant completely disregarded the actual expense incident to selling its individual customers.

As an example of the manner in which this scheme actually functioned, I note that in Florida commission charges were allocated to the Class "C" customers, those who received no discount, notwithstanding that no commissions whatsoever were incurred in this state.

A further example is disclosed by defendant's Exhibit A-28 wherein it appears that in 1940 it cost $7.02 to sell $100.00 worth of merchandise to a "C" customer—the smaller purchaser—and only 57¢ to sell an "A" customer—the largest purchasers.

I can not see how judicial sanction can be given to a plan which disregarded all particular transactions and ignored the actual cost of serving individual customers. Inasmuch as defendant's records demonstrate that only a fractional percentage of its customers has ever been able to qualify for even the minimum discount, I see no escape from the conclusion that the defendant has completely failed to carry the burden resting upon it of justifying the price discrimination resultant from the allowance of the discounts.

In view of the fact that only a fractional percent of defendant's customers were at any time able to reach the lowest rung of the discount ladder, the following observation of Mr. Justice Black in Federal Trade Commission v. Morton Salt Co., 334 U. S. 37, 92 L. Ed. 1196, is peculiarly apposite:

> "Theoretically, these discounts are equally available to all, but functionally they are not".

The further announcements of the court in said opinion clearly condemn defendant's discount system.[4]

An additional and compelling reason for my condemnation of defendant's discount plan is that the discounts actually allowed were based upon the aggregate purchases of its nationwide customers rather than upon orders filled from a single plant. It is clear that such plan does not—indeed could not—accurately reflect actual differences in cost of selling individual customers. Under defendant's system, it was impossible for any small customer to escape his discriminatory classification, irrespective of the degree of efficiency accomplished in the operation of his plant.[5]

The proof discloses that the canning business is one of volume and of short profit, that the cost of containers represents a large percentage of the total cost of the finished product. The right which was extended to customers to pool their purchases made for their widely scattered plants in determining the volume of their purchases enabled said favored few to secure discounts. Thus with the exception of a mere handful, all of defendant's purchasers were placed in an economic strait-jacket from which escape could be accomplished only by a miraculous increase in their needs and purchasing power. Such a system is violative of the essential and fundamental purpose which the Congress had in mind, i. e., that a lower price could be granted only in the event it could be shown to have resulted from an actual savings in cost.[6]

Defendant urgently insists that even though this court is of the opinion that a discriminatory lower price was granted and paid to plaintiff's competitors than allowed plaintiff, that such fact would not entitle the plaintiff to a money judgment. Defendant grounds its position upon the alleged failure of the plaintiff to establish that it had sustained special injury and damage from the granting of the lower price. I find the proof to the contrary. Moreover, I am not in accord with defendant's contention which, in my opinion, is contrary to the rule of reason, as well as the recent trend of judicial thought. I am in full accord with the inference resulting from the searching question posed by Mr. Justice Jackson during the oral argument of the Morton Salt case: "If you sell salt to a one-horse grocer for $1.50 and sell it to the A & P on the opposite corner for $1.35, how can you have a difference of that kind that doesn't hurt?"[7] Also I am impressed by his further statement: "A fellow who has got to pay more, has got less left—less in profit, less to carry on the business". Here admittedly a small canner has paid more for his merchandise than his larger competitor. The price differential was clearly available to the large competitor for innumerable competitive, and therefore harmful, purposes and of necessity the small canner, who has paid more, has thereby sustained direct injury. Argument to the contrary is but to say that a lower price is not beneficial.

My conclusion that proof of special damage is not essential to recovery finds support

[4] "The legislative history of the Robinson-Patman Act makes it abundantly clear that Congress considered it to be an evil that a large buyer could secure a competitive advantage over a small buyer solely because of the large buyer's quantity purchasing ability. The Robinson-Patman Act was passed to deprive a large buyer of such advantages except to the extent that a lower price could be justified by reason of a seller's diminished costs due to quantity manufacture, delivery or sale, or by reason of the seller's good faith effort to meet a competitor's equally low price."

[5] Plaintiff's purchases from defendant's plant in Tampa exceeded the purchases of California Packing Corporation and Stokely Bros. from their respective Tampa plants in every year except 1941. The plaintiff received a discount of 1% in one year and no discount in any other year. California Packing received a 5% discount each year and Stokely received discounts ranging from 3% to 5%. It was admitted that these discounts were available to plaintiff's competitors only by aggregating or pooling purchases made for their plants elsewhere. in the announcements of the Supreme Court in the case of Bruce's Juices, Inc. v. American Can Company, 330 U. S. 743, 91 L. Ed. 1219.[8] The principle of "general damage" is likewise supported by numerous well reasoned decisions.[9] Thus I am convinced that defendant's quantity discount system and the lower prices granted thereunder to plaintiff's competitors which were not received by plaintiff was violative of the Act and occasioned actual injury and dollar damage to the plaintiff.

[Damages Assessed]

I am in full accord with the philosophy and sound reasoning of the "wrongdoer rule", last enunciated and amplified in the case of Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, 327 U. S. 251, 90 L. Ed. 652. Inasmuch as I am convinced that the American Can Company here falls in the category of a "wrongdoer", I feel no hesitancy in applying the principle enunciated in the above case in the following language:

> "The most elementary conceptions of justice and public policy require that the wrongdoer shall bear the risk of the uncertainty which his wrong has created".

And where—as is true in connection with certain of the discriminations depicted in the record—the decline in business is "not shown to be attributable to other causes", I am of the opinion that a dollar mark should be placed on the plaintiff's loss even though the dollar amount of the loss is not depicted in the record with absolute exactness.

From the discriminations hereinbefore mentioned, it is my considered opinion that the record establishes with that degree of certainty here reasonably possible that the plaintiff sustained actual injury and damage in the following particulars:

The unlawful allowance of the quantity discounts to plaintiff's competitors, which were practically not available to and were not received by the plaintiff, occasioned it very substantial damage.

The same is true with reference to the illegal runway allowance granted to plaintiff's competitor, Morgan Packing Company.

I have given careful consideration to plaintiff's claim of damage resulting from its loss of sales and profits incident to its ISCAN business and likewise from the retardation of its growth and expansion in that field. I am of the belief that the defendant's discriminations in connection with the 312 can injured Bruce's Juices, and in fact occasioned it to lose substantial sales that it otherwise would have made. It also appears from the proof that Bruce's Juices' growth in the ISCAN field was definitely retarded by the competition which it confronted as a result of the low price given by defendant to Engelman Cardens, its refusal to equalize the price of other ISCANS, particularly the 314, and its subsequent denial to plaintiff of the absorption of freight from Baltimore to Tampa, in accordance with its theretofore uniform policy. Notwithstanding my above stated conclusions, I am not satisfied that the proof as to the amount of profit which the plaintiff made on ISCAN is sufficient to enable me to translate the particular damage resulting from this injury into dollars, and I am, therefore, not including in my judgment any sum for this claim. However, the injury thus sustained did, in my opinion, directly contribute to occasioning the damage hereinafter discussed.

Plaintiff further contends that the combined and aggregate effect of defendant's three discriminations, i.e., quantity discount allowances, runway allowances to Morgan Packing Company and the discrimination with reference to the 312 can, adversely and seriously injured its overall business structure and operation and that the damage so resultant is reflected and should be reasonably admeasured in dollars by (a) its failure to maintain progress in line with the growth of the citrus industry in Florida in grocery size cans and (b) by the decided drop in its own sales of grocery size cans during the years immediately following the stated discriminations.

[8] "For despite petitioner's plaint on the difficulty of proving damages, it would establish its right to recover three times the discriminatory difference without proving more than the illegality of the prices. If the prices are illegally discriminatory, petitioner has been damaged in the absence of extraordinary circumstances, at least in the amount of that discrimination."

Minneapolis etc. R. Co.*, 149 N. W. 134 (Minn.); National Radiator Co. v. Penn. R. Co., 143 A. 85 (N. J.).

I am in accord with this contention and am of the opinion that the plaintiff's proof measures up to and brings this issue within the theory approved in the Bigelow case.

Not only does the evidence not warrant the inference that the plaintiff's falling behind the growth of the industry, as well as its own prior pace, "was attributable to other causes", but the converse is true. While there is some degree of uncertainty as to the amount of injury and damage thus occasioned the plaintiff, I am of the opinion that such uncertainty as may exist by reason of "the absence of more precise proof" is a risk which properly here falls upon the defendant. I am satisfied that defendant's various discriminatory acts culminated in and occasioned substantial damage to the plaintiff and that said damage is reflected and shown with "a reasonable degree of accuracy, which is all that the law requires".[10]

I . . . find as a fact that the plaintiff has sustained actual damages in the sum of Sixty Thousand Dollars, as a direct result of the defendant's violations of the provisions of the Act. It is my considered judgment that said sum is the minimum amount of plaintiff's damage which was occasioned by the defendant's unlawful discriminations.

If anything in the foregoing opinion is in conflict with any finding of fact or conclusion of law heretofore made, the statement in the opinion may be taken as modifying the findings or conclusion.

[¶ 62,485] Opinion of the Attorney General of Wisconsin.

Addressed to William J. McCauley, District Attorney, by Thomas E. Fairchild, Attorney General. April 26, 1949.

Wisconsin Unfair Sales Act

Cash Payment after Quantity Purchase—Rebate as a Factor of Cost.—It is possible to determine whether a scheme whereby a customer would receive 50 cents in cash upon presentation of a card representing the purchase of 25 gallons of milk would violate the act prohibiting sales below cost only upon a consideration of the cost factors as specified in that act. The rebate here proposed, the Attorney General of Wisconsin advises, goes to make up the final sale price of the milk and should be considered in determining whether or not there has been a sale below cost.

See the Wisconsin Unfair Sales Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8948.05.

[Facts]

You have called our attention to the following set of facts: A dairy retail store operator proposes to issue a free card to customers which contains 25 marks upon its face. It is his plan to punch one of these marks each time the holder of the card purchases a gallon of milk. When the 25 punches have been made, the card is redeemable for 50 cents in cash. This is stated upon the face of the card. You ask whether or not this scheme is in violation of either the trading stamp law, sec. 100.15 of the Wisconsin statutes, or the unfair sales act, sec. 100.30.

[Trading Stamp Law Violation]

It is my opinion that this scheme would not be in violation of the trading stamp law because of the following portion of sec. 100.15 (1):

"* * * except that any manufacturer, packer, or dealer may issue any slip, ticket, or check with the sale of any goods, wares or merchandise, which slip, ticket, or check shall bear upon its face a stated cash value and shall be redeemable only in cash for the amount stated thereon, upon presentation in amounts aggregating twenty-five cents or over of redemption value, and only by the person, firm or corporation issuing the same * * *"

[Rebate, a Factor in Cost]

The unfair sales act prohibits the practice of sales below "cost," as therein defined, in order to attract patronage. It is not possible to determine whether the sale of milk under this scheme would be in violation of this law without knowledge of the "cost" factors. The "cost" factors specified in sec. 100.30 (2) (a) for retailers are: Invoice cost within 30 days or replacement cost, whichever is lower; trade discounts, if any; freight and cartage charges and markup to cover a proportionate part of the cost of business. Obviously, the rebate here proposed goes to make up the final sale price of the milk and should, therefore, be considered in determining whether or not there has been a sale below "cost."

Sherman Antitrust Act

Motion Picture Industry—Production of Correspondence Between Film Company and Film Association—No Attorney-Client Privilege.—Upon considering two motions made in two civil actions against motion picture distributors, an order was made by the Court requiring the distributors to produce correspondence received from a motion picture association; a request to have a similar order vacated was denied. The correspondence sought was not privileged by reason of an attorney-client relationship.

Memorandum

Opinion of JOHN P. BARNES, District Judge.

[Digest] In each of the above-entitled cases the plaintiff has alleged that

> "the defendants have exchanged information between themselves regarding the clearances they have granted or proposed to grant over the plaintiff's theatre, and their method of licensing picture in the City of Chicago, through the Motion Picture Association of America, Inc., or through employees of the Motion Picture Association of America, Inc. * * *"

In each case the defendants have denied the allegation. In each case the plaintiff has filed a motion asking that defendants be required to produce for inspection and copying all correspondence received by each of the defendant distributors from the Motion Picture Association of America, Incorporated, or any of its agents, officers or employees, since certain specified dates prior to the filing of each action, regarding the theatre operated by the plaintiff or the licensing of motion pictures for exhibition in the city where such theatre is located.

On June 29, 1949, the court granted plaintiff's motion in the Benal case. A motion to vacate has been made. The court has considered the written briefs and arguments of counsel. Oral argument has been waived.

The court has * * * concluded that the order should stand in the Benal case and that a like order should be made in the South Bend case. The court has no intention of permitting a violation of the attorney-client privilege rule or the rule laid down in Hickman v. Taylor. The fact is that this court has at all times followed the rule announced in Hickman v. Taylor, and that even before it was announced by the Supreme Court in that case. But the correspondence sought in the case at bar is not covered by either the attorney-client privilege rule or by the rule announced in the case of Hickman v. Taylor; and the plaintiff has the right to have the court, rather than counsel for defendants, pass upon whether or not the material sought is competent, relevant and material.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Order in Which Litigants May Examine—Motion To Vacate Denied—Motion To Stay Proceedings Denied.—A photographic supply company, defendant in a private action based on antitrust violations, failed to persuade the Court that as a general rule the defendant had the right to examine the other party first. A motion to vacate an order granting leave to the plaintiff to serve notice of taking depositions was denied. A motion to stay proceedings until determination of a government civil suit was also denied when it was held that the plaintiff had a right to pursue its cause of action separately and apart from the cause of the Government.

For the defendants Technicolor, Inc. and Technicolor Motion Picture Corporation: Fulton, Walter & Halley; Hugh Fulton, Joseph W. Burns, George T. Frampton.

Opinion of CONGER, District Judge.

[Nature of Motions]

[Digest] Motions by defendant Eastman Kodak Company in each of the above cases:

(1) Vacating and setting aside the order of November 19, 1948 granting plaintiff leave to serve notice of taking of depositions of Thomas Jean Hargrave and Edward P. Curtis and the plaintiff's notice dated November 19, 1948;

(2) That depositions shall not be taken by the plaintiff of Thomas Jean Hargrave nor Edward P. Curtis nor of any officers, employees or agents of the defendant Eastman Kodak Company until issue is joined herein and until after taking by the defendant Eastman Kodak Company of the depositions of certain present or former officers, directors, or agents of the plaintiff.

[Alleged Priority of Defendant]

Defendant contends that plaintiff has no right to an examination at this time; that plaintiff has shown no fact, reason or circumstances whatever for granting leave to serve the notice to take the depositions asked for, simultaneously with the service of the complaint; that the order permitting the service of the notices of examination should be vacated.

Defendant appeared in these actions through its attorneys on November 30, 1948. Issue has not yet been joined.

In support of its contention defendant argues that by the procedure initiated by plaintiff, defendant is being deprived of its substantial right to examine first and that "the normal and usual procedure is that the defendant first examine the principal officers and witnesses of the plaintiff."

I know of no such rule or procedure.

[Rule 26 as Amended]

Rule 26 (a) was recently amended to provide that any party might take the deposition of any person, including a party after commencement of the action except that a plaintiff may not, without leave of the Court, take such depositions if notice of the taking is served by the plaintiff within 20 days of the commencement of the action.

This created a radical change in the old Rule. I have been unable to find any case interpreting this amendment.

[Former Rule Broadened]

The report of the Advisory Committee on Amendments to Rules does shed some light on the subject. See "Note. Subdivision (a)" following New Rule 26 (5 F. R. D. 453). In the absence of clarity in the Rule itself, the Reviser's notes are most persuasive. As I read the note, it indicates an intent to broaden the former Rule so that now either party may start taking depositions after the complaint is served but with a 20 day delay period against the plaintiff, (except by order of the Court), and this only as the note says because it is a protection for a defendant who has not had an opportunity to retain counsel and inform himself of the nature of the suit.

[Protection of Defendant]

I believe that the Rule makers in that case intended that the plaintiff should go to Court for leave so that the Court might protect such a defendant, one without an attorney and one who was not informed of the nature of the proceeding.

This defendant did not need the protection of the Court in those respects. It had attorneys and it appeared in the action before the expiration of the 20 days and about 2 weeks before the date set for the taking of the deposition. There can be no question but that this defendant at a consultation with its attorney, with the complaint before them, could have been and must have been informed of the "nature of the suit." My interpretation of the intent of the Rule is corroborated by the last sentence of the Reviser's note which reads as follows:

> "The modified practice here adopted is along the line of that followed in various states. See, e. g., 8 Mo. Rev. Stat. Ann., 1939, Section 1917; 2 Burns' Ind. Stat. Ann., 1933, Section 2-1506."

In both Indiana and Missouri the statutes and the cases interpreting the statutes, either party without limitation, has the right to take deposition, anytime after the suit is pending and/or after the complaint is served.

[Motions Denied]

I, therefore, deny the motions made by defendant Eastman Kodak Company.

A similar motion has been made in the second action by Technicolor, Inc. and Technicolor Motion Picture Corporation. The above opinion applies to them as well as to Eastman Kodak Company. The motion of these defendants is denied.

If, as claimed by these defendants, my ruling against them will cause undue and great hardship, they of course may apply for relief to the Court under other and appropriate provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

[Motion For Stay of Proceedings]

The defendants Technicolor, Inc. and Technicolor Motion Picture Corporation further move that all proceedings be stayed as to them in the second action until determination of Civil Action No. 7507-M brought against these defendants under the Anti-Trust laws by the United States of America in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California.

I can see no good reason at this time to stay this action. Plaintiff has a private statutory right to bring the action. Plaintiff has a right to pursue its cause of action separately and apart from the cause of the Government. The case of the Government may take a long time to try. Plaintiff's case certainly should not be stayed at this early stage to await the determination of the Government's case.

This branch of the motion is denied.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Relationship Between Parent and Subsidiary—Affidavit Evidence—Jurisdictional Question and Hearing on the Merits.—In an action based on antitrust violations in which damages and an injunction were sought, a motion to dismiss, supported by affidavit evidence, was denied. The Court directed that the jurisdictional issue which involved the relationship between a parent company and its subsidiary and whether the parent transacted business through its subsidiary within the Court's jurisdiction, be disposed of on another preliminary hearing where evidence could be taken or else await the submission of the case on the merits.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.291.

For the defendant Capital Records, Inc. in support: Joseph H. Colman, Charles F. Noonan, and J. E. Hanthorn (Dorsey, Colman, Barker, Scott & Barber) Minneapolis, Minnesota.

For the plaintiffs in opposition: Lee Loevinger (Larson, Loevinger, Lindquist & Freeman) Minneapolis, Minnesota.

[Nature of Motion]

Opinion of GUNNAR H. NORDBYE, District Judge.

[Digest] This action arises out of alleged antitrust law violations. 15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 1, et seq. Plaintiffs seek damages and an injunction. Defendant Capitol Records, Inc., has moved for a dismissal as to itself, alleging (1) wrong venue and (2) lack of proper service. The second part of the motion was abandoned at the hearing of the motion, however, so the venue question is the only issue now before the Court.

[Jurisdictional Issue]

The parties hereto use the term "venue" and "jurisdiction" interchangeably at times, but the basic question nevertheless is one of jurisdiction. That is, the Court has jurisdiction of the person of defendant Capitol Records, Inc., if venue under Section 15 of 15 U. S. C. A. can be established in this district. Otherwise, the service on the moving defendant in California does not vest this Court with jurisdiction.

The defendant offers the affidavit of its president in support of the motion. The parts of it particularly relevant to this question declare:

"(3) That Capitol Records, Inc., is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California and is an inhabitant thereof, with its principal office and place of business at Los Angeles, California; that Capitol Records, Inc. has no agents in the State of Minnesota; that Capitol Records, Inc. is not transacting business in the State of Minnesota, nor has it appointed an agent for the service of process in the State of Minnesota.

"(4) That Capitol Records Distributing Corp. is not an agent of Capitol Records, Inc., but a separate entity operating and doing business under the management and supervision of its own officers and directors."

[Grounds of Opposition]

Plaintiffs oppose the motion upon the ground that "a bald denial by affidavit of an essential allegation of the complaint" cannot be the basis for a dismissal by motion. The complaint alleges that defendant Capitol Records, Inc., distributes records in Minnesota through its agent, Capitol Records Distributing Corporation. Whether the agency necessary to jurisdiction in this Court exists, plaintiffs contend, must await trial and determination of the case on its merits.

[Failure to Set Forth Facts]

Obviously, defendant's affidavit in support of the motion does not allege facts. It alleges conclusions. For whether the defendant is transacting business in Minnesota, is found in Minnesota, or is an inhabitant or has an agent in Minnesota are conclusions which are based upon the factual situation interpreted in light of the statutes and decisions. It is fundamental that this Court should not dismiss an action unless it is clear and certain that this Court can award no relief. This is true whether the basis for dismissal is one of jurisdiction, Bell v. Preferred Life Assur. Society, (1943) 320 U. S. 238, 64 S. Ct. 5, or whether the complaint fails to state a substantive claim for which relief can be granted. Dennis v. Village of Tonka Bay, (8 C. C. A., 1945) 151 F. 2d 411. The same policy and reasoning justifies the same conclusion with respect to venue. Conclusions cannot create the certainty required with respect to a factual question. They state the result which is in question, not the premise which justifies the result.

Although, as defendant contends, the burden of sustaining jurisdiction and venue rests upon plaintiffs, they are only obligated to plead in the complaint ultimate facts which sufficiently allege venue so as to sustain the Court's jurisdiction. Reasonable time should be afforded them in which to sustain the burden of establishing jurisdiction if it is challenged. Interrogatories and other discovery proceedings may be used by plaintiffs after filing their complaint for the purpose of obtaining facts which will sustain the burden imposed upon them when an appropriate hearing on the question of jurisdiction is held.

[Merits May Be Involved]

In the instant situation, the motion of the defendant may go to the merits of the action. That is, it involves the relationship between the parent and the subsidiary, the method of doing business between these two concerns, and whether the parent, through its subsidiary, transacts business in this State. It seems clear that these matters pertain to a consideration of factual questions and issues which should not be disposed of at a summary hearing based upon affidavits, especially where the affidavits set forth mere conclusions rather than facts which buttress the conclusions indicated. As stated, plaintiffs should be afforded a reasonable opportunity to prove by interrogatories and depositions or otherwise the factual basis upon which they rely for the jurisdiction of this Court. The Court understands that interrogatories are now being submitted by the plaintiffs. Whether in the instant case the question of jurisdiction will be so merged with a determination of the merits of the cause of action that that question must await trial, cannot be determined until the question is properly before the Court. In any event, it seems clear that, on this showing, the Court would not be justified in upholding the moving defendant's contention as to lack of jurisdiction. This is the type of case where the question of jurisdiction must await a more complete showing, either on another preliminary hearing where evidence may be taken and considered, or await the submission of the case on its merits to the Court. In view of the premises and the reasons stated, the present motion is denied without prejudice.

New York Fair Trade Act

Non-Signing Parties to Fair Trade Contracts—Closing Out Sales—Injunction To Enjoin Price Cutting Denied.—The Court denied a motion for a temporary injunction to enjoin sales at prices below those established in a fair trade contract. Retailers who were not parties to such an agreement were not bound by a provision in it to offer to sell the product back to the manufacturer before selling at less than fixed prices in order to close out stock. They were bound by the contract only to the extent that the New York Fair Trade Act made the contract binding upon them.

See the New York Fair Trade Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.40, and see the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7278, 7306.

MR. JUSTICE RABIN. The defendants claim that the merchandise which is being sold at less than the prices fixed by plaintiff is all part of a single purchase made in January, 1949, and that the sales are being made for the purpose of closing out the defendants' stock with the intention of discontinuing further dealings in the article. The fact that the sales have continued over a fairly long period of time does not alter the statutory rights of the defendants to resell at less than the fixed prices for the purpose of closing out their stock. Defendants may continue to make sales, if their purpose is to close out the stock and not to deal in plaintiff's product thereafter, until they have disposed of the entire lot purchased by them in January, 1949. The claim that defendants cannot avail themselves of the statutory exception because they have not first offered to sell the products back to plaintiff at the price which they paid originally is without merit. The statute contains no such qualification. It is true that plaintiff's fair trade contract contains such a provision, but it is at most binding upon those who became parties to the contract. The present defendants did not become parties to the contract and they are bound by it only to the extent that the statute makes the contract binding upon them (see section 369-b, General Business Law). The motion for a temporary injunction is denied. The brief submitted by the attorneys for defendants, in effect, consents to immediate trial of the issues. Plaintiff, if it so elects, may obtain an early trial, the election to be indicated upon the settlement of the order. Settle order.

For the reasons indicated on the companion motion, decided simultaneously herewith, this motion for a temporary injunction is denied. Plaintiff may obtain an early trial if it so elects, such election to be indicated upon the settlement of the order. Settle order.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Separation of Causes—Antitrust and Patent Claims—Interest of Justice.—A motion to separate antitrust and patent claims was granted. The issues, proof and witnesses of the two causes were substantially different.

See the Sherman Antitrust Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.605.

For plaintiff and additional defendant: Richard F. Corroon (Sutherland, Berl & Potter) of Wilmington, Del., and Mark F. Hughes and Raymond C. Murphy (Wilkie, Owen, Farr, Gallagher & Walton) of New York, New York.

For the defendant: Alexander L. Nichols (Morris, Steel, Nichols & Arsht) of Wilmington, Del., and Daniel H. Kane (Duell & Kane) of New York, New York, and Marvin C. Harrison and Allan Hull (Harrison, Thomas, Spangenberg & Hull) of Cleveland, Ohio.

Opinion of RODNEY, D. J. [Digest] Plaintiff and the additional defendant have moved under Rule 42(b), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, for an order directing a separate trial of the two claims asserted in the defendant's counterclaim. The motion is supported by two affidavits, and no affidavits in opposition have been filed.

This action was instituted by Container under the Federal Declaratory Judgments Act for a declaratory judgment of the invalidity and non-infringement by it of Patent No. 2,382,858 owned by Carpenter. The amended complaint substantially alleges that Carpenter has charged Container with infringement of the said patent, that Container does not in fact infringe it, and that the patent is invalid.

The affidavits in support of the motion assert that the second claim or cause of action in the counterclaim relates solely to patent law, whereas the first claim or cause of action relates solely to the anti-trust laws of the United States. The affidavits assert four grounds in favor of separation: (1) the anti-trust issues, proof and witnesses are entirely different from the patent issues, proof and witnesses; (2) the anti-trust issues will be tried by counsel different from those trying the patent issues, at least so far as Container and Continental are concerned; (3) Continental is only concerned with the anti-trust issues and is not a party to the patent claim; and (4) a joint trial of the issues would greatly delay the trial of the patent issues to the prejudice of Container.

No opposing affidavits were filed by Carpenter, but it is strongly urged by Carpenter that disposition of the motion should be deferred until more facts are gathered and presented to the court, it being argued that the two claims in the counterclaim do in fact overlap in many respects and that a compilation of all the pertinent facts in the case will enable the court to determine more adequately and properly whether or not separation is warranted. Carpenter argues that pre-trial discovery preparation would be greatly hampered if separation is now granted, because the parties would undoubtedly not be able to agree as to whether certain requested material is relevant to the first or second cause of action. Carpenter also urges that since both causes overlap on many facts there will be a duplication of preparation as to these facts if separation is ordered at this time.

Rule 42(b) provides that:

> "The court in furtherance of convenience or to avoid prejudice may order a separate trial of any claim . . . [or] counterclaim . . . or of any separate issue or of any number of claims . . . counterclaims . . . or issues."

An order under this rule is clearly a matter lying in the sound discretion of the court.[1]

This motion is sufficiently complete to compel me to grant the motion to separate.

[1] Cofax Corp. v. Minn. Mining & Mfg. Co., S. D. N. Y., 1948, 8 F. R. D. 303, 305; Western Constr. Co. v. Nat. Surety Corp., 4 Cir., 1947, 163 F. 2d 456, 458; U. S. Industrial Chem., Inc. v. Carbide & Carbon Chem. Corp., S. D. N. Y., 1943, 7 Fed. Rules Serv. 57.3, Case 3, pp. 843, 845; Soc. of European State Authors & Composers, Inc. v. WCAU, E. D. Pa., 1940, 35 F. Supp. 460, 461.

It seems clear that the issues, proof and witnesses in the anti-trust claim are substantially different from and foreign to the issues, proof and witnesses in the patent infringement claim. While Carpenter urges that the two claims do overlap, the only example of such overlapping which has been given is the allegedly attempted suppression by Container and Continental of patent 858 as indicated by their active litigation of the interference proceedings in the Patent Office on such patent. Carpenter contends that these interference proceedings are relevant not only to the patent infringement claim but also to the anti-trust claim because they are evidence of the alleged violation by Container and Continental of the anti-trust laws through attempted suppression of the patent.

We not only have an uncontroverted affidavit that the two claims will be entirely different in their issues, proof and witnesses, but it also seems probable to the court that such is substantially the fact. The issues in the patent infringement claim will be whether or not patent '858 is valid and, if so, is it infringed as alleged.[2]

If the two claims do overlap with respect to certain facts, it does not necessarily follow that separation will require a duplication of preparation in connection with pre-trial discovery. Material gathered by one party in discovery proceedings on one claim would certainly be available to that party in preparation of the other claim and would seem to lessen the work required by such party in preparing such other claim.

Carpenter contends that disposition of this motion now is premature and should be deferred until all the facts are gathered in preparation for trial. The court observed at oral argument, and it is still the opinion of the court, that if separation is to be granted in this action at all, it should be granted at this stage of the proceedings.

Rule 42(b) justifies separation to further convenience or avoid prejudice. Since it appears from the record that the issues, proof and witnesses will be substantially different for each claim, the convenience of both the parties and the court will be served by separation. Insofar as Container and Continental are concerned, counsel trying the anti-trust claim will not try the patent infringement claim, and Continental is not concerned as a party with the latter claim. Convenience to these parties would thus be served by separation for this reason also. Finally, there is on record a sworn statement that Container is ready now for trial of the patent infringement claim and will not be ready for some months for trial of the anti-trust claim. Assuming that Carpenter is or will soon be in a like position, it would seem prejudicial to Container to defer determination of the patent claim until the anti-trust claim could also be determined, because if Container should lose on the patent claim damages would have been accruing during all this time when Container was ready to have its rights determined upon such matter. Separation now would avoid this prejudice.

This action involves three claims: the claim asserted by Container in the complaint for a declaratory judgment, the anti-trust claim in the counterclaim, and the patent infringement claim therein. The issues involved in the claim in the complaint for a declaratory judgment and in the patent infringement claim in the counterclaim are identical, and if the two claims in the counterclaim are separated for trial, the trial of the patent infringement claim will also dispose of the issues raised in the complaint.

While only the furtherance of convenience and the avoidance of prejudice are mentioned in Rule 42(b) as justifying separation, it is inherent in such rule that separation must also serve the ends of justice. Of course, the purpose of the Rules is to simplify judicial procedure, and they should be construed "to secure the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action." Rule 1, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A. The spirit of the Rules would seem to require a separation here as requested.

The instant case is extremely similar to Soc. of European Stage Aut. and Comp., Inc. v. WCAU, E. D. Pa., 1940, 35 F. Supp. 460, wherein the court ordered separation as being consonant with justice, in furtherance of convenience, and in avoidance of prejudice.

Carpenter has indicated a possibility of a desire for a jury trial of the anti-trust claim if separation is directed as requested. It is asserted upon Carpenter's behalf that a jury trial had not been demanded by it as of right because at the time it was assumed that all issues would be determined in one trial.

Rule 39(b) provides that the court upon motion and in its discretion may order a trial by jury notwithstanding the failure of a party to make a timely demand therefor under the Rules. There being no such motion before the court, nothing can be determined upon the point at this time.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Price-Fixing Conspiracy — Exclusion of Producers from Market — Sufficiency of Indictment. — A verdict of guilty to a charge of conspiracy to fix prices for all fish caught by any fisherman and sold to any dealer was affirmed. On appeal, the holding was attacked on behalf of a fisherman's group and fourteen individuals on the ground that the indictment failed to state a crime. Even assuming, the Court reasoned, that the appellants' immunity either as a labor union or as members of a cooperative had not been expressly negatived on the face of the indictment, the remaining allegations stated a crime. Conspiracy to fix prices is in and of itself a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act and no group can be permitted to combine for this purpose even though it is sought to be achieved by applying pressure only in the interstate fishing ports. In denying the appeal, the Court held that the allegations of the indictment were fully proved by evidence which showed in addition to price-fixing activity a concerted action to exclude certain producers from the market and to prevent certain dealers from obtaining supplies of fish. Evidence of picketing, boycotting, and threats of violence and pressure, methods used to achieve the desired end, were properly received, the Court ruled, for the limited purpose of showing the participation of the individuals in seeking to obtain a price-fixing contract.

Before Stephens and Bone, Circuit Judges, and Fee, District Judge.

[Grounds of Appeal]

James Alger Fee, District Judge: The United States initiated this criminal action against the defendants by indictment charging the violation of the Anti-Trust Act. The cause was tried before a jury. A verdict of guilty was found. This appeal has been taken upon the main grounds that (1) the indictment does not state a crime, (2) that evidence vital to defense was rejected, (3) that the verdict was against the evidence, (4) that the Court did not properly instruct the jury, and (5) that the method of drawing the juries in this district was improper and that a conviction in this case cannot stand, irrespective of the fairness of the trial. These general classifications of exceptions will be dealt with in this order. At the argument before this Court, counsel for appellants took the position that the sufficiency of the indictment was the vital point of the appeal.

[Allegations of Indictment]

The indictment charges a conspiracy to restrain and an actual restraint of trade, over a large territory in the southwestern United States,[1] in one of the most highly important and highly perishable articles of food given to mankind, namely, fresh fish and crustaceans, coming into "fishing ports"[2] for sale to dealers. The fishing areas, according to the indictment, include the waters, both territorial and foreign, off Southern California south of Morro Bay and the territorial waters of the west coast of Mexico.[3] It is then alleged:

> "Approximately 75% of all fishermen in the fishing area defined herein are members of defendant Local 36, IFAWA."[4]

These fishermen are alleged to be the:

> "* * * individual or group of individuals who own, lease or operate a particular boat for the purpose of engaging on their own account in the business of catching fresh fish and crustaceans in the fishing area, and bringing them to fishing ports for the purpose of sale to dealers."

The charge as to the nature of the association is that:

> "The fishermen who are members of Local 36, IFAWA are not employees, workers, or laborers who receive a salary or wage for their work or labor, but are independent businessmen engaged in business on their own account, and who operate fishing boats for their own account and profit. No employer-employee relationship exists between these fishermen and the dealers to whom their catch is sold. The fishermen members of Local 36, IFAWA, sell their catch directly to dealers, and do not act collectively through Local 36, IFAWA, in catching, producing, preparing for marketing, processing and handling their catch."

The gist of the charge is that defendants have:

> "* * * knowingly and continuously engaged in a wrongful and unlawful combination and conspiracy * * * to fix, determine, establish, and maintain arbitrary, artificial and noncompetitive prices for the sale to dealers of fresh fish and crustaceans caught in the fishing area, and to prevent dealers who do not agree to pay said prices from obtaining, selling or shipping any fresh fish or crustaceans, which combination and conspiracy has been in restraint of the aforesaid trade and commerce, in violation of * * * the Sherman Act."

Elaboration in detail of this charge is presented in the indictment.

In summary, the means and methods of carrying out the conspiracy as charged consisted of a continuing agreement and concert of action, the substantial terms of which were that appellants (1) agree to fix minimum prices to be charged for the sale of fresh fish and crustaceans caught by the fishermen in the fishing area and sold to dealers, (2) agree that these prices so charged by fishermen members of the local shall be stabilized and noncompetitive, (3) agree to draw up a written contract form,

> "and to impose said contract upon fish dealers who refuse to sign the same by picketing and boycotting methods, and to prefer fish dealers who sign said written contract, and to refuse to sell or deliver any fish caught by fishermen members of Local 36, IFAWA to fish dealers who do not enter into said contract;"

(4) agree to prevent non-cooperating dealers from obtaining fresh fish from any other source by similar methods, (5) agree to prevent such dealers from shipping or transporting any fish, (6) agree to boycott any concern or individual accepting from such dealers fish for shipment in or outside California, (7) agree to picket and boycott any concern delivering fish shipped from brokers or others in or outside California to such dealers, (8) agree to prevent nonmember fishermen from fishing or delivering fish to any than a cooperating dealer, and only to such dealer:

> "after said non-member fishermen had picketed non-signing dealers, or in lieu thereof, had paid to Local 36, IFAWA a stipulated picket fee."

It is specifically alleged that "defendants by agreement and concerted action have done the thing which, as hereinbefore alleged, they conspired to do," for the purpose of forming and effectuating the conspiracy and combination set up for the purpose of forcing and coercing fish dealers into signing the aforesaid form of contract, threatened to withhold and have withheld from said dealers, supplies of fresh fish and crustaceans, and by boycott and picketing methods have attempted to prevent and have prevented said dealers who refused to sign said form of contract from securing fresh fish or crustaceans from any other source.

The result of the combined action then, according to the allegations of the indictment, was that:

> "Except for the illegal restraints described hereinafter, a much greater volume of fresh fish and crustaceans would have been brought to the fishing ports named herein and sold, processed and distributed from these ports in interstate commerce."

and also the effect was that:

> "The aforesaid agreement and concerted action of the defendants, pursuant to and in furtherance of the conspiracy herein alleged, has had the effect, as intended by the defendants"

(1) of preventing fishermen from carrying on normal fishing operations in the area, (2) of preventing fish from being sold to the non-cooperating fish dealer and "as further resulting in the fixing of arbitrary and non-competitive prices" for the fish sold by the members of the local to cooperating dealers, and has prevented the public in the territorial area from receiving a normal and usual supply of fresh fish, and "has unreasonably restrained the interstate and foreign trade and commerce described * * *."

The contract specifying the prices proposed between the fishermen and the dealers is attached to the indictment. We have no occasion to consider whether, standing alone, a charge of the execution of this contract by dealers and fishermen belonging to the organization would have stated a violation [5] of the statute or not. But the indictment must be considered as a whole.[6] A charge which indicates that 75% of the fishermen, as independent businessmen belonging to the organization, agreed not to let any fishermen fish in the high seas and in the territorial waters of Southern California and Mexico or to deliver fish to any other than a cooperating dealer except on the specified conditions, whether by their consent or not, is a charge of a conspiracy in direct and illegal restraint of interstate and foreign commerce. Fishing in such waters falls into the rubric of such commerce. Transportation of the fish to the market at the specified cities from the high seas and territorial waters is commerce. All the fishermen were engaged in interstate and foreign commerce. This was developed by allegation as an integral part of the scheme. The charge that appellants, with such control, intended to and effected such a restraint over production in interstate and foreign commerce, was alone sufficient. This is the selection of only one feature from the indictment. There is also charged a conspiracy to control all of the fishermen of the fishing area and all the fish dealers of the territory involved, with the intent of obtaining a monopoly of the catching and selling all fish by restraining all fishermen, dealers, carriers and outside suppliers of fish. The purpose to grant preferential and equal rights to the signing dealers and to exclude non-signing dealers from the market is likewise set up. But the gist of the accusation is the allegation of a conspiracy to fix arbitrary, artificial and non-competitive prices [7] for all fish so caught and sold by any fisherman to any dealer.

It is true the application of pressure is charged only in the interstate fishing ports, but that is sufficient.

[Immunity Argument]

The main focus of the attack upon the indictment is that, taken in connection with other facts not alleged therein, the allegations do not state a crime. The thesis is that appellants were "working, original producers combined for the purpose of fixing the price of the products of their own labor" and therefore were protected by the Clayton and Norris La Guardia Acts as a labor union, and were protected by the Fishermen's Marketing Act "as members of a cooperative." The confusion of thought of counsel for appellants in these conflicting claims is manifest. Even if the Court took judicial knowledge of the "facts" assumed, the indictment still states a crime. But the existence of an employer-employee relationship between the fishermen and the dealers is therein expressly negatived It is distinctly denied also that the union was acting as a cooperative bargaining agent for the fishermen with the dealers. It is distinctly stated that the fishermen are independent businessmen dealing with the fish for their own profit and advantage. Appellants contend that, "from the face of the indictment, plus facts of which the Court may take judicial notice," no public offense is stated, which amounts to a speaking demurrer. In construing an indictment, on demurrer the courts cannot consider extraneous matter.[8] Finally, the allegations are such that, even without these negatives, no group could be permitted to combine for the purpose therein set up of restraining production of, transportation of and trade in food fish in a vast territory.[9] The indictment stated a crime.

Once these facts are alleged and the effect of these two statutes and similar acts removed from contemplation, independent businessmen have no immunity to enter into agreements and combinations with the intent and purpose of restraining interstate commerce, which have the actual effect of restraint. The indictment was not vulnerable to the attack made. If proved beyond a reasonable doubt, including the negatives, the allegations of the indictment would warrant conviction.

[Adequate Evidence]

The evidence showed that the allegations of the indictment were fully proved as to scope of the conspiracy. The proof tended to show a concert by the appellants to compel by force uniform action by dealers and fishermen to establish a stabilized, arbitrary price for fresh fish in the area. It is significant that the dealers did not enter into the agreement suggested voluntarily, but only when subjected to compulsion. Some of them took the ground that they had been advised such a combination of organized workers and businessmen dealing in the product would be illegal. If the fishermen had been members of a labor union, the position would have been sound according to the underlying principle of the Brims case,[10] the Columbia River Packers case[11] and Brotherhood of Carpenters v. United States.[12]

The allegations of the indictment were fully proved as laid as to the scope and intent of the conspiracy.[13] The combination and concert of action were established with the primary objective of fixing and maintaining "arbitrary, artificial and non-competitive prices" and a subsidiary objective of excluding from the market non-cooperative dealers by preventing such dealers "from obtaining, selling or shipping any fresh fish." The corollary also charged established by proof that fishermen not belonging to the association were prevented from fishing at all on the high seas or in territorial waters unless they were subservient to the conspirators. The evidence showed that non-cooperating boats owned by independent fishermen were dubbed "unfair" and were warned to conform.

It was also proved as charged that incidental services, such as ice, were withheld by pressure from "unfair" boats and non-cooperating dealers. Deliveries to non-cooperating dealers of fresh fish shipped to them were stopped by pressure and threatened violence to express agencies, railroads, truck lines and other carriers, according to the record. There was evidence also of appeals broadcast to fishermen in other states to stop the flow of fresh fish into this area in interstate commerce.

[Interstate Commerce]

The operations of the fishermen and dealers were proved to be in interstate and foreign commerce. The record shows fresh fish were shipped by the dealers to points in many southwestern states, and fresh fish was shipped into Southern California, not only from Northern California but from Oregon and Washington. Not only members of the local, but the independent fishermen as well, fished off the shores of California in the territorial waters of Mexico and on the high seas. Their boats then mingled with ships on open highways of the world and the fish from there landed at the fishing ports was a product in foreign commerce.[14]

[Local Restraint]

Besides, there was an effective restraint applied at the local level,[15] which was intended to and did have an effect upon interstate and foreign commerce. It was proved that both members of the union and independent fishermen were restrained from fishing in the areas above mentioned and were placed under various restrictions by the "strike" committee, as to where the fish so caught should be disposed of. Certain independent fishermen were compelled to dump their catch, in violation of the law of California[16] and the moral dictates against waste of food. There is then evidence that the squeeze was applied all along the line, and, even if the source and application of the restraint were intrastate, it could be found that the necessary effect was "to stifle or restrain commerce among the states." United States v. Women's Sportswear Assn., 336 U. S. 460, 464.

The ends desired by the appellants according to the evidence were accomplished by picketing and boycotting and by unconcealed threats of violence and pressure. Appellants objected to this evidence, but it was properly received. The Clayton Act does not operate by prescribing silence on the issue and preventing the production of evidence. Even where a union is involved, evidence as to picketing and boycotting may be introduced if the case is submitted to the jury with the proper instructions. Brotherhood of Carpenters v. United States, 330 U. S. 395.

This combination had substantial proportions according to the record. The association and fourteen individuals appeal. There is evidence that by far the greater number of the fishermen who catch in the fishing area are members of the association. About twenty million pounds of fresh fish are caught annually in this fishing area and sold to dealers in these ports. In the neighborhood of one million pounds of fresh fish were shipped to dealers in these designated ports from places outside of California. There is considerable fresh fish caught by fishermen in the fishing area which is shipped to other states of the Southwest. The restraint of interstate and foreign trade imposed for a month at these points might have been found from the evidence to have been substantial, to have been direct and effective, and to have been unreasonable if such findings were required.

The written agreement in the form in which the dealers were required to sign was drafted so as to appear innocuous upon its face and to be couched in self-serving language indicating beneficent design upon the part of the organization. The proof gave ground to belief that the combination and conspiracy had a broader purpose of domination in the territorial area and at the fishing ports and the fixing of arbitrary prices and the exclusion of non-cooperative dealers and independent fishermen. The evidence supported every charging phrase of the indictment. There was no other objection to this evidence now relied upon, save one. The Court permitted introduction of summaries of the contents of books of account concerning volume of fish handled by dealers. In view of the situation that the dealers were engaged in a difficult economic situation and that unfriendly relations were shown, there was no obligation on the Trial Judge to permit examination at large of the records by hostile appellants without supervision. In some cases, the witness testified from memory, and the Court refused to allow examination as to books or their contents. All this was proper in the discretion of the Trial Judge. In neither instance do appellants show that there was any prejudice. The Trial Judge was not bound to assume the demand for complete examination of the books of dealers in a highly explosive situation was without ulterior motive. Cross-examination was not otherwise limited.

The defenses are the same matters which were urged as defects in the indictment. Appellants claim they were entitled to the protection of the Clayton Act and the Fishermen's Marketing Act. The argument upon this question is highly theoretical and is made with entire disregard of the state of facts shown in the record, and proceeds upon the assumption that Local 36 is a labor union. But the application of the statutes must be made, not by scholastic reasoning divorced from the record, but from the facts.

[16] Deering's California Code, Ch. 5, Art. 4, § 1064.

A large proportion of the members of the association owned and operated their own boats and gear. Well over half of these members classify themselves as self-employed fishermen. The ownership of boats and gear differentiates the owner from the other fishermen in this respect, that the operation of boat implies repairs, reconditioning and expenses of various types. The payment for this upkeep and profit for the operation of the boat, including amortization of investment, and gear is obtained, where there are more fishermen engaged, by an agreed share of the catch. But there are numbers of these boats which have only the operator and owner himself aboard. In this instance, the work of the owner and the profit and investment are all paid for by the price of the fish. It may be agreed that the owner and operator of a truck garden, who employs no labor and who sells his produce to local markets, is in a much similar situation. There can be no doubt the fisherman and the truck gardener are independent businessmen. The fishermen themselves consider the boat the important factor. The evidence here shows that, when this difficulty was going on, the so-called "strike committee" brought pressure to join in their activities, not on the individual fishermen but upon the "boat." The records refer to thirty-five boats to be contacted, and, if they do not help in the strike, "action is to be taken against them." This unquestionably reflects the actual condition. The evidence indicates that the boatowner or captain ordinarily on this account does the bargaining with the dealer for the sale of the catch. The reason for this is clear. Bargaining must be done by one person. But the evidence shows that the dealer pays the captain or owner, who receives the compensation for the full catch. Although there was a possibility of employment between the captain and the fishermen in the same boat, that was not the attitude of the fishermen themselves. It is noteworthy that, as to the time upon which they embark upon a fishing trip, the locality to which they go, the type of fish which they intend to take depends upon agreement between the individual fishermen in a boat and the captain. Although there is no direct evidence upon the point, it is inferential that the share of the boat and the individual fisherman depends likewise upon such an agreement. Judge McLaughlin, of Hawaii, draws this inference in dealing with a similar situation. He says:

"Defendants argued that since fishermen's—crewmen's—wages are dependent upon the price at which the boatowner sells the catch, the crewmen who share in the proceeds cannot possibly get an increase in wages unless the price of fish is raised, therefore this is a 'labor dispute' relating to fishermen's wages.

"This is nothing but specious reasoning. In the first place the facts do not reveal that the crewmen are negotiating the subject of wages or percentage shares of the proceeds with the boatowners by whom they are employed, and further it just is not so that the only way crewmembers could get increased wages would be to effect an increase in the price of fish. Defendants overlook the position of the boatowner and adjustments and absorptions he might make to increase wages without affecting the price of fish." Hawaiian Tuna Packers, Limited, v. International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (C. I. O.), et al., 72 F. Supp. 562, 566.

The arrangement under the record in this case is a joint adventure of the fishermen, including the owner or captain, the details depending upon mutual consent of all. So much for the internal economy of a "boat."

The fish are sold by the bargaining agent of the boat to the dealer. There is no compulsion. Any one of the dealers may be chosen by the "boat," or the fish may be used or stored in ice. It is true that the boat usually brings the catch to the same dealer. By inference, we may conclude that an order from a distance could be accepted by the "boat" also. In any event, the price is arrived at by open negotiation between the representative of the fishermen of the "boat" and the dealer whom they have selected. This price is paid in cash. The individual fishermen do not receive this price, but it goes to the bargaining agent of the "boat" and is later divided according to the agreed scheme. The transcript shows such transactions are referred to universally as "purchases" and "sales." The dealers are called "buyers" and the fishermen "sellers." The results of such sales are called the "price." The price for the catch depends upon skill in bargaining and the available supply and also the orders which the particular dealer has on hand. The fishermen, whether boatowners or not, are independent of any dealer. No fisherman regards himself as under orders, directions or controls of any dealer. On the other hand, he regards himself as only bound to agree with the other persons in his boat as to operations.

There is no evidence of any negotiations for sale of fish or receipt of price by Local 36 on behalf of any boat or any fishermen, whether members or not. If one were disposed to rationalize, it might be conceived that members of a particular boat could choose a different "employer" each time they brought in a different catch. Some household employees do day work in this fashion, selecting a different employer day by day. But it is difficult to discover any evidence of relation and employment to be submitted to a jury here where sale and purchase of a commodity were involved and the price was the measure of value thereof. To translate this into "wages" requires a complicated computation. The result of this resume of the evidence is that no inference that Local 36 is a labor union could be drawn. The facts are not compatible with the proposition that the fishermen who own and operate their own boats are employees of anyone. It might be contended that a fisherman who works in a boat of which he is not the owner is an employee of the boatowner. It is only by distortion of the evidence of the record here that this induction could be drawn.

A finding of fact to the effect that the boatowners or the affiliated fishermen were employees of one or more dealers would be a diametric contradiction of all evidence on the subject. In accordance with the charge of the indictment, it might properly have been found that there was no relation of employer and employee between dealer and fisherman, and that appellants were independent businessmen dealing in fish for their own profits.

[Price-Fixing Combination]

On the evidence, however, a finding that the fishermen members of the association were "independent businessmen engaged in business on their own account and who operate fishing boats for their own account and profit" was justified. It might also have been possible to find that Local 36 was an association under the Fishermen's Marketing Act and that the members were joined together for the collective purpose of carrying on legitimate objectives of "catching, producing, preparing for market, processing, handling and marketing fish caught by their members." Although it was not possible to find from a review of the record that in this instance the association was acting as the marketing agent for the members, still the evidence does not show that so long as the efforts of the members and the Local were confined to an agreement among themselves and the dealers, arrived at by negotiation and setting of certain price levels for fish to be caught, but having no coercive force behind it, no action was taken by the Government. This is also the explanation of the dismissal of the prosecution in a case based upon that feature alone.[16a] This position may be subject to question, but at least it does not affect the problem here. However, the record shows that the fishermen here viewed as members of a cooperative had much broader purposes underlying the concert of action above outlined.

In United States v. Steel Co., 334 U. S. 495, 522, it is said:

> "A restraint may be unreasonable either because a restraint otherwise reasonable is accompanied with a specific intent to accomplish a forbidden restraint or because it falls within the class of restraints that are illegal per se. For example, where a complaint charges that defendants have engaged in price fixing or have concertedly refused to deal with nonmembers of an association or have licensed a patented device on condition that unpatented materials be employed in conjunction with the patented device, then the amount of commerce involved is immaterial because such restraints are illegal per se."

The price fixing combination was here directed toward a complete destruction of competition in prices in this area. Unless specifically authorized by legislation, a conspiracy to fix prices is in and of itself a violation of the first section of the Act.[17] No inquiry as to substantiality, directness, effectiveness or reasonableness of restraint

[16a] United States v. Columbia River Fishermen's Protective Assn., No. C-16087, D. C., District of Oregon (unreported).

[17] In United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., Inc., 310 U. S. 150, Note 59, it is said: "In view of these considerations, a conspiracy to fix prices violates § 1 of the act though no overt act is shown, though it is not established that the conspirators had the means available for accomplishment of their objective, and though the conspiracy embraced but a part of the interstate or foreign commerce in the commodity." This opinion distinguishes the case of Appalachian Coals, Inc. v. United States, 288 U. S. 344, which is the main reliance of appellants. In the latter case, the Court said, at page 373: "The plan cannot be said either to contemplate or to involve the fixing of market prices," and at page 367: "No attempt was made to limit production."

is permitted. The section is violated by the agreement to fix prices standing alone under such conditions. But the price fixing phase of the concert did not stand alone. As often happens, it was intermeshed with a purpose to exclude certain producers from the market and to prevent certain dealers from obtaining any supplies of fish. Judge Learned Hand has crystallized the law on this point in Fashion Originators Guild v. Federal Trade Commission, 114 F. 2d 80, 85:

> "Price fixing is not, however, the only means unlawful per se; the interest of the consumer is not all that determines the 'reasonableness' of a contract 'in restraint of trade.' It is also unlawful to exclude from the market any of those who supply it—assuming that there is no independent reason by virtue of their conduct to justify their exclusion—and it is no excuse for doing so that their exclusion will result in benefits to consumers or to the producers who remain. (Citing cases.) A successful combination among a part of the producers to exclude others, even when not accompanied by an agreement fixing prices puts into their hands collectively the power to control the supply and with it the price."

Again, exclusion of producers and dealers from the market according to prearranged plan is a violation of the statute, in and of itself.

There is, it is true, a dictum of the Supreme Court which may give color of legality even to such acts when done by a labor union or its members in pursuit of legitimate objectives, because of the synthetic effect of the Norris-LaGuardia Act. Allen Bradley Co. v. Local Union No. 3, 325 U. S. 797. But in that opinion there is definitive exclusion of this type of organization from the immunization of unions for such acts by pointed reference to Columbia River Packers Assn. v. Hinton, 315 U. S. 143.[18]

If then the boatowners were acting in voluntary conjunction with the fishermen employees of their boats in such a combination, their activities would certainly be illegal. United States v. Women's Sportswear Manufacturers' Association, 336 U. S. 460. If, on the other hand, the boatowners and other fishermen, as independent businessmen, were acting in voluntary combination with certain dealers, the concert would be in violation of law. Brotherhood of Carpenters v. United States, 330 U. S. 395. If, in fact, in all they did, as the evidence shows, they were acting as members[19] of a marketing cooperative, it would afford them no sanctuary for collaboration with others outside the association. United States v. Borden Farms, 308 U. S. 188.

As pointed out above, if the dealers did not voluntarily cooperate with the fishermen as members of a marketing cooperative and the restraint of trade was applied only by organized compulsion of picketing and boycotting by the members of the association, the excuse which might have availed union members because of the Norris-LaGuardia Act would not have availed the confederates of Local 36.[20]

[Type of Evidence Rejected at Trial]

The next question is whether the picture would have been changed if the Court had not excluded certain proffered evidence claimed to show that the fishermen in 1942 had accepted lower prices than otherwise would have been obtained in order to conduct experiments in canning of barracuda. This was a self-serving venture. But even if the appellants had entered into a cooperative venture in 1942, they had no license to violate the law in 1946. The appellants also offered to prove by expert testimony that the fisherman and farmer are in parallel economic situations and that a large number of farmer associations do carry on collective bargaining without evil resulting. These offers were not relevant, since the Court was concerned with acts of the appellants in restraint of trade. If the acts of the farmers were lawful, it did not tend to prove the acts of appellants were lawful. If unlawful, the fact that another had violated the law would not excuse appellants. In any event, it would require the Court to try an entirely separate case. The Court was not bound to do this. On the other hand, no evidence was offered to the effect that farmers had ever entered an association of the structure of Local 36, or that, using such association as a shield, farmers had ever restrained interstate com-

[19] The "membership device" will not protect them. Associated Press v. United States, 326 U. S. 1, 19.

[20] "A restraint of interstate commerce cannot be justified by the fact that the object of the participant in the combination was to benefit themselves in a way which might have been unobjectionable in the absence of such restraint." *Anderson v. merce in grain by any similar agreement and combination such as the evidence shows here.

Appellants complain of the rejection of a letter from Local 36 to all Southern California fish dealers, purporting to outline the purpose and intent of the union and inviting the dealers to a meeting where it was proposed to discuss stabilization of the industry about June 5, 1944, two years before the combination charged by the indictment as of May 1, 1946. Another exhibit rejected was a similar letter circulated a bit later (July 10, 1944), asking the dealers to enter into negotiations for an agreement relative to price and conditions of delivery of fresh fish. The Court also rejected the National War Labor Board award of February 19, 1945, and also another of the War Stabilization Board. The measures necessary for war do not excuse a violation of the law now. Furthermore, appellants offered to prove the history of unionization and strikes and agreements relating to price agreements between fishermen and dealers from 1886 to the present time, together with recognition of the contentions by many national administrative boards. These matters were all remote in time and irrelevant to the charges in the indictment. None of this historical matter was of any value in determining whether appellants were guilty or not guilty of the crime charged in the indictment. All was properly rejected since it would only have tended to confuse the jury.

Expert testimony that a fisherman is a laboring producer was offered. This offer spotlights the fundamental error of counsel for appellants. This was a question of fact, not a matter of opinion. As such question of fact, it was submitted to the jury who found against appellants. It would, of course, have been improper to allow an expert to advise the jury on a matter not subject of opinion testimony.[21]

A question is raised by the offer of the document of June 12, 1946, in the midst of the restraint of trade by Local 36, called "A Message to All Market Fishermen," purporting to show the character and aims of the association. This manifesto was rejected as self-serving, and properly so.

There was another series of offers of proof in great detail. These related to the economic condition of the fishermen, their failure to get advance orders for fish, when the state law requiring them to have a secured market before fishing, that collective bargaining increases the harvest of fish, that by collective bargaining the price for fishermen had been raised on occasion and lowered to the consumer, that a large value of fish comes in from areas outside of Southern California than is caught in that area, that the dealers there pay the same price to fishermen, that there are tremendous drops in price in a single day, that the price paid to fishermen bears no relation to the amount charged by the fish dealers to consumers, that the fisherman is in the same economic position as the farmer, who gets Governmnet help while the fisherman gets none, and as distinguished from the dealer. Market fish competes with other proteins. The fresh fishermen get but little money from their catch annually, and the boatowners not enough to maintain and repair boats. The theory of the offered proof was that the "rule of reason" controlled and to the proposition that original working producers are not prohibited by the Anti-Trust laws from combining originally for the purpose of fixing prices, and that all factors must be considered by the jury. A great deal of evidence was received which was offered by appellants as to the supply of fresh fish in the markets of Southern California, which, in general, indicated that the greater part of the supply comes from Northern California, Mexico, Oregon, Washington and other places in interstate commerce. The general conditions as to supply, methods of bargaining, sale and distribution were all presented. Such evidence bore directly upon the proposition as to the relationship of the fishermen among themselves and with the dealer and the nature of the operation whereby fish were transferred to dealers from the fishermen. The tendered evidence was not relevant for the puropse of showing whether the relationship of the fishermen were workers, producers or independent businessmen or employees of the dealers.

There is complaint made of the action of the Court in quashing a subpoena duces tecum to require the record of dealers to be produced but this has already been dealt with under rejected evidence. The appellants urge that the finding of guilt was contrary to law and to the evidence which is insufficient to support the verdict that the Court should have directed a verdict or stricken out all exhibits and testimony. Error is also alleged in denying a motion in arrest of judgment and for a new trial. All these have been considered and the subject matter reviewed. The Trial Court was not in error, as the previous discussion shows.

[Exceptions to Instructions to the Jury]

Appellants first excepted to the instruction to the effect that, if the Government proved beyond a reasonable doubt that appellants, or any two or more of them, had combined and conspired for the purposes and in the manner charged in the indictment, they might be found guilty. Such an instruction is, of course, one which must be given in every criminal case. The proof must support the allegations of the indictment. The Court had defined reasonable doubt. If either of these instructions had been omitted, unquestionably there would have been reversible error. However, this exception is the gist of all claims of error. It is an extension of the original position that the indictment does not state a cause of action because appellants were operating under the Fishermen's Marketing Act and were exempt under the Clayton Act, and that, even if the government prove the facts set forth in the indictment, still, as a matter of law, appellants were immune. All exceptions to instructions given and requests refused are based on this theory, which only indicates the confusion of mind of counsel for appellants.

One point made was that the Court failed to instruct properly regarding the Fishermen's Marketing Act. Of course, the Court was bound to present the theories of defense in that respect. The Court charged the jury the finding that appellants were "independent businessmen who are engaged in the business" of catching and selling fish to dealers on their own account was a prerequisite to conviction. In that connection, the Court then read portions of the Fishermen's Marketing Act and told the jury that the law permitted such an association and collective organization and bargaining therein, and permitted the collective fixing of prices thereby on behalf of itself or as sales agent for its members. But the Court did instruct the jury that neither such an association nor its members could legally force [22] any buyer of fish to enter into such a price fixing contract "by practices and tactics which are not free and voluntary." And the Court charged that, even if they were acting as independent businessmen under that statute and entered a combination to fix the price of fish and to prevent dealers who refused to pay such prices from obtaining fresh fish from them or from other sources, the scheme would be illegal. The Court left the question to the jury as to whether Local 36 was such an association and whether appellants were acting under the terms of the statute in question. In United States v. Universal Milk Bottle Service, Inc., 18 L. W. 2033, it was held, in referring to a conspiracy to fix prices on milk in a local area, the agreement was not immunized by the Agricultural Marketing Act of 1937 or orders of an executive department thereunder. The decisions show that farmers cannot fix prices in the manner which was attempted here [23] according to the jury verdict.

In connection with the instructions as to the Fishermen's Marketing Act, the Court instructed the jury that picketing and boycotting "in and of themselves are not contrary to or in violation of any law," but, if such acts were found to have occurred, these could be considered in determining whether the denfendants "did or did not conspire as alleged in the indictment. If you find defendants did not so combine or conspire, then you should acquit the defendants." This instruction is a complete answer to the contention of appellants. The use of picketing and boycotting did not give sanctuary to appellants for an illegal conspiracy,[24] as counsel for appellants seem to [22] In Eastern States Retail Lumber Dealers Association v. United States, 234 U. S. 600, 611, it is said: " 'Section 1 of the act, * * * is not confined to voluntary restraint, as where persons engaged in interstate trade or commerce agree to suppress competition among themselves, but includes as well involuntary restraints, as where persons not so engaged conspire to compel action by others, or to create artificial conditions, which necessarily impede or burden the due course of such trade or commerce or restrict the common liberty—to engage therein.' *United States v. think. It is only that, in pursuit of a legitimate object of a laboring union, picketing and boycotting are not illegal.

Further, it was said that all evidence as to strikes, boycotts and picketing were to be disregarded, as "The law is not concerned with any means used by the defendants but is only concerned with whether the agreement itself is in unreasonable restraint of trade." Again, the jury was told that, if the operations of the appellants came within the terms and protection of the Fishermen's Marketing Act, they must find the defendants not guilty, and "if it is reasonably possible for you to conclude that the acts of the defendants have the protection of such Act, it is your duty to so find and acquit the defendants," and, in considering the question, "You should ignore the evidence relating to picketing, boycotting, interstate commerce and strikes." The Court also said, "Such evidence was only admitted for the limited purpose of showing the participation of the various individual defendants in seeking to obtain a price fixing contract, and this contract alone determines legality or illegality of the acts of appellants," and, if it were one which they were legally permitted to enter into, "then you must disregard the evidence of boycotting and picketing for any purpose and find the defendants not guilty." It is obvious enough that, with cautions of this type, the evidence as to picketing and boycotting was a part of surrounding circumstances without which a complete picture could not have been shown. The effect was carefully limited by the Court. The instruction was much too favorable to appellants unless the jury had found they were members of a labor union pursuing legitimate objectives of labor. Certain refused requests on this point carried the "worker-producer" theory to the extreme and would have required the jury to find all the acts done by the appellants as shown by the evidence to be legal if, as members of an association although not "a cooperative, as that term is understood," was "a bargaining agent or sales representative for the fishermen, and the members therein were acting together "for the purpose of catching fish" and "of securing markets and market prices." These requests do not give any play to the illegality of combinations for the purpose of fixing prices or exclusion of producers and prospective purchasers of fish from the market. The Court properly instructed the jury that an organization formed under the act might enter into a contract with a buyer of fish, which fixes the price "at which the association itself or as sales agent for its members sells on behalf of its members the fish caught or to be caught by the members of the association to a buyer." This charge fairly set out what the appellants could ask lawfully.

[Analogy Between Fishermen and Agriculturists Fails]

The next request refused is to the effect that appellants are "in the same category as agriculturists and horticulturists." Even if they were, that would be no defense. It was not the intention of Congress that the agricultural laborers paid by a share of the crop produced on his land could combine with the farmer to force the wheat dealer to pay a price fixed by such combination. There is a similar defect in the next request, which indicates that a "working producer," who joins solely with other similar "working producers to fixe the price of articles produced by them," is immune. Again, there is no law which permits the farmer who does his own work on his own farm to combine with other farmers similarly situated to raise the price of grain by picketing all grain dealers or the dealer of their choice at the time.

The Court also read the Clayton Act to the jury, and instructed concerning the rights of labor under this statute and the Norris-LaGuardia Act. In this connection, the Court said it was not important whether one of the appellants owned his boat or fished for a lay, but that the application of the act was to be determined by the relationship of the association fishermen "to the fish dealers and not to one another or to any other person." Under the charge, the jury was required to find for conviction that appellants are "independent businessmen" catching and selling fish "for their own account and profit" and not employees of the dealers. The Court expressly said:

> "An association of independent producers or of persons who are self employed and who are engaged in business on and for their own account and profit, free from such controls as an employer ordinarily exercise over a person who is an employee, would not be a labor union."

It was expressly emphasized that it made no difference that Local 36 called itself a labor union,[25] since the facts as to the charged conspiracy must control, but, if the membership of the association consisted of persons who stood in the relationship of employees to the fish dealers, they might legally combine together and legally carry on acts to effect changes in the terms and conditions of their employment, even though such acts affected or obstructed interstate commerce. The Trial Court also very carefully gave to the jury an instruction based upon the suggestions contained in United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America v. United States, 330 U. S. 395. This was a commendable precaution which showed that the Court was attempting to protect all legitimate rights of defendant because, if the jury found defendants were independent businessmen and Local 36 was an association thereof, the instruction was not applicable.

The Court went on to say that, if the membership of the association, Local 36 IFAWA, consisted of persons who stood in the relationship of employees to the fish dealers, "the members of said association may join together and carry on acts to effect changes in the terms and conditions of their employment, even though their acts may affect or obstruct interstate or foreign commerce and that in doing so they would be pursuing a legitimate objective," but that such obstructive acts could only be performed if first there were a labor dispute between the members and the fish dealers. If "the controversy is solely one over the price at which the members of Local 36 shall sell their fish," and the employer-employee relationship were not the matrix of the controversy, then the rules relating to a labor dispute would not immunize acts which were otherwise illegal.[26] It is clear this was a sufficient explanation. As we have already seen, there was substantial evidence from which it might have been found as a question of fact that there was not an employer-employee relationship. Under this instruction, the jury has found this proposition as a fact. But the Court by these instructions gave the jury free choice. It should not disparage the verdict that the jury took a common-sense view of the evidence without theoretical refinement.

The request to the Court to instruct that, if Local 36 were a labor union, acting solely in self interest and not in collusion with other economic groups, the action of appellants would be legal is, of course, fully covered by the instructions. The evidence gave firm ground for the finding that it was not an employer-employee relationship and that the fishermen were either in collusion and concert with their employers, the boatowners, or that all the members of the association, as independent businessmen, were compelling independent dealers in fish to pay prices arbitrarily fixed.

In this field, instructions were proposed to the effect that the fishermen acquire no title to the fish but only the right to use or sell them. The implication is that, since there is no ownership, the fisherman has only his labor in the fish. This vein runs through several other requests. The propositions are advanced that the "worker-producer" is selling his services at wages to be determined by the price of fish delivered and that the employer-employee relationship does not depend upon the existence of a payroll providing for pay at stated intervals. There is interwoven into another request the idea that, if appellants acted as members of an organization in which labor was the basis or one of the chief factors, "they did not act in restraint of trade." These ideas were generally embodied in theoretical homilies worthy of medieval scholasticism. The Court was therefore bound to submit none of them. As has been noted, all the relevant situations as to employment were carefully covered. As to the product price being set for a standard of wages, the same argument would apply to practically all products—certainly, to pears and apples, objects made by hand and, without much deviation, to sales of cattle.

[25] Each court which has dealt with these various associations of fishermen and boatowners on the Pacific Coast has noted peculiar characteristics of the particular organization. Columbia River Packers Association, Inc. v. Hinton, 315 U. S. 143; Columbia River Packers Association, Inc. v. Hinton, 34 F. Supp. 970; Hawaiian Tuna Packers, Limited, v. International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (C.I.O.), 72 F. Supp. 562; Manaka v. Monterey Sardine Industries, 41 F. Supp. 531; United States v. Columbia River Fishermen's Protective Assn., No. C16087, D. C., District of Oregon (unreported). Each calls attention to the necessity of basing conclusions in regard to such organizations on facts found and not on occult theory.

[26] The labor union is not given indulgence by the statute if it is the intent and effect to establish any form of market control of a commodity and to "monopolize the supply, control its price or discriminate between its would be purchasers." Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U. S. 469, 512.

The "rule of reason" was the basis of many requests. On this score, another request was that, if the agreement was one which reasonably might be "considered as a normal or usual agreement for the marketing of their products," then appellants could not be found guilty. In considering whether the restraint was reasonable, appellants also requested the jury be instructed to weigh the state laws preventing waste of fish, the apparent necessity of having a price for a catch set in advance, whether the intention of the fishermen in what they did was to limit the production and sale of fish or to increase production and procure greater markets and whether they were attempting to set the resale or consumer price of fish or trying to stabilize the industry. There was also an attempt to have the charge state that the jury was to consider the history, the difficulties and the intention of appellants in the restraint of fish marketing in the light of the public interest, and that there was no effect on consumer prices.

The Court did instruct that, if the appellants were in fact businessmen who conspired to fix the price, then it was immaterial "whether the price so fixed by agreement among the defendants was reasonable or unreasonable." [27] It was also said the price fixing includes more than the establishment of uniform prices and is proved, if set at a certain level or on ascending or descending scales or if they are to be uniform or stabilized by various formulae, by placing a floor to increase stability and firmness of market prices and which may prevent the determination of those prices by free competition alone. The Court then said that elimination of competitive evils in an industry is not a legal justification for price fixing contracts otherwise illegal.

The appellants contend and except to the instructions given by the Court on the ground that the restraint imposed by such a conspiracy must have been direct, and that the Government "must prove that the alleged conspiracy would have had a direct effect upon interstate commerce in fresh fish." The fixing of prices always has a direct effect upon commerce in the article.[28] Here the intent charged was not only to fix prices but also to prevent independent fishermen from fishing on the high seas and in foreign waters and from selling the catch so obtained to non-cooperative dealers in the territorial area. Besides preventing shipments from other states to such dealers, any instruction as to reasonableness or substantial or direct interference with trade and commerce under these circumstances shown by the evidence and charged in the indictment would not have stated the law and would have amounted to a direction to pardon the appellants. It is true likewise that the public interest is involved in such a case and the ultimate aim is to protect the purchasers and users of the product. The jury here necessarily found under the instructions that the intent and necessary effect of the conspiracy was to enable the appellants to restrain or control the supply and the price of the commodities sold or moving in interstate commerce and to discriminate between those attempting to purchase the product.

The Court covered fully all legitimate features contained in requests of appellants. The theories of the defense were set forth in detail and on occasion in much too favorable a light as questions of fact. The proposition that the actual activities and conduct of appellants were within the legal objectives of a fishermen's marketing association or a labor union was left to the jury as a question of fact. There was no error. The only criticism of appellants is based upon an assumption that Local 36 is a labor union and a marketing association entitled to the farflung privileges of both.

Since these factors were all correct, we affirm the action of the Court in denying a motion in arrest of judgment. The assignment as to new trial is, of course, not well taken.

So far as the indictment, the admission and exclusion of evidence and the instructions of Judges, the trial was fair and impartial. But appellants attack the method by which the juries, grand and petit, were drawn. It is said no criticism is directed at the juries who indicted and tried appellants, either as to composition or attitude. This leaves a choice between black and white. If the particular juries, grand and petit, who considered the charges against appellants were in fact fair and impartial, then the only available ground for attack is that the Court lacked jurisdiction because of the use of any jury drawn by the system in use.

The contention then is made that the jury panel of the Southern District of California, Central Division, was drawn in a manner so inherently defective and unfair that, even if a fair and impartial jury was obtained for this particular trial, still the cause must be reversed. This, upon analysis, seems to be a claim of no jurisdiction in the Court. Juries drawn from the same sources have been serving over a period of years in this District. If the position is correct, the Court had no jurisdiction in any case, civil or criminal, tried by jury because the existence of an unfair system of jury selection injures these defendants as appellants say in their briefs. Refutation is contained in the statement of the claim.

There was no complaint made of the character of the jury which tried the case. In fact, the record of the examination of the panel upon voir dire was not brought up on the appeal. We have means of knowing neither who the jurors were nor how they earned a living nor whether each was of "fair character and proved integrity and sound judgment," as required by the California Code of Civil Procedure, § 205.

The institution of the jury was anciently and through a course of evolutionary development has remained palladium of the liberties and rights of individuals in criminal cases. It has deservedly attained the high encomiums of the legal writers and theorists during the course of centuries. But it is not upon these that its value to a modern world is based. The tremendous vitality of the institution through the centuries and its adaptability to meet treacherously shifting conditions has enabled it to survive like the Sequoia in a world geologically metamorphized. From a group of the "upper class" men in barbaric societies, convened to protect legal rights and prerogatives of the ruler, it became a group of persons who could say the truth of their own knowledge regarding the possession of land. By subtle blending, it came to take the character, so far as the common man was concerned, of those peers whom the barons of the Magna Charta insisted should pass judgment upon them and their rights as against the crown.

For centuries the jury was subject to intimidation by judges and by the crown and in later times by popular violence. But after the revolution of 1649 and 1688, in the form in which we have received it in America, it has become a bulwark against encroachments by the government and a protection of the rights of individual citizens. In certain instances, the appellate courts have shown a notable distrust of the jury system in criminal cases in recent years. In one, Jehovah's Witnesses were prevented from placing before the jury a valid defense of arbitrariness and prejudice of the local draft boards.[29] In another, the citizen in business was prevented from placing before the jury of the vicinage the defense of arbitrariness and factual invalidity of regulations, which instead was tried in the Emergency Court of Appeals.[30]

However, in flagrant instances, the jury has always exercised the pardoning power, notwithstanding the law, which is their actual prerogative. This feature is of more importance here, since the jury, notwithstanding the arguments regarding economic oppression, did not see fit to acquit appellants. We have not yet arrived at the point where the doctrine of Theodore Roosevelt, that a single district judge cannot construe an indictment against the Government, has been applied to the verdict of a jury. In its modern form, therefore, the juries which reflect common sense and the sentiment of local communities do, in fact, modify the doctrine of law. Such a process is still going on.

The jury system has constantly changed in order to meet the needs of the society in which it has flourished. It is now subject to another challenge. We agree with appellants that, if there is a fundamental defect in the system of selection of the jury panel in a particular district, that in and of itself should be sufficient to vitiate all verdicts returned by a panel so drawn. This is not out of feeling for guilty defendants, but is based on one of the fundamental foundations of the system. One of the imponderables which has contributed to the survival of the institution of jury trials in criminal cases is that it lets each individual who has a chance to be drawn feel that he has a share in the Government, and brings home to each that there are duties as well as rights connected with citizenship. One of the pertinent criticisms here then is the fact that for this jury panel no one is drawn who does not return his questionnaire. A still more subtle form of such denial of a share in the Government and a share in responsibility is the excuse of the tired business executive who desires to go to Hawaii or Bermuda, the topnotch mechanic who is making ten times as much as the jury fee for attendance, and of day laborers. However, these defects should not overthrow the panel and vitiate all verdicts unless at least there be a clear and present danger that the right of the individual to participate in the burden and the benefit shall be systematically denied. This is not shown in the present case.

[29] Falbo v. United States, 320 U. S. 549.
[30] Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S. 414.

Even in the time of Bracton,[31] jurors were to be free and impartial and neither too friendly to either of the parties nor drawn from the enemies of either. It is strange to find that the extremes produce the same tendencies. Jury duty was regarded as oppressive. As today, the rich and powerful received exemptions from service,[31a] and the very poor were often let off because of their situation.[31b] The conscience of democracy and the greater education of the members of the body politic in the necessities of government has neither been sufficient to overcome the feeling nor to prevent the results. The banker who wishes to go to Jamaica or Hawaii and the day laborer are still problems. But the only method of curing such tendencies lies with the trial judges.

The jury of criminal cases is the epitome of democracy in our modern state. The attack in this instance on the jury system is an attack on democracy itself. Here, with great elan, by sharp onset it is attempted to overthrow the jury system by the injection of the concepts of class conflict. Our democracy is founded upon the proposition of equality of each citizen to each other as far as political rights are concerned. This ideal has never been realized, but we assume that the great bulk of the people are devoted to its realization. It has been said that the juries could be drawn from the habitues of the park benches. Firmly, we believe that the jury so drawn under the direction of a competent trial judge, administering justice under the law, controlling the court and by his very presence impressing the jury with the equality of everyone before the law, can administer justice. A jury likewise of socialites and blue-stockings can be trusted to render justice to those downtrodden by either political or economic forces. Our experience in democracy has shown that the presence of the name of an official in the social register has not prevented overwhelming masses from voting for him, nor has it prevented him from being a leader in humanitarian movements. The social register has upon its pages the names of highminded idealists devoted to the causes of humanity, the maudlin sentimentalists as to crime and poverty, as well as the birth-proud irreconcilable. All trial judges know there is no economic cleavage in jury systems. If in a sporadic instance it did happen to be so, still the trial judge, who is on the ground, has control of the verdict.

Class war has no place in America. The very contention itself contains a paradox. Yet here it was urged with tremendous force upon the Trial Judge and with earnestness and circumstantially. The result was a travesty proving the possibility of abuse of the freedom accorded by democratic institutions. The Trial Judge, in order to preserve fairness of demeanor, spent days in investigating the basis of this contention and wrote a long opinion showing its absurdity. Urged as it was, the result was an impertinent obstruction of justice and the progress of the trial. We believe, if it had not been for the conscientiousness of the Trial Judge, faced with certain appellate expressions, the matter could have been disposed of almost summarily.

The attempt, we believe, was to bring the administration of the law into disrepute. The preposterous and outlandish tactics of the defense amounted to an obstruction of justice in and of itself. Such tactics upon the part of defense attorneys, in our opinion, deserve censure. We now pass it. If any shade of prejudice came upon this jury, it was, in our opinion, due to these stage effects of counsel. But, as we have seen, the evidence fully warranted conviction. The conduct of the Trial Judge, although over-conscientious, was impeccable. It is true that the jury commissioner should be careful to follow the principles laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States with regard to jury selection. And it is surprising, after the years which have elapsed since some of these criticisms were announced,[32] that we find them at least in the letter violated. We find the commissioner here accepting a list of names furnished by a woman's social organization at his request. Apparently, use was made of some names of persons obtained from the Labor Temple, also lists supplied by some Railroad Brotherhoods, the Social Registers and membership rosters of country and social clubs.[33] The excuse that he was not paid enough is more startling. Insufficient compensation is no excuse in any public official for failure to perform his full duty. Jurors serve at slight compensation and often at great sacrifice. But the deviations here were comparatively minor and laid no field for the attack which has been made. If the voting lists are used, it must be noted our system permits socialites and communists to vote for President.

Relief for the former was provided by setting up a property qualification. See also Statute of Westminster Second, 13 Edward I, c. 38, Ibid., V. 1, p. 103.

The names which were drawn from such sources were an extremely small portion of his list, which was largely selected from the telephone book. Each name on the commissioner's list was balanced by a name drawn by the Clerk from a list of approximately thirty thousand former jurors. This method of getting Federal jurors from lists of former jurors of State and Federal courts has often been used in the past. It is generally satisfactory unless there are peculiar local conditions where policies of exclusion have been followed.

The record here does not show any lack of due process since there was no systematic or arbitrary exclusion or discrimination of any persons or class of persons such as the Supreme Court found in Theil v. Southern Pacific, 328 U. S. 217, and Ballard v. United States, 329 U. S. 187.

It is assumed that, if the appellants attain their objective, each citizen would have to be tried by members of his own particular segment of the population, selected according to his dictates. Catholics would have to be tried by Catholics, Masons by Masons, Jews by Jews, bankers by bankers and bricklayers by bricklayers. But it must be remembered that this will not always be satisfactory to a defendant. In former days, a bootlegger would much rather trust his fate to a straightlaced prohibitionist minister than to a former saloonkeeper. Indeed, the defendants, at the time of trial in the instant case, asked for instruction that there was to be no consideration given by the jury to any conflict which might have been shown between the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organization. This instruction was properly refused, as it was not pertinent. It highlights the fact that, to the appellants even, there was much more chance for prejudice against them among the members of their own "class" than there was from the general panel which was drawn. If the judges or officials of the Court had shown discrimination against members of the Congress of Industrial Organizations or a packing of the panel with members of the American Federation of Labor, there might have been a real point.

The appellants did not prove that they could suffer any prejudice. Nor did they prove that any one of them belonged to a class against which there was any discrimination. In fact, the appellants do not complain of the jury which tried them. They have not brought before us any list of the members with their economic classification, nor have they even brought to this Court the examination on voir dire.

As a capable Trial Judge says of the jury system in the Federal Courts:

> "Those who are critical of the historic make-up of the jury panel say it must be made more 'representative' and more of a 'cross-section' of the Community.
> "This would seem to be not objectionable provided that it is not the be-all and end-all of jury selection. A bricklayer should not go into the jury panel because he is a bricklayer; nor should a bank officer because he is a bank officer. Both are eligible if they have integrity and intelligence enough to listen, retain in their memories the evidence presented, weigh it and honestly decide the cause submitted. We do not need more bricklayers or less bank officers to administer justice.

"I see no objection to seeking out Federal jurors in all groups, provided there is no tampering with the traditional requirement of integrity and intelligence. For a jury panel to be successfully challenged only because it consists of too many of one communal group or too few of another would inevitably completely abort justice. 'The right to challenge is the right to reject, not to select a juror.' Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 68 at page 71, 7 S. Ct. 350 at page 352, 30 L. Ed. 578.

"Mr. Justice Brewer said in Brown v. New Jersey, 175 U. S. 172, at page 175, 20 S. Ct. 77 at page 78, 44 L. Ed. 119: '* * * the purpose of criminal procedure is not to enable the defendant to select jurors, but to secure an impartial jury.'"—Judge Goodman, "Federal Jury Selection," 6 F. R. D. 253, 254.

The Trial Judge, in the exercise of sound discretion, extended to appellants, under the Criminal Rules, ten peremptory challenges in place of the three to which they were entitled. It is true, appellants exhausted all ten of these challenges in order to be in the proper technical position to challenge the array. It is true, as a gesture, appellants asked for more challenges, which were refused. All trial judges know that the key point in selection of an impartial jury is the power of exclusion. In this case, the Trial Judge, in our opinion, went too far, but it was error of which the appellants have no right to complain. The jury which tried the appellants was apparently fair, even on their own standards, and any slight variations from the proper methods of drawing a panel are not deleterious as far as they are concerned. Therefore, the objections and motions against the panel were properly overruled.

The judgment is affirmed.

In the United States District Court, Western District of New York. Civil Action No. 3058. September 26, 1949.

Action to recover triple damages and attorneys' fees for alleged violation of Sherman and Clayton Acts. Judgment for defendants.

Sherman Act, Clayton Act

Film Distributors and Exhibitors—Treble Damage Suit Dismissed—Discrimination and Conspiracy Not Established.—An independent theatre operator failed to substantiate its allegations that distributors and exhibitors unlawfully conspired to monopolize the first- and second-run films and practiced certain discriminations, thereby causing it to suffer financial losses in regard to the operation of two of its theatres. It was alleged that the monopoly was accomplished when distributors and exhibitors contracted so as to grant special privileges to the latter not available to the plaintiff; that by these contracts the plaintiff was deprived of the first-run and second-run features; that unreasonable terms of run and clearance were imposed on this theatre operator and that the revenue producing possibilities of pictures were greatly reduced since a moveover run had been granted to certain favored exhibitors. The action for treble damages was dismissed for failure to establish any damages or violation of the Sherman or Clayton Acts. The Court was of the opinion that, when acting separately, distributors had the legal right to select their customers and to deal or not to deal with any customer as they saw fit. No evidence was presented that established that the distributors did not act independently.

Opinion of KNIGHT, Chief District Judge.

Allegations

[Digest] Plaintiff sued 11 defendants, demanding $5,125,472 triple damages plus reasonable attorneys' fees for alleged violations of 15 U. S. C., sections 1-7, and 15 U. S. C., sections 12-17. Plaintiff alleged three causes of action. By order of this court, dated November 1, 1948, they were all dismissed as to defendant Columbia Pictures Corporation and the third cause of action was dismissed as to all defendants.

Of these 10 defendants, three (Buffalo Bison and McFaul) are sued as exhibitors—the remaining seven as distributors.

Plaintiff's first cause of action alleges unlawful discrimination against its Bailey Theatre, located at 2163 Bailey Avenue, Buffalo, N. Y., by defendant exhibitors, who operated it until August 1, 1939; that their lease expired July 31, 1939; that, on April 19, 1939, Dipson-Basil Theatres, Inc., which became Dipson Realty Co., Inc., purchased this theatre subject to the unexpired lease and operated it from August 1 to August 31, 1939, when D. & B. Operating Co., Inc., which by change of name became the plaintiff herein, leased it, began operating it on September 1, 1939, and has continued such operation. Plaintiff demands damages from September 1, 1939, to September 17, 1945, for "actual operating losses, based upon income from admissions * * * $19,115; and losses of net income * * * $126,878, totalling * * * $145,993." (Par. 25.)

Plaintiff's second cause of action concerns the Century Theatre, located at 511 Main Street, Buffalo, N. Y., and the Riviera Theatre, located in Tonawanda, N. Y. It alleges that defendant exhibitors operated the Century for about 10 years prior to August 1, 1939, when their lease expired; that it was then leased for 10 years by Century Theatrical Enterprises, Inc., which took possession August 1, 1939, and operated both it and the Riviera until November 20, 1940, after which plaintiff operated both theatres until June 26, 1941, when lessee was forced by defendants to surrender both leases to the respective lessors. It is alleged that, on or about November 25, 1941, Century Theatrical Enterprises, Inc. assigned to plaintiff all its claims and causes of action against defendants. Plaintiff alleges that, during 23 months (August 1, 1939, to June 26, 1941) it and said Century Theatrical Enterprises, Inc. suffered an operating loss of $58,240.67 (Par. 36) and, "except for the unlawful combination and conspiracy of the defendants," would have earned a net income between September 1, 1939, and August 31, 1949, of $1,423,788 (Par. 36) from the Century, and a net income between June 27, 1941, and July 31, 1949, of $56,570.60 from the Riviera (Par. 38).

Plaintiff alleges that "all of the defendants have combined and conspired to attempt to and to monopolize trade and commerce among the several states by securing to Defendant Exhibitors the sole and exclusive right to first-run and second-run of feature pictures at Buffalo, New York," in violation of sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act; that "the precise date or dates of origin of the said combination and conspiracy * * * are unknown to the plaintiff" but they "were in existence during the months of April through September, inclusive, 1939, having been formed prior to such period, and they have been in existence continuously since such period." (Par. 17.)

Plaintiff further alleges: "Such monopoly and restraint of trade have been accomplished, among other methods, by: contracts between Defendant Distributors and * * * Exhibitors granting special privileges to (latter) not available to the plaintiff nor to other exhibitors; contracts between (them) making available to (Defendant Exhibitors) a supply of feature pictures far in excess of their reasonable needs, thus depriving the plaintiff and other exhibitors of the first-run and second-run of such features; contracts imposing unreasonable terms of run and clearance on plaintiff and other exhibitors for the benefit of Defendant Exhibitors; refusing to contract with plaintiff and other exhibitors for the purpose of preserving a monopoly to Defendant Exhibitors; permitting (latter) to move a picture from one theatre when its run has been completed, to another theatre operated by them, for a so-called "moveover" run, thus postponing all subsequent runs by plaintiff and other exhibitors, and reducing the revenue-producing possibilities of the picture at subsequent runs; threatening, and otherwise interfering and attempting to prevent the sale or lease to plaintiff or other exhibitors of theatres qualified to exhibit at first and second run in Buffalo; discriminating in film rentals by granting lower rentals to Defendant Exhibitors; contracts fixing minimum admission prices at subsequent run theatres for the purpose of preventing competition with Defendant Exhibitors." (Par. 17.)

It is alleged that "Defendant Exhibitors have attained a buying power which they exert to continue their monopoly and to restrain competition." (Par. 18.) There are many other allegations which will be cited in the body of this opinion.

Circumstantial Evidence, Only

Plaintiff admits in its brief: "There is no direct proof in the record of the existence of a conspiracy or an attempt to monopolize." Relying wholly on circumstantial evidence, it cites Interstate Circuit v. U. S., 306 U. S. 208, and William Goldman Theatres v. Loew's, Inc. (C. C. A. 3d), 150 F. 2d 738. In its reply brief, it leans heavily on Ball v. Paramount Pictures, Inc. (C. A. 3d), 169 F. 2d 317. Witnesses who had charge of the film distribution in this area testified for all the distributors that they did not participate in and knew of no monopoly or conspiracy to injure the plaintiff. McFaul so testified for the exhibitors.

Burden of Proof on the Plaintiff

Plaintiff has the burden of establishing the alleged monopoly, conspiracy and restraint of trade. If the "proven facts give equal support to each of two inconsistent inferences," the plaintiff must fail. Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. Chamberlain, 288 U. S. 333, 339; Schad v. Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp. (C. C. A. 3d), 136 F. 2d 991, 996. Plaintiff must not only establish the fact of damages but must also offer sufficient proof of their amount. Story Parchment Co. v. Paterson Parchment Paper Co., 282 U. S. 251, 266; Twin Ports Oil Co. v. Pure Oil Co. (D. C. D. Minn.), 46 F. Supp. 149, 152.

Right to Select Customers

Plaintiff claims no damage to the Riviera Theatre prior to the alleged forced surrender of the lease on June 26, 1941. It there had for exhibit on exclusive first run all the products of Loew, Paramount, Fox, RKO, United and Warner Bros. Pictures Distributing Corporation, formerly called Vitagraph. During the operation of Century Theatre by plaintiff and its predecessor no pictures of Loew or Paramount were there shown. These defendants were majority stockholders in Buffalo and had a financial interest in the theatres operated by Buffalo. Their witnesses admitted that they favored their own theatres. It does not appear that Loew or Paramount are financially connected in any way with any of the other five defendant distributors or that these are interested in Buffalo's theatres, except that Buffalo was an old customer. Defendants Universal, Vitagraph and United in their brief cite many cases in support of the proposition that a distributor has the legal right to select its own customers and to deal or not deal with any customer as it sees fit. Among these citations is Federal Trade Commission v. Paramount (C. C. A. 2d), 57 F. 2d 152. Defendants Fox and RKO in their brief also stress the right of a distributor to do business with whom it pleases in the exercise of its own judgment and cite many cases.

The federal rule and its exception are well stated in Binderup v. Pathe Exchange, 263 U. S. 291.

Plaintiff urges that the seven defendant distributors did not act independently and that the evidence discloses that Vitagraph, RKO, Fox, Universal and United were dominated by the powerful "Shea Group", comprising Loew, Paramount and McFaul, so that plaintiff suffered financial loss at its Century and Bailey Theatres. The evidence however discloses that at the Century it got all of RKO's first-run feature pictures with the exception of one picture—Pinocchio—and all of RKO pictures it requested at the Bailey to be shown immediately after the run at Buffalo's competing Kensington Theatre. At the Century it also got about one-half (18 pictures) of the Warner (Vitagraph) product. It claims that this was not enough for successful operation; that in consequence of defendants' conspiracy and monopoly it lost money at the Century and the lessee was forced to surrender the lease, which was tied up with the Riviera lease, which also had to be abandoned at the same time.

Defendants Not Responsible for Surrender of Lease

Plaintiff offered no proof that the two leases were interrelated. There is no reference in one lease to the other. The two landlords were wholly independent corporations. The only connection between them is that one Max Yellen was president of the Riviera landlord corporation and general manager of the Century corporate landlord.

There is no evidence that Max Yellen was agent of any of the defendants. They should not be held liable for any loss to plaintiff resulting from the Riviera lease surrender.

Failure to Establish Damages

Plaintiff's second cause of action concerning the Century and Riviera Theatres must be dismissed for failure to establish any damages. This leaves for consideration plaintiff's first cause of action dealing with the Bailey Theatre.

The first cause of action alleges that while the Bailey and Kensington Theatres were operated by defendant exhibitors until August 1, 1939, they "had the same run, that is thirty (30) days after first run in the downtown Buffalo theatres. In practice, Defendant Exhibitors showed the more profitable pictures at the Bailey * * * first and showed such pictures at the Kensington from four (4) to eleven (11) days after the completion of the Bailey * * * showing" (Par. 20); that on April 19, 1939, Dipson-Basil Theatres, Inc. purchased the Bailey, that Defendant Exhibitors became aware of this and, not later than April 24, 1939, "immediately changed their operating policy as to the two theatres," advertised this change "and, on May 7, 1939, put it into effect by showing 'A' features at the Kensington ahead of the Bailey. This practice was promptly extended to all features, and was continued during the remainder of the term of (their) lease of the Bailey Theatre." (Par. 22.)

Paragraph 23 makes specific charges against the several defendants as follows:

> "Twenty-Third: In negotiating contracts for features at the Kensington * * * for the 1939-1940 and subsequent seasons, Defendant Exhibitors demanded a clearance in favor of the Kensington over the Bailey Theatre. By contract they obtained a clearance of * * * (7) days over the Bailey * * * from defendants (Loew, Paramount, RKO Universal and United). For the seasons 1939-40 and 1940-41 defendant (Vitagraph) contracted to furnish half of its features * * * to the Kensington * * * with a clearance of * * * (7) days over the Bailey * * * and to furnish the remaining half to the Bailey * * * with a clearance of * * * (7) days over the Kensington * * * . After October, 1942, this system of 'splitting' product was terminated and at all subsequent times (it) imposed a clearance in favor of the Kensington * * * against the Bailey * * * . By contract with defendant (Fox) for the seasons 1939-40 and 1940-41, the Bailey * * * was to obtain film immediately after the run at the Kensington * * * , but in practice (it) delivered film to the Bailey only upon a clearance of * * * (4) days after the Kensington * * * run * * * ."

Plaintiff offered official evidence of a steady population increase in the vicinity of the Kensington and a decrease in the Bailey vicinity during this period (Exhibits 43 and 44). There is no evidence that more than a part of Defendant Exhibitors' pictures were ever played on a prior run at the Bailey.

D. & B. Operating Co., Inc., which by change of name became Dipson, leased the Bailey and began operating it September 1, 1939, and plaintiff demands damages for losses from that date until September 17, 1945, in the total of $145,993. (Par. 25.) These were not absolute losses, as in the case of the Century operation from November 20, 1940, to June 27, 1941, where plaintiff went into the red. Plaintiff made some profit during said interval at the Bailey but claims it would have profited more on prior runs, of which it was deprived by defendants' monopoly and conspiracy.

No defendant in this case has objected to the court's jurisdiction.

The Court referred to the case of Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U. S. 469, at pages 497-498 and also Section 13 (a) of 15 U. S. C., which expressly provides for the right to select customers. Passages from the following cases were quoted: Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v. Cream of Wheat Co. (C. C. A. 2d), 227 F. 46, 49; United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U. S. 300, 307; Brosius v. Pepsi-Cola Co. (C. C. A. 3d), 155 F. 2d 99, 101-102; Green v. Victor Talking Mach. Co. (C. C. A. 2d), 24 F. 2d 378, 382.

In United States v. Colgate & Co., supra, the Supreme Court said:

"in the absence of any purpose to create or maintain a monopoly, the (Sherman Act) does not restrict the long recognized right of trader or manufacturer engaged in any entirely private business, freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to parties with whom he will deal."

This doctrine was applied to motion pictures in Westaway Theatre, Inc. v. Twentieth Century-Fox Film. Corp. (D. C. D. Md.), 30 F. Supp. 830, aff'd on opinion of court below, 113 F. 2d 932, at pages 836-837.

The Westaway case is distinguished in Ball v. Paramount Pictures (C. C. A. 3d), 169 F. 2d 317, which plaintiff's counsel quote at length in their reply brief.

In the instant case there is no evidence of any threat to deprive plaintiff of any first run features at the Century or prior showing at the Bailey and no evidence that plaintiff offered any of the distributor defendants more favorable terms than its competitor. Plaintiff did, at the Century, get all of RKO's first run features, except one picture, and one-half of Warners (Vitagraph). Its lessee took over a run-down theatre, which required about $50,000 repairs. Buffalo had lost money on the Century during the two years prior to the expiration of the lease and declined to renew it.

The two further cases relied on by plaintiff's counsel can be distinguished. In Interstate Circuit v. United States, 306 U. S. 208, see pages 221 and 225.

In the instant case such denials were emphatically made by all the defendant distributors and by defendant Vincent R. McFaul.

In William Goldman Theatres v. Loew's, Inc., 150 F. 2d 738, 164 F. 2d 1021, cert. den. 334 U. S. 811, plaintiff in 1940 decided to enter the first-run business and leased the Erlanger Theatre in Philadelphia, Pa., for 10 years at an annual rental of $12,000. See pages 742 and 743-744.

It appears in that case that Warner Brothers on September 4, 1942, reopened its Mastbaum Theatre one block away from plaintiff's Erlanger and since then "the receipts have amounted to approximately $1,000,000 a year." P. 742. See also page 745.

See also Circuit Court decision, 164 F. 2d 1002, and 306 U. S. at p. 227.

In the instant case there is no evidence that plaintiff offered to pay defendant exhibitors "much higher prices for pictures" than the Shea group or that any of the defendants invited or encouraged the others "to participate in a plan." The Century was an old theatre when Buffalo let its lease expire and required substantial repairs before it could operate. The Bailey and Kensington Theatres are 1.7 miles apart. Before Buffalo gave up the Century, defendant distributors preferred and sometimes insisted that their pictures be played in Buffalo's Hippodrome, Great Lakes or Buffalo Theatres for first run. Moreover the Kensington-Bailey clearances were not uniform after the Dipson interests acquired the Bailey.

As to the Bailey Theatre, plaintiff in its amended complaint claimed a total loss of $145,993 between September 1, 1939, and September 17, 1946, the date of the commencement of this action. This is based on the estimate of its witness William Smith, C. P. A. At the trial an error in arithmetic was disclosed in this estimate and plaintiff's counsel in their brief state that the corrected amount of damage is $145,228.

This Smith estimate is based on the ratio of Bailey admissions for "1938—last full year operated by Shea $143,214" to "1940—first full year operated by Dipson $110,098." The first is 130.08% of the last. The actual admissions at the Bailey are given in eight periods—9/1—12/31/39, 1940-1945, inclusive, and in 1946 to September 17. 130.08% of each is figured as the estimated admissions for each period. The estimated film rent is based on the ratio of the actual film rents and admissions and each estimated admission is multiplied by this ratio, which varies between the limit of 26.59% and 41.27%. The estimated operating expenses are based on the actual amounts for rent and C. O., which witness Smith said means contact office or general office expense. Counsel for defendants strenuously contested the probative value of this estimate. It assumes that the ratio of film rent to the admissions for a given period would be the same if the actual admissions were increased 130.08% for the same period and that the estimated operating expenses for a given period would be the same as the actual expenses plus the small addition of actual rent and C. O. for the same period.

This basis of computing damages differs entirely from either of the two methods sanctioned in Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, 327 U. S. 251.

The evidence discloses that plaintiff played all of Columbia Pictures Corporation and one-half of the Warner (Vitagraph) pictures at the Bailey ahead of the Kensington. Universal pictures were available to plaintiff for exhibition ahead of the Kensington but it did not license them.

Defendants offered in evidence (Exhibits 47 and 48) a complete list of all pictures played at the Kensington ahead of the Bailey and the converse from August 18, 1939, to August 27, 1946. Defendant's Exhibit 47 lists 127 pictures that played the Kensington ahead of the Bailey with a unit total of $32,764.32 and an average unit gross of $258 received at the Bailey. It lists 128 pictures that played the Bailey ahead or clear of the Kensington with a unit total of $27,302.58 and an average gross of $213.30 received at the Bailey. Defendants' Exhibit 48 lists the same pictures but with a different mode of computation, which is thus summarized: "Pictures played clear or ahead of Kensington Theatre: 508 units for a total gross of $112,124.76—average unit gross—$220.72. Pictures played after Kensington Theatre: 3,221 units for a total gross of $743,664.80—average unit gross—$230.88."

Plaintiff has failed to establish any violation by the defendants of the Sherman or Clayton Acts as alleged in the amended complaint and has also failed to give satisfactory proof of damages. The first and second causes of action of the amended complaint must be and are dismissed as to all the defendants. Findings may be submitted to accord with this opinion.

In the United States District Court for the District of Illinois, Eastern Division. No. 49 C 132. September 22, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Patented Razor Devices—Exclusive License to Manufacture and Sell—Action for Patent Infringement Dismissed.—A licensee having exclusive right to manufacture, sell, and otherwise dispose of a patented razor device under his own brand name, consented when his manufacturer pledged 45,000 of the patented and trade-marked blades as security for a loan. Upon default of the loan the blades were assigned to the creditor who sold them below prices established by fair trade agreements. An action was thereupon instituted by the patent owner for infringement. It was found that the licensee acted within the terms of his license when he contracted with the manufacturer for the fabrication of the blades and also when he consented to the pledging of the razors to the defendant finance company. Since the razors in question were, the Court ruled, manufactured before termination of the license they were free from the patent owner's monopoly. The patent owner having become entitled to a royalty cannot now assert such articles to be subject to his patent. The defendants' motion for summary judgment was granted.

Illinois Fair Trade Act

Action by Patent Owner—Illinois Fair Trade Act—No Protection of Goodwill Arising Out of Patent.—A patent owner who had licensed the right to manufacture and sell a patented razor device under the licensee's trade-mark sought damages under the Illinois Fair Trade Act for injury to goodwill when the patented devices were sold at prices below fair trade agreements between the licensee and its distributors. The Court ruled that this Act was only intended to protect goodwill arising out of the use of the trade-mark and since plaintiff did not own the trade symbols used to sell the article, he could not recover. Motion to dismiss this part of the complaint was sustained.

Memorandum

Opinion of WALTER J. LA BUY, District Judge.

[Digest] Defendants have filed a motion to dismiss the complaint and for summary judgment based on the pleadings and affidavits of Kellerher and Tarrson and other exhibits.

The facts giving rise to the dispute are as follows: On February 10, 1940, plaintiff, Harshberger, granted an exclusive license to Perry G. Stahly, who, subsequently in accordance with the license terms, assigned it to Birdsell Laboratories, now Stahly, Inc. The license granted Stahly the "exclusive right and license throughout the world under said inventions, said Letters Patent . . ., said applications for Letters Patent, and the Letters Patent to issue therefrom, to manufacture, use and sell razor devices and replacement parts therefor." The license further provided:

> "Royalties shall be considered earned and payable on all razors, razor beds, and handle assemblies (embodying any or all of the inventions forming the subject matter of this Agreement) and on all blades manufactured, sold, consigned, transferred, shipped, stored, warehoused, delivered, or otherwise disposed of by Stahly, or by any party or concern acting under his direction or with his consent."

A supplemental agreement in October 1942 modified the royalty schedule.

On February 1, 1946 and October 31, 1946, Stahly, Inc. contracted with Aircraft & Diesel Equipment Corporation for the latter to manufacture for it about 125,000 patented safety razors at the rate of 10,000 a month. In said contract Aircraft admitted the validity of the patents on the Stahly razor and agreed not to manufacture or sell such razors to anyone except Stahly.

The trademarks "Stahly" and "Live Blade" were registered in 1942 by Birdsell Laboratories and Stahly, Inc. is alleged to be the owner thereof in the companion case of Stahly, Inc. v. Tarrson, et al., 48 C 1849. In making the razors for Stahly, Inc. Aircraft used dies furnished it by Stahly, Inc., which dies also impressed the marks "Stahly" and "Live Blade."

It is averred in the affidavit of B. Ch. Kellerher, President of Aircraft, that Aircraft manufactured the 125,000 razors during or prior to February, 1948. Of the 125,000 so manufactured, Stahly received and paid for 80,000, leaving in the possession of Aircraft 45,000 razors. These are the razors which are the cause of the dispute. As to these 45,000 razors an effort was made to work out some plan whereby Stahly could take and pay for, or sell to others so as to relieve the serious financial condition of Aircraft and Stahly.

On June 18, 1948, Harshberger alleges that because of the default of Stahly to maintain timely payment of earned royalties, plaintiff terminated the exclusive license of Stahly, Inc.

On July 9, 1948, Perry G. Stahly, President of Stahly, Inc., communicated with Mr. Kellerher of Aircraft wherein he indicated that the "Premium and Prize outlets" would be the answer to the disposal of this inventory and thus relieve the parties' financial straits. None of the plans materialized and Aircraft secured a loan from General Factors Corporation to whom Stahly, as president of Stahly, Inc., wrote on July 21, 1948, stating:

> "We understand that Aircraft & Diesel Equipment Corporation has on hand approximately 45,000 Stahly Live Blade Razors which are in the possession of said Aircraft & Diesel Equipment Corporation subject to our order as to shipment.
> "In consideration of your making a loan to said Aircraft & Diesel Equipment Corporation, we hereby consent to and agree that we will not assert any rights or claims contrary to your rights to realize upon such security as pledgee thereof in the event of non-payment of the loan."

Aircraft defaulted on its note for $50,000 secured by 45,000 Stahly Live Blade razors and thereupon said collateral was assigned and transferred to Sidney Tarrson "for valuable consideration" in cancellation of the note of Aircraft. Tarrson's affidavit states that more than ten days before selling or offering to sell to the public, he offered to sell to Stahly, Inc. at a price of $2.75, which offer was refused, that he was closing out his entire stock of these 45,000 razors and when sold would no longer deal in them. Harshberger alleges in his complaint that "General Finance Corporation" on October 29, 1948, represented the balance due from Aircraft to be $130,000 and offered to sell the 45,000 razors to plaintiff and others at a price slightly less than $3.00 and alleges "immediately informed General Finance Corporation of his patent rights in said razors" both verbally and later in writing. On December 8, 1948, the plaintiff alleges he notified defendants of his patent rights in said razors.

The unlawful acts charged to defendants are alleged to be (1) notwithstanding the notice of December 8, 1948, defendants proceeded in willful and wanton disregard of plaintiff's rights to sell said razors and to offer them for sale, (2) defendants have been selling and offering for sale the accused razors at cut-rate prices drastically below the minimum wholesale and retail prices, (3) plaintiff avers on information and belief that many of the razors contain inherent defects likely to cause failure in their mechanisms after a short period of service, and (4) the unauthorized appearance on the market of quantities of the razors together with rumors circulated in the trade have shaken the confidence of plaintiff's customers and dealers. Plaintiff requests appointment of some person to examine issues as to the sales made by defendant and the damages to which plaintiff would be entitled, for injunction to restrain defendant's infringement of plaintiff's patent by using and selling without plaintiff's consent or license, and injunction to restrain further violation by defendants of the Illinois Fair Trade Act (Smith Hurd Ann. Ch. 12½).

The grounds of defendant's motions are (1) failure to state a claim since the complaint while alleging an exclusive license to Stahly, manufacture thereof by Aircraft, and disposal thereof by Aircraft with Stahly's consent, does not deny the razors were made under the license and were therefore freed from plaintiff's patent monopoly, (2) as the license agreement was effective during the time the razors were manufactured by Aircraft said razors were free from the monopoly of plaintiff's patents, (3) plaintiff's only claim is against Stahly for nonpayment of royalties, (4) plaintiff is not a party entitled to bring suit under the Illinois Fair Trade Act since plaintiff has no interest in any name, mark, label or brand under which said razors are sold, (5) defendants have not violated the Illinois act for the transaction complained of comes within the express exception of the Act where goods are being closed out, (6) plaintiff is estopped from suing under the Illinois act because Stahly, Inc., its exclusive licensee waived any rights of action with respect to said razors.

The rule in an action by an owner or assignee of a patent against a purchaser of the patented article has been expressed in Keller v. Standard Folding Bed (1894) 157 U. S. 659; and again in Mitchell v. Hawley, 83 U. S. 544.

It is clear that Stahly was within his license rights in having the articles manufactured by Aircraft and Harshberger does not claim otherwise herein.

On June 14, 1948, with the termination of Stahly's exclusive license, the issue arises whether the 45,000 razors in question were manufactured during the period of the license with Stahly giving effect to the royalty provision and thereby removing the patented article from the plaintiff's patent monopoly pursuant to the rule announced in the above cases. To this end, the affidavit of B. Ch. Kellerher, president of Aircraft, is submitted wherein he avers that said razors "were all completed on or prior to the month of February, 1948." Plaintiffs in their brief state they are in no position to disprove such allegation without discovery, but have not controverted the affidavit either in their pleadings or affidavits. Under such a situation, the fact so stated in Kellerher's affidavit, who as president of Aircraft would be competent to testify to the fact, must be taken as true. Hummel v. Riordan, (D. C. Ill. 1944) 36 F. S. 983; Gray v. Ameroda Petroleum Corp. (C. C. A. Tex. 1944) 145 F. (2d) 730. So, where plaintiff neither filed a controverting affidavit nor offered opposing proof, the contention that a substantial controversy of fact existed between the parties cannot be considered on plaintiff's own statement.

It is therefore taken by this court to be the fact that said razors were manufactured before the license agreement was terminated. That being so, the rule as stated by the United States Supreme Court applies and the razors are free from the plaintiff's patent monopoly.

The royalty clause which takes into account the situation under which royalty is deemed earned and payable, "or otherwise disposed of by Stahly or by any party or concern acting under his direction or with his consent" contemplates and intends that Stahly have complete control of the licensed product, with a restriction only on sublicensing. His action in consenting to the pledging of the razors to General Factors Corporation was within the rights given him by his license.

Does the fact that plaintiff notified General Factors Corporation in October 1948 of its patent rights alter this right of unconditional disposal of the product exercised by Stahly and would the fact that General Factors and Aircraft may be chargeable with knowledge of plaintiff's patent rights operate to restrict the use of said razors by Tarrson? There was no restriction placed by the license agreement upon the manner of the disposition of the razors and plaintiff's having become entitled to their royalty cannot now assert such articles to be subject to its patent monopoly.

The court is of the opinion that plaintiff's pleadings, affidavits and exhibits on file in support of its cause for patent infringement raise no issue of fact to be tried and as to this claim the defendant's motion for summary judgment is granted, and an order has this day been entered in accord herewith.

Plaintiff also alleges damages arising from the alleged violation by defendants of the fair trade agreements entered into by Stahly, Inc. and its distributors and dealers for the maintenance of certain prices. In Boston Store v. American Graphaphone Co. et al., (1917) 246 U. S. 8, the court certified certain questions to the Supreme Court, one of them being:

> "Can a patentee, in connection with the act of delivering his patented article to another for a gross consideration then received, lawfully reserve by contract a part of his monopoly to sell?"

The Supreme Court answered the question in the negative and in arriving at this conclusion, said:

> "* * * In addition, through perhaps an abundance of precaution, we direct attention to the fact that nothing in the decided cases to which we have referred, having regard either to the application of the general law or of the patent law, deprives an inventor of any right coming within the patent monopoly, since the cases alone concerned whether the monopoly of the patent law can be extended beyond the scope of that law or, in other words, applied to articles after they have gone beyond its reach. The proposition so earnestly insisted upon, that, while this may be true, it does not fairly consider the reflex detriment to come to the rights of property of the inventor within the patent law as a result of not recognizing the right to continue to apply the patent law as to objects which have passed beyond its scope, is obviously not one susceptible for judicial cognizance. This must be, since whether, for the preservation of the rights which are within a law, its provisions should be extended to embrace things which it does not include, typically illustrates that which is exclusive of judicial power and within the scope of legislative action."

Has the Illinois Fair Trade Act given such a right of extension to a patent owner who is not the owner of a trademark, is not a manufacturer nor producer or vendor? Plaintiff contends that Section 2 of the Act gives him such a right since his interest in the property and goodwill attached to his invention has been damaged. See Section 2.

In Triner Corporation v. McNeil, 363 Ill. 559, the purpose of the Act is aptly set forth at page 577; and again at page 579.

It appears clear, therefore, the protective cloak of the act extends to the protection of the property interest in the good will represented by brands, trademarks and trade names. The plaintiff asserts a goodwill arising separate and apart from that occasioned by the use of any symbol; that goodwill is alleged to arise through the invention itself, separate and apart from the name used to sell it. Plaintiff is the owner of the patent, but is not the owner of the trade symbols "Stahly" and "Live Blade" used to market the device. While it is true such goodwill could be injured through alleged price cutting of the trademarked article it does not appear that the Illinois act covered or intended to cover anything other than the goodwill arising from the use of the trademark by the injured party. Plaintiff's notice given to defendants and to General Factors cannot serve to extend his monopoly to sell when in fact under the license agreement he made no provision for its extension beyond the royalty and sublicensing phase.

There being no cause of action alleged under the Illinois Fair Trade Act, defendant's motion to dismiss that part of the complaint is sustained, and an order has this day been entered dismissing the action.

Illinois Fair Trade Act

Trade-mark Infringement—Unfair Competition—Waiver of Rights under Illinois Fair Trade Act.—In the absence of an allegation that the use of a trade-mark has been assumed without authority, a complaint does not state a claim for trade-mark infringement. It was held that a owner of a trade-mark had waived his right to enforce fair trade prices against the defendant finance company when the former wrote "in consideration of your making a loan . . . we hereby consent not to assert any rights contrary to your rights to realize upon such security . . .".

Memorandum

WALTER J. LA BUY, District Judge: In the companion case of Harshberger v. Tarrson, 49 C 132, the facts concerning the dispute have been set forth.

The motion to dismiss herein leaves for determination the sufficiency of the complaint to state trade-mark infringement and unfair competition through violation of the Illinois Fair Trade Act. It alleges defendant obtained possession of 45,000 razors bearing plaintiff's trade-marks, which razors are in defective condition and were never the property of the plaintiff; that plaintiff is informed and believes defendants are about to sell these razors as those of plaintiff and such sale would infringe the plaintiff's trade-marks.

Infringement of a trade-mark consists in unauthorized use or colorable imitation of a mark already appropriated by another. The present complaint does not allege defendants were guilty of either. It is stated that denial by plaintiff that it was the owner of the razors or that the razors were never the property of the plaintiff establishes that the trade-marks used thereon are either copies or counterfeits and that the sale of them bearing plaintiff's mark is an actionable wrong no matter how the marks happened to become applied to the goods. While this may be true, such a denial of ownership of goods does not allege that defendant without authority assumed the usage of the trade-mark and in the absence of such an allegation it cannot be said that the complaint states a claim for trade-mark infringement. It is the usage of the trade-mark in an unauthorized manner which is the basis of a trade-mark infringement action.

The amended complaint further alleges violation by defendants of fair trade agreements fixing the prices of the razors in that defendants have sold, offered to sell and intend to sell said razors at prices below the minimum prices established by plaintiff and its distributors and dealers. The pertinent question is whether Stahly waived the right to proceed in protection of that contract right by virtue of the letter sent to General Factors Corporations on July 21, 1948.

The salient part of the letter reads:

> "In consideration of your making a loan to said Aircraft & Diesel Equipment Corporation, we hereby consent to and agree that we will not assert any rights or claims contrary to your rights to realize upon such security as pledgee thereof, in the event of non-payment of the loan."

Waiver has been defined as a "voluntary and intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known existing right, advantage, benefit, claim, or privilege, which except for such waiver the party would have enjoyed; . . ." 67 Corpus Juris 289. The question of consideration appears settled in the letter itself, being the granting of a benefit to a third party. The court is of the opinion the above paragraph of the letter constitutes a waiver and abandonment of all rights plaintiff could assert as to the razors without regard to future possession by any other person.

An order has this day been entered sustaining the defendant's motion to dismiss the plantiff's amended complaint.

Minnesota Fair Trade Act

Closing Out Sales—Notice and Offer to Resell—Strict Compliance with Section 325.11. —A retailer's right to close out his stock of a particular commodity without being bound by his fair trade contract in respect to such commodity, has limitations, in the opinion of the Attorney General of Minnesota. The retailer is required first to give to the producer or distributor of the commodity prompt and reasonable notice in writing of his intention to close out stock and an opportunity to purchase such stock at the original invoice price. Without giving notice to the manufacturer of his intention to close out the stock, the mere offer to resell to the manufacturer is not a strict compliance with this requirement.

See the Minnesota Fair Trade Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8424, and the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7278.

Your letter of September 8 presents for consideration these

Facts

A retailer, who had purchased from a manufacturer certain goods, the retail price of which, it was agreed between them, was governed by a contract which fixed the minimum price for resale in conformity with MSA 325.08, made an offer to the manufacturer of the goods to resell to the manufacturer such goods at the original invoice price. The manufacturer refused to accept the offer to repurchase. The retailer then resold the goods to another retailer. The second mentioned retailer thereupon, without notice to the manufacturer, sold such goods at retail at less than the price stipulated in the contract aforesaid.

Upon these facts you submit the Question

Was the sale by one retailer to another in conflict with MSA 325.11 (1)?

We first consider MSA 325.08. This section permits the making of a contract relating to the sale or resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trade-mark, brand or name of the producer or distributor, which commodity is in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced or distributed by others. This section provides that such a contract shall not be considered in violation of the laws of this state because it contains a provision that the buyer will not resell such commodity at less than the minimum price stipulated by the seller. It shall not be considered in violation of the laws of this state because it contains a provision that the buyer will require any dealer to whom he may resell such commodity an agreement that he will not in turn resell at less than the minimum price stipulated by the seller. It is not in violation of the law because it provides that the seller will not sell the commodity to a wholesaler unless the wholesaler agrees not to resell the same to a retailer unless the retailer will, in turn, agree not to resell the same except to consumers for use at not less than the stipulated, minimum price, and the wholesaler will likewise agree not to resell the same to any other wholesaler unless such other wholesaler will make the same agreement with any wholesaler or retailer to whom he may resell. Such contract is not contrary to law because it contains a provision that the person to whom the goods are sold will not sell to any retailer unless the retailer will agree not to sell the same except to consumers for use and at not less than the stipulated, minimum price.

Sec. 325.11 refers to Sec. 325.08. It provides that a contract made under the provisions of Sec. 325.08 shall not be considered to preclude the resale of any commodity covered thereby without reference to the contract when the owner of a stock of merchandise is closing out his stock for the bona fide purpose of discontinuing dealing in that commodity and he gives plain notice of that fact to the public. His right to close out his stock of a particular commodity without being bound by his fair trade contract in respect to such commodity has limitations.

He is required to first give to the producer or distributor of the commodity prompt and reasonable notice in writing of his intention to close out such stock and an opportunity to purchase such stock at the original invoice price.

In the facts under consideration the retailer who had made the contract under Sec. 325.08 offered to resell the protected goods to the manufacturer, but the statement of facts does not show that he gave the manufacturer notice in writing of his intention to close out the stock.

My conclusion would, therefore, be that upon these facts if the retailer, who purchased from the manufacturer, gave the manufacturer notice in writing of his intention to close out such stock, his sale to the second retailer was not governed by the contract made under Sec. 325.08. Merely offering to resell to the manufacturer was not enough. Without giving notice to the manufacturer as provided in Sec. 325.11 of his intention to close out the stock, the mere offer to resell to the manufacturer was not a compliance with Sec. 325.11.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Liquor Distributors—Enforcement of Liquor Laws—Agreement Not to Supply.—The refusal by whiskey distillers to supply distributors who sell to exporters dealing with North Carolina bootleggers would not be a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, in the opinion of the Attorney General of North Carolina.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1660.

I received your letter of July 30th enclosing to me a memorandum outlining the request made by you to the Distillers on a recent trip to New York, seeking to secure their cooperation in discontinuing supplying distributors or jobbers who were in turn selling to exporters or wholesalers, who in their turn were selling to bootleggers of North Carolina. You further state in your memorandum as follows:

> "It was requested that the Distillers write a letter to their Distributors and/or Jobbers advising them that if they were selling whiskey to exporters or wholesalers engaged in selling to North Carolina bootleggers that such practice must be stopped, further that if they learned of any future practice of this nature that the Distillers would discontinue furnishing them with their proceeds. It was requested that a copy of such letter from the Distillers to the Distributors and/or Jobbers be mailed to the Chairman of the N. C. ABC Board."

I note that the question has been raised by one of the Distillers as to whether or not compliance with your request would be a violation of the Anti-Trust Laws.

I have had an investigation made on the subject by a member of my staff, Mr. John R. Jordan, and I enclose to you a copy of this memorandum. You will observe that Mr. Jordan's memorandum states in conclusion that while the cases do not offer a definite answer to the query, it appears from a survey of analogous cases that the refusal by whiskey distillers to supply distributors who sell to exporters dealing with North Carolina bootleggers would not be a violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.

I am of the opinion that this conclusion is correct and that the Courts would certainly hold that the policy which was outlined by you for the distillers would not be in any sense a violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. I am so confident of this position that I think you would be entirely justified in treating any distillers who refused to comply with your reasonable request as disclosing an unwillingness to cooperate with North Carolina authorities in enforcing its laws against the sale of intoxicating beverages in this State. Under such circumstances, I think you would be justified in taking such action as to the products of such distillers as you would feel was warranted.

Michigan Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade Act for Special Benefit—Restraint of Competition—State Not Bound by Restrictive Statute.—Since the Michigan Fair Trade Practice Law is, in the opinion of the Attorney General of that State, an act for the special benefit of manufacturers interested in restraining competition, it is restrictive in nature. The State, therefore, should be held not to be bound by this Statute or contracts made pursuant to its authority. To make the benefits of competition available to the state as a buyer, the seller must also be free from the restrictive provisions of the Act and of contracts made thereunder.

See the Michigan Fair Trade Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8404, and the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7288.

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 20, 1949 requesting the opinion of the Attorney General as to whether the so-called Fair Trade Practice Law applies to sales of merchandise to the State of Michigan. The statute in question, Section 19.321, M. S. A. Supp.; Section 445.151, et seq., Compiled Laws of 1948, provides:

> "Sec. 1. No contract relating to the sale or resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trademark, brand, or name of the producer or owner of such commodity and which is in fair and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced by others shall be deemed in violation of any law of the state of Michigan by reason of any of the following provisions which may be contained in such contract:
> 1. That the buyer will not resell such commodity at less than the price stipulated by the vendor.
>
> 2. That the producer or vendee of a commodity require upon the sale of such commodity to another, that such purchaser agree that he will not, in turn, resell at less than the price stipulated by such producer or vendee.
>
> "Sec. 2. Wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of section 1 of this act, whether the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby, and may be enjoined by a court of competent jurisdiction."

A part of Section 1 not quoted above deals with certain exceptions not here material.

This statute, if it applies at all to sales to the State of Michigan, permits private parties to dictate by contract between themselves, the minimum price at which the state may purchase practically every item of merchandise needed by it which is found in the open competitive market because while the state is not in terms prohibited from purchasing from one willing to sell at less than the price fixed by a statutory agreement, the means exist whereby nearly all sellers may be restrained by injunction from selling to the state for a price below that fixed by the statutory agreement, a method quite effective in setting the price at which the state may buy in the open market.

A legislative intent to place such control over a large element of the cost of the operation of the state government in the hands of private parties may not lightly be inferred.

> "It is the general rule that the State is not bound by the general words of a statute which if applied would operate to trench on its sovereign rights, injuriously affect its capacity to perform its functions or establish a right of action against it, unless the contrary is expressly declared or necessarily implied." Lewis' Sutherland on Statutes & Statutory Construction, Vol. 2 (2d) par. 514. Butler v. Merritt, 113 Ga. 238.
> "General words of a statute do not include or bind the government by whose authority the statute was enacted, where its sovereign rights, prerogatives or interests are involved. It is bound only by being expressly named or by necessary implication from the terms and purposes of the act." Black on Interpretation of Statutes, pgs. 119-120.
> "The sovereign rights are never impaired by general legislative encroachment unless the statute expressly declares such intent." Lyman v. Old Age Assistance, 373 Ill. 27.

See also: Miller v. Board of Road Com'rs, 297 Mich. 487; Wyandotte v. State Board, 278 Mich. 47; City of Big Rapids v. Mecosta County Supervisors, 99 Mich. 351; People v. Ingalis, 238 Mich. 423.

Theoretically, at least, all statutes are for the public good. However, the statute under consideration is not one for the public good within the meaning of the exception to the rule that restrictive statutes do not apply to states. It is rather an act for the special benefit of manufacturers and others interested in keeping up the price of their products. It legalizes certain contracts in restraint of competition and the beneficial effect thereof is limited almost, if not entirely, to the parties to such contracts and the statute operates to the detriment, financially at least, of everyone else. The state, therefore, should be held not to be bound by this statute or by contracts made pursuant to its authority.

The purpose served by holding that the state is not bound by the Fair Trade Practice Act is to permit the state to buy commodities in an unrestricted competitive market where the benefits of natural competition will be reflected in the price the state will be required to pay. As indicated in the request for this opinion, the effect of freedom from the restrictions of the act under consideration will in the case of some commodities reduce the price to be paid by the state as much as 15 percent. To make the benefits of such competition available to the state as a buyer, the sellers must also be free from the restrictive provisions of the act and of contracts made thereunder. To say to the state "You are free to buy in a competitive market but no one is free to sell to you in such market" is to say to the state in effect that it may not buy in a competitive market at all. The only conclusion which constitutes realistic interpretation of the sovereign rights of the state is one which holds that both the state and any seller to it are free from the obligations of any so-called fair trade contract made pursuant to the statute under discussion and that the remedies provided by such statute against those who sell in violation of so-called fair trade contracts have no application to transactions to which the state is a party and are not available either against the state or the other party to such transactions.

Your question as to whether the so-called Fair Trade Practice Law has any application to the state or to sales to it or to any parties to such sales, is accordingly answered in the negative.

[¶ 62,500] Opinion of the Attorney General of Idaho.

An Idaho Act to Prohibit Unfair Marketing Practices in Dairy Products

Fluid Milk Market—Quota Basis of Payment—Price Discrimination.—The practice on the part of milk distributors of paying producers at a more favorable rate for milk quantities coming within average production quotas and at a less favorable rate for milk of the same grade and quality offered over and above such quotas, does not violate the Idaho law which prohibits discrimination and unfair competition in buying and selling dairy products as between different communities of the state.

See the Idaho Anti-Price Discrimination Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8212.

The Bureau of Dairying recently asked this office whether the quota basis of payment for producers of fluid or bottled milk is in violation of any of the laws of the State of Idaho. The facts involved in this situation are set forth in their letter and read as follows:

"At the present time it appears to be the practice of some processors and distributors of dairy products to establish a quota basis of payment for producers of fluid or bottled milk. As for example a producer offers for sale during September an average of 500 pounds of milk per day for which he receives twenty cents ($.20) per pound butter fat above the price paid for manufacturing or process milk which is made into butter and non fat milk powder. This average of 500 pounds then is established as the producers quota for the year.

"Then supposing that during the months of April, May, June and July, said producer ships 700 pounds per day of milk, of the same quality and since he is on the 500 pound per day quota he receives the premium on the 500 pounds or twenty cents ($.20) per pound fat above manufacturing or process milk price, but is paid only the processed or manufacturing milk price for the 200 pounds per day average which exceeds the quota as set by the distributor."

There has been some contention that this practice is in violation of the law prohibiting discrimination and unfair competition in buying and selling dairy products. (Chapter 10, Title 37, Idaho Code). As to discrimination in the buying of dairy products, Section 37-1001, Idaho Code, reads in pertinent part:

"37-1001. Discrimination by Buying at Higher Price—Prima Facie Evidence—Grades of Cream.—a. Any person, firm, corporation, or other organization, foreign or domestic, engaged in the business of buying milk, cream or butter fat for the purpose of manufacture, that shall discriminate between different sections, communities, towns, villages or cities of this state, by buying such commodity at a higher price or rate in one section, community, town, village or city, than is paid for the same commodity by said firm, person, corporation, or other organization in another section, community, town, village or city, after making due allowance for the difference, if any, in the actual cost of transportation from the point of purchase to the locality of manufacture, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared unlawful . . ."

This particular section strikes at any discrimination in the buying of milk, cream, or butterfat as between different sections, communities, towns, villages or cities of this state. It prohibits the purchase of dairy products at a higher price or rate in one section, community, town, village or city than is paid for the same commodity by the same firm or person in another section, community, town, village or city. From the information presented in the Bureau's letter there appears to be no discrimination between communities, etc., by the various processors in their purchases from the producers. The quota system described by the Bureau does not indicate the discrimination prohibited by the above section.

This same chapter also prohibits unfair competition in the buying and selling of dairy products. This provision is in Section 37-1002, Idaho Code, which reads in part as follows:

". . . Any person, firm, corporation or other organization, foreign or domestic, doing business in this state and engaged in the purchase, sale, manufacture or distribution of any dairy product, that shall pay a price for any dairy product or do any act with the intention or for the purpose of creating a monopoly, or destroying the business of a competitor in any locality, or restraining trade or preventing, stifling or limiting competition by any person in such business or who in good faith intends or attempts to engage in such business, shall be guilty of unfair discrimination which is hereby prohibited and declared unlawful."

Also, Section 37-1003, Idaho Code, prohibits any scheme of special rebates, collateral contracts, or any device of any nature whereby discrimination is made possible.

The statement in the letter does not show that the processors and distributors are paying a price for any dairy product, or committing any act, with the intention of or for the purpose of creating a monopoly. The question of stifling or limiting competition does not arise from mere use of the quota system. There must be other acts evidencing an intention to create a monopoly or a monopolistic situation tending toward the destruction of the business of a competitor. Such acts do not appear in the facts which have been presented.

From the facts presented by the Bureau, it appears, therefore, that the quota basis of payment to producers of fluid or bottled milk is not an improper or unlawful practice. Such a practice may be productive of undesirable and unsatisfactory results but we find no barrier in the statutes which indict the system as unlawful.

MR. JUSTICE HOFSTADTER. Motion for a temporary injunction to restrain the sale of the plaintiff's trademarked products at prices less than the resale prices fixed by the plaintiff, in violation of the State Fair Trade Act (General Business Law, Article 24A) is granted. The plaintiff's failure to take action against all violators does not forfeit its right to relief against the offending defendant (Seagram-Distillers Corp'n v. Ackerman, 263 App. Div., 106; Nat. Distillers v. Columbus Circle Liquor Store, 166 Misc., 719). It is not shown that the plaintiff's inaction, if any, was such as to constitute an abandonment of its maintenance of resale price policy. The action will, however, be set for trial for October 25, 1949, for which date the plaintiff will file a note of issue which the clerk is directed to accept. Undertaking $1,000. Settle order.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Insurance and the Antitrust Laws—Price-Fixing—State Regulation.—In suing 49 casualty insurance companies, a bureau of casualty underwriters, and a rating agency, a taxicab company alleged that the action of these parties in cancelling its insurance contracts and that the action of the rating bureau in supplying certain information alleged to be responsible for its higher premium rate, constituted a pattern of action followed under contract or conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act. It was held that the taxicab company was not entitled to treble damages or injunctive relief; the defendants' motion for summary judgment was granted. In the absence of public regulation the price-fixing activities of the bureau would constitute a violation of the Sherman Act, the court ruled. However the federal statute was not violated by activities which were authorized by the McCarron-Ferguson Act, a valid regulatory statute.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1240.2328.

For the defendants: Gannaway & Gannaway, Little Rock, Arkansas, for Casualty Reciprocal Exchange; James B. Donovan, New York, New York, and Wright, Harrison, Lindsey & Upton (formerly Buzbee, Harrison & Wright), Little Rock, Arkansas, for all defendants other than Casualty Reciprocal Exchange.

For the intervenor: J. Herbert Graves, State Capitol, Little Rock, Arkansas.

Opinion of TRIMBLE, District Judge.

Facts

[Digest] The plaintiff, a taxicab company, operating in the area of Little Rock, Arkansas, brings this action against the Casualty Reciprocal Exchange, the National Bureau of Casualty Underwriters, and forty-nine casualty insurance companies, all authorized to and doing business in Arkansas.

National Bureau of Casualty Underwriters, referred to herein as Bureau, a voluntary, non-profit, unincorporated association of stock companies engaged in writing casualty insurance, is a rating agency. As such it secures and analyzes pertinent data from which it establishes for its members and subscribers, writing rules, risk classifications, policy provisions, forms, manual rates, minimum premiums and rating plans.

The Bureau is licensed and authorized to act as a rating organization for automobile liability insurance by the State of Arkansas, and all of the casualty insurance companies, parties to this action, are members or subscribers of the Bureau, except the Casualty Reciprocal Exchange. From July 24, 1946 to May 16, 1948 plaintiff was insured by defendant Exchange for automobile liability, covering its taxicab operations. The permissible loss ratio for such insurance is 64% of premiums, and the losses attributable to claims against the plaintiff during that period amounted to 136.1%. Plaintiff was paying to Exchange ordinary manual rates, based upon the average experience of all insureds, not adjusted because of the particular experience of individual risks. Effective May 16, 1948, Exchange cancelled the policy in accordance with its terms.

After seeking insurance elsewhere and being refused, plaintiff applied to the Arkansas Automobile Risk Plan, which was a cooperative undertaking by all insurers licensed to transact such business in Arkansas, and under which each insurer accepts an equitable number of risks, in good faith seeking such insurance, and unable to obtain it. The plan was organized in 1947 pursuant to Act 116 of Acts of Arkansas, 1947, with the approval of the Insurance Commissioner of Arkansas. Under this plan the plaintiff was assigned to defendant Aetna Casualty and Surety Company, (a member of the Bureau), the risk was accepted and policy issued effective May 16, 1948. Aetna accepted an initial premium, did not apply the ordinary manual rates, the final premium to be computed when proper rate-making data became available, and provided that in calculating the proper rate for the risk, consideration would be given to plaintiff's experience.

At Aetna's request the Exchange furnished through proper channels information as to the accident experience of plaintiff under the Exchange policies. Although this information was not complete, when received it was furnished to the Bureau, and Aetna requested the Bureau to establish a rate for the risk.

Under the submission to the plaintiff of this rate so established, it complained to the Arkansas Insurance Department. The Department, at plaintiff's request, obtained from Exchange and sent to Bureau, all other obtainable information on plaintiff's experience under the Exchange policies.

On the basis of the completed information, Bureau recalculated the rate for the risk in accordance with the rating plan on file with the Department. The source from which the information came was not determinative of the rate and the rate would have been the same regardless of source of information.

Demand for payment of the established rate was made on July 29, 1948, with cancellation of the policy as the alternative, and the full sum was paid on July 31, 1948.

While members and subscribers to Bureau write 56% of all automobile liability insurance written in Arkansas, there are insurance carriers writing such insurance which are members of another licensed bureau, and insurers not members or subscribers to any rating bureau.

With two exceptions all members and subscribers of the Bureau use the same rates, rating plan and coverage.

After paying the additional premium demanded, plaintiff took no further action before the administrative body of the State, the Insurance Commissioner, and did not communicate further with any of the parties to this action.

Allegations

The action was begun on August 17, 1948, and, after setting up the facts, plaintiff says: that the conduct of the defendants described above "is a pattern of action followed under contract or conspiracy between them in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states and violates the Sherman Act.

Complaint also alleges that Act No. 116 of the Acts of the General Assembly, 1947, p. 265, Arkansas Statutes, 1947, Annotated, Vol. 6, p. 179, Secs. 66-417 et seq., violates the provisions of Section 1 of the Sherman Act "to the extent that it purports to justify the conduct of the defendants and to give to said conduct the color of legality."

Plaintiff also contends that Public Law No. 15, the McCarron-Ferguson Act, Title 15 U. S. C. Secs. 1011, et seq., is unconstitutional, in that: Congress may not delegate to individual states power to legislate within the Commerce Clause of the United States Constitution, and, Congress cannot suspend general laws for a period of time except under the war powers.

It then contends that if Public Law 15 is found to be constitutional, it is not applicable to Act 116 of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, 1947.

It is also contended that Act 116 of the Acts of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas is invalid in that it conflicts with the State Constitution and the antitrust laws of Arkansas.

And that the acts of the defendants were not authorized by Act 116.

Briefs were submitted by all interested parties, and the cause is now submitted upon the motion for summary judgment under Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

Statement of Applicable Law

The Court concludes the law to be:

The Sherman Act applies to transactions of insurance. United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Association, 322 U. S. 533.

The McCarron-Ferguson Act, is constitutional. Prudential Insurance Company v. Benjamin, Insurance Commissioner, 328 U. S. 408. In the absence of public regulation or Congressional exemption, the price fixing activities of the Bureau involved in this case would constitute a violation of the Sherman Act. United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150, rehearing denied p. 658. The Sherman Act is not violated by acts authorized and regulated by state statute. Parker, Director of Agriculture, et al. v. Brown, 317 U. S. 341 at page 351. Also Prudential Insurance Co. v. Benjamin, etc. supra. This is also expressly provided by the McCarron-Ferguson Act, which exempts insurance from the Sherman Act to the extent that such business is regulated by state law. Act 116 of Arkansas, 1947, constitutes proper regulation within the meaning of that statute.

The McCarron-Ferguson Act is not a delegation "to individual States power to legislate in the regulation of insurance transactions coming within the Commerce Clause," but is a proper division of power between the United States and the several States, a rendering unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's. Connecticut Light & Power Co. v. Federal Power Commission, 324 U. S. 515. In this case the court found that the congressional action in extending federal jurisdiction to only "those matters which are not subject to regulation by the States—" constituted a legal standard that must be given effect in resolving conflicting claims by federal and state authorities of power to regulate. (p. 531.) Also Prudential Insurance Company v. Benjamin, etc., supra.

Act 116 of the Acts of the General Assembly of Arkansas is not in contravention of the laws or constitution of the State of Arkansas. National Union Fire Insurance Company v. Dickinson, Auditor, et al., 128 Ark. 367. It is a valid regulatory statute and the acts of the defendants were within its scope, and in accordance with its provisions.

Nowhere in this record does it appear that any facts or conditions existed which would justify plaintiff in fearing intimidation, boycott or coercion, or show that any such boycott, intimidation or coercion was attempted or threatened. Certainly the fact that plaintiff was advised that the insurance contract would be cancelled in accordance with its terms, unless premium was paid at the established rate is not sufficient. Plaintiff already knew this when it accepted the contract, and common business practice would have brought home to it this knowledge and information.

The plaintiff is not entitled to judgment for treble damages nor for injunctive relief. Keogh v. Chicago & Northwestern Ry. Co. et al., 260 U. S. 156. Defendants are entitled to have a summary judgment and summary judgment will be entered, adjudging the costs against the plaintiff. International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392.

In the United States District Court for the Southern Division of the District of Maine. Civil Action No. 520. October 25, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Motion Picture Industry—Normally in Competition—Pooling Agreement Ordered Terminated.—In an action brought for a declaratory judgment, agreements to operate two theatres as a unit were ordered to be terminated. The two theatres were found to be normally in competition within the meaning of a decree entered in an action between the Government and certain film corporations, including the plaintiffs' parent company, which enjoined the making or performing of this type of agreement. In deciding the issue of whether or not the two were competitors, the Court declared that the important factor was their location. When operating within the same competitive area, two theatres are normally in competition even though the physical appointments and the type of picture shown by each are not comparable.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.273, 1640.689.

For the plaintiffs: Arthur G. Whittemore, Boston, Massachusetts.

For the defendant: Abraham Rudman, Bangor, Maine.

Opinion of the Court

Opinion of CLIFFORD, J., District Judge.

[Digest] This is a proceeding which seeks from this Court a declaration of rights and responsibilities existing under certain contracts entered into by the parties. The remedy requested is that set forth in the Declaratory Judgment Act.

Jurisdiction of this Court rests on two grounds. First, this proceeding concerns the application of the terms of a decree, (United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., et al., 66 F. Supp. 323, as modified, 70 F. Supp. 53 (Dist. Ct., S. D., N. Y., 1946)), issued by a United States Expediting District Court for the Southern District of New York, under the Sherman Act Sections 1 and 2. Second, this is also a proceeding in which the plaintiff, New England Theatres, Inc., is a Delaware corporation, the plaintiff M & P Theatres Corporation is a Massachusetts corporation, and the defendant is an individual and a citizen of Maine, thus fulfilling the jurisdictional requirement of diversity of citizenship. The matter in controversy exceeds the sum of three thousand dollars.

Consideration of the present case involves no clash of jurisdiction with the United States Expediting Court for the Southern District of New York. The modified decree of the Expediting Court, United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 70 F. Supp. 53, 76, includes the ruling that "jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to the judgment and no others to apply to the Court at any time for such orders or directions as may be necessary. . . ." (emphasis added). In the present case, the defendant was not a party to the original judgment. As will appear, plaintiffs are subsidiaries of Paramount Pictures, Inc., one of the defendants in the original action; but neither plaintiff was itself a party to that action. The decree of the Expediting Court supports an inference that other courts may deal with questions involving persons not parties to its original judgment. This Court will therefore refuse to decline jurisdiction of the present case on any ground of comity.

New England Theatres, Inc. is now and was in August, 1937, owner of the Central Theatre in Biddeford, Maine. Louis B. Lausier is now and was in August, 1937, the lessee of the City Theatre in Biddeford, Maine. On August 26, 1937, New England Theatres, Inc. and Lausier executed a written agreement which provided that the City Theatre and the Central Theatre should be operated as a unit and that profits, after certain deductions, should be shared between the two parties. A copy of this contract is incorporated in the complaint as Exhibit No. 1 and still governs the business relations between the parties to it. Pursuant to authority given in this contract, New England Theatres, Inc. entered into a contract with the plaintiff M & P Theatres Corporation under which the latter agreed to furnish management services for the City and Central Theatres for certain compensation. This contract is incorporated in the complaint as Exhibit 2, and is also still in effect.

The plaintiffs have brought this action for a declaration as to the continued validity of the above-mentioned agreements as the result of litigation between the United States Government and certain producers, distributors, and exhibitors of film, including Paramount Pictures, Inc., the parent of the plaintiff corporations. This litigation, stated in 1938, proceeded before a special expediting court convened in the Southern District of New York, which issued an opinion and decree (U. S. v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., et al., 66 Fed. Supp. 323, as modified, 70 Fed. Supp. 53 (Dist. Ct., S. D., N. Y., 1946)) enjoining the defendant from > ". . . making or continuing to perform pooling agreements whereby given theatres of two or more exhibitors normally in competition are operated as a unit . . ." 70 Fed. Supp., at p. 74.

Plaintiffs, in this Court, sought to bring about a final determination of the validity of the contracts by means of a summary judgment. It was adjudged, as a result of the summary judgment proceeding that:

> "A pooling agreement exists between one of the plaintiffs and the defendant, whereby the theatres under their control are operated as a unit. Their policies are collectively determined, and profits are shared by a prearranged percentage."

However, the Court found that:

> "There appears a genuine issue as to whether such theatres would be 'normally in competition' in the absence of any pooling agreement, such issue being one of a material fact."

The issue before this Court is a narrow one: Are the two Biddeford theatres, the City and the Central, "normally in competition" within the meaning of that phrase as used in the decree of the Expediting Court? United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., et al., 66 F. Supp. 323 (D.C. S.D., N. Y., 1946), aff'd in part, rev'd, in part, 334 U. S. 131, (1947). The plaintiffs contend that they are normally in competition; the defendant contends that they are not normally in competition.

Definition of Exhibitor

Both plaintiff and defendant have been heard concerning the further issue whether or not the defendant is an "exhibitor" within the meaning of that part of the decree enjoining pooling agreements.

Defendant has contended that he is not and has not been experienced in the business of exhibiting motion pictures; that he purchased the lease of the City Theatre only on the assumption that plaintiffs would undertake the active management of it; that he is merely an investor and not an operator or an exhibitor, and thus that the decree, which in terms applies to pooling agreements among exhibitors, should not be held to apply to the contracts at issue in this case.

The term "exhibitor" in the part of the decree pertinent to this case has a meaning different from the term "operator". The decree speaks of agreements whereby theatres of two or more exhibitors are operated as a unit, the implication being that one or more of the cooperating exhibitors may be wholly inactive in the management of the pool. Again, the concept of "exhibitor", insofar as the decree enjoining pooling agreements is concerned, is that of "theatre owner", as appears from the use of the two words, "exhibitors" and "owners", in conjunction in the following excerpt from the decree:

> ". . . theatres of two or more exhibitors normally in competition are operated as a unit or . . . whereby profits of the pooled theatres are divided among the owners. . . ." (U. S. v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 66 F. Supp. 323, at 358.)

The Supreme Court, in softening the effect of the lower court's decree, by exempting from its operation cases which "involve no more than innocent investments by those who are not actual or potential operators", (U. S. v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 334 U. S. 131, 153) (1947) was referring to cases of joint ownership and not specifically to cases involving pooling agreements between theatres separately owned.

This Court is of the opinion that the defendant is not merely an investor but is an exhibitor within the meaning of the decree relating to pooling agreements. The defendant when he first took a lease had no assurance that plaintiffs would in fact conclude an agreement with him to operate the theatre, and that he therefore initially undertook all the risks of an operator.

Defendant's first argument fails and he is subject to the injunction of the New York decree if the two theatres would be, in the absence of the existing contracts, "normally in competition."

Physical Appointments of Theatres

This Court finds that the City Theatre is an old fashioned hall, located on the second floor of the City Building, owned by the City of Biddeford, and was constructed over fifty years ago. The City Theatre is poorly appointed having a drab and dingy entrance, lobby, and rest rooms, with most of its auditorium seats on the flat floor and many of its side seats giving a distorted view of the screen. Some of the seats have been broken and patched. Very little money has been expended on its maintenance. In short, as one witness, experienced in the motion picture business, characterized the City Theatre, ". . . in the parlance of our industry, I would call that a shooting gallery." The City Theatre has for a number of years, under the combined management, shown first-run pictures of the so-called "B" or "action" variety, and has charged lower admission prices than has the Central.

The Central Theatre, on the other hand, located within a few blocks of the City Theatre, is a completely modern street-level theatre, was newly constructed within the past several years, with new appointments throughout, and offering a good view of the screen from all seats. Under the combined management the Central has consistently shown the first-run of the top grader or "A" type pictures, and has charged higher admission prices than those of the City. The evidence is undisputed that the combined gross income of the two theatres has come roughly 70% from the Central and roughly 30% from the City.

Competition Defined

The phrase "normally in competition" refers to the competitive situation which would exist between the theatres apart from the peculiar circumstances of a combined management, or pooling agreement. There seems to be little question that Central would be able to compete successfully with City should the combined management agreement be dissolved, and that dissolution of the agreements would enure to the substantial benefit of Central, the plaintiffs' theatre.

What is meant by "competition"? Competition is defined in Lipson v. Socony Vacuum Corporation, 87 F. 2d 265, 270 (C. C. A. 1st, 1937) as "the struggle between rivals for the same trade at the same time; the act of seeking or endeavoring to gain what another is endeavoring to gain at the same time." True, it has been said that "if methods become too widely separated, competition usually disappears, because the superiority of one must be admitted. Competition between sail and steam may still exist as to freight, but there is none as to passenger service," Continental Securities Co. v. Interborough R. T. Co., 207 Fed. 467, 470 (D.C., S.D., N. Y., 1913); but we are not dealing with a case of competition analogous to that between sail and steam. Rather our case is one of the competition between a new steam passenger vessel and one forty or fifty years old. This Court is unwilling to state as a matter of law that there is no competition in the latter case.

The testimony in the present case included an undisputed estimate that the overlap of persons who might be inclined to patronize either theatre at any given time is in the neighborhood of twenty-five percent; that is, that this proportion of the patrons of one theatre might be drawn to a given performance of the other. This estimate is probably within the range of reason. It is reasonable also to suppose that an exceptional film at either theatre might drawn a far larger proportion of the patrons of the other. Certainly this would be true of an exceptional film showing at the Central.

If the present management agreement is terminated by this Court, the future of the City Theatre holds one of two possibilities. It may compete or it may close. Both theatres would be attempting to make a profit from the showing of motion pictures to an audience that might overlap to some degree. Each would attempt to get the best pictures it could afford and draw a larger percentage of the money being spent in Biddeford for amusement. Certainly with its present antiquated facilities City would labor under a substantial handicap and yield a gross income far below that yielded by Central. This discrepancy in gross income would inevitably tend to limit the effectiveness of City's bidding for the better pictures, both because of its lower purchasing power and because the distributors of pictures prefer to rent their better films to theatres showing the higher records of box office income.

A modernization of City's facilities might cost upwards of twenty-five thousand dollars. City would still have the permanent handicap of its second floor location. City is located in leased quarters, the lease having less than ten years yet to run. An investment in modernizing City might be forfeited in any event upon expiration of the lease; and it is possible that the lessor, being a city government, may have the power to terminate the lease at an earlier date, both possibilities rendering such an investment highly speculative.

The second possibility for the future of City must therefore be faced, namely, that it will be unable to make a profit and to survive at all under independent management. Its present thirty percent of the gross theatre income in Biddeford may be insufficient to keep it going. It will have difficulty in retaining a skilled manager, such persons preferring to associate themselves with newer theatres. These facts coupled with the risk of undertaking a modernization program, may well be enough to prevent any effective steps being taken to salvage the City Theatre. Thus it is entirely possible that dissolving the agreement may not in fact lead to competition, but may instead reduce to one the number of motion picture exhibitors in Biddeford, affording Biddeford actually less service than it has at present.

While this Court is in accord with the assertions made by the plaintiffs concerning Mr. Lausier's background, experience and ability, yet in the opinion of this Court it is problematical whether he would be qualified to manage the City Theatre independently. The objective facts in the case indicate that these personal considerations will be insufficient to overcome the real handicaps which will face the management of the City Theatre upon termination of the present agreement.

Relative Location of Theatres

Although this Court has attempted to point up the existing disparity in the physical properties of those two theatres, operating under a pooling agreement and single management, yet in deciding the question whether or not they would be "normally in competition" the important factor is in the opinion of this Court the relative location of the two theatres. It finds, as a matter of law, that two motion picture theatres, operating in close proximity to each other, in other words, within the same competitive area, are "normally in competition", within the meaning of the decree in the Paramount case, notwithstanding the wide disparity in the physical attributes of the theatres and in the type of moving pictures they offer. This Court finds that motion picture houses in a single business area, as are those in present case, are necessarily competing for the consumer's entertainment dollar. The fact that that product offered by one competitor is so poor that the competitor might not survive in the absence of a pooling agreement is not pertinent to the discussion. It has always been one of the elements of true competition that consumers may find the product of one competitor so lacking to their taste that they will turn elsewhere and force that competitor out of business.

The theatres of plaintiff and defendant being "normally in competition", it follows, and this Court declares, that the agreements here in issue are governed by the decree of the Expediting Court against Paramount Pictures, Inc., and must be terminated as hereinafter provided.

This Court rules that the parties hereto shall be allowed a period of two years from the date of the order filed pursuant to this opinion, to terminate the agreements here in issue; that these agreements shall be legally binding on the parties, and performance thereof shall not be deemed in violation of the decree of the Expediting Court for the Southern District of New York, during such two year period; and that the agreements shall be terminated, in any event, at the expiration of such two year period.

The case will be retained on the docket for determination by a master of the amounts due from each party to the other upon termination of the agreements in the event that the parties are unable to agree among themselves upon a settlement of their respective claims.

[¶ 62,504] United States v. Harry A. DuBroy, et al.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, Eastern Division. Civil No. 26537. Filed October 13, 1949.

Memorandum on motions to make definite and certain and to strike.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Motions To Make More Certain—Pleading Not Vague or Ambiguous—Responsive Pleading.—In a Government civil suit alleging conspiracy to fix prices on ninety items of hard building materials, motions made by material dealers to have the ninety items listed and for other particulars were denied. The allegations were held to be clear enough to permit responsive pleading; all that could be gained by the granting of the motions would be discovery of evidence, which, the Court declared, was not the purpose of Section 12 (e) of the Rules.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.341.

For the plaintiff: George L. Derr, Don C. Miller, U. S. Attorney, Cleveland, Ohio.

For the defendants: Ben C. Green, Cleveland, Ohio.

JONES, J.: This is an antitrust action against 15 individual and corporate defendants.

Nine of the defendants have filed answers but four of the defendants have filed motions to make certain paragraphs of the complaint more definite and certain and to strike other portions of the complaint. The motions will be treated as if but one motion had been made by all defendants.

The complaint in part alleges that the defendants conspired to fix prices on some ninety items of "hard building materials" in violation of the Sherman Act; that more than fifty percent of the "hard building materials" distributed by the defendants is manufactured outside of the state of Ohio; that the defendants distribute a "substantial part" of all the "hard building materials" used in the Cleveland area; and that the defendants first conspired "in or about the year 1944 and had continued to do so until the complaint was filed."

The motions ask that all of the ninety items be listed by the plaintiff; that the plaintiff disclose what the measure of fifty percent is, i.e., value, number or weight; that the plaintiff disclose the percentage of "hard building materials" distributed by the defendants; and that the exact dates of the conspiracy and the exact names of the defendants who first conspired be disclosed by the plaintiffs.

Section 12(e) of the Rules provides that a motion to make more definite may be granted if the pleading is so vague or ambiguous that a party cannot reasonably be required to form a responsive pleading.

The disposal of these motions therefore rests in the sound discretion of the Court. (La. Farmers Protective Union, Inc. v. Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company of America, Inc., 31 F. Supp. 483.) Previously there was a division of authority on whether Rule 12(e) could be used by a party to prepare for trial. Since the Rules have been amended it seems clear that 12(e) can be used only to enable the party to frame a responsive pleading. The complaint is sufficiently clear to enable the defendants to respond. The complaint, by definition, indicates clearly the nature of the "hard building materials" and there is reason to believe that the exact nature of the ninety items is known to the defendants. (See La. Farmers Protective Union, Inc. v. Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company of America, supra; Mitchell v. Brown, 6 F. R. S. 12(e)231, Case 4.) The other portions that defendants request be amplified seem to be conclusions of fact based on evidence known to the plaintiff. These conclusions are sufficiently clear as to allow a responsive pleading by the defendant. All that could be gained by the granting of the motions would be the discovery of evidence, and 12(e), since its amendment in 1948, is not to be used as a discovery mechanism. Chapter 5 of the Rules may and should be used to obtain all the information asked for by the defendants in these motions.

Motions have also been filed to strike various paragraphs of the complaint. Such motions are not regarded favorably, and the allegations objected to will not be struck unless there is no reason whatsoever for the inclusion of the allegations in the complaint and a failure to strike will be unduly prejudicial. (Steckel v. Beeghly, 8 F. R. D. 116, an opinion of this Court.) Perhaps some of the allegations to which objection is raised are somewhat redundant. However, all facts alleged are material to the issues of the action, and furthermore, defendant, The Goff-Kirby Company, has made no showing of prejudice whatsoever. This fact alone is sufficient ground for overruling the motion of this defendant. The same reasoning applies to the defendant, The Zone Coal & Supply Company's motion to strike paragraph 16 from the complaint.

Defendant, The Zone Coal and Supply Company, does allege prejudice in its motion to strike all references to the co-conspirators from the complaint. The contention is based on the fact that proof of the acts of the co-conspirators could not be admitted as evidence at trial. The law is to the contrary. Evidence of acts of the co-conspirators may be admitted (Boyd v. U. S., 29 F. 803). If such evidence is admissible, the allegations concerning the co-conspirators would seem relevant. Furthermore, such allegations not only are not prejudicial but are beneficial to the defendants in that they indicate some of the evidence to be presented by the plaintiff. This should help defendants to prepare for trial.

In the United States District Court for the County of Denver and State of Colorado. Civil Action No. A-66812. Division II. October 20, 1949.

Colorado Unfair Practices Act

No Intention To Destroy Competition—Injunction Dissolved.—An injunction to enjoin selling below cost was dissolved when it was held that the State failed to prove that a grocery chain operator intended to injure competitors and destroy competition.

See the Colorado Unfair Practices Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8088.

For the plaintiff: John W. Metzger, Attorney General by Sydney A. Johnson, Assistant Attorney General.

For the defendant: Ireland & Ireland of Denver, Colorado.

STEELE, District Judge: In my judgment the State has failed to prove a violation of the law by the defendant King Soopers, in that it failed to show that the defendant had the "purpose of injuring competitors and destroying competition," in selling the items alleged in the complaint at the prices therein stated.

For that reason the issues are found in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff. The restraining order or injunction heretofore issued by the court is dissolved.

A motion for a new trial would be overruled if filed, and the filing of it is dispensed with.

Plaintiff's exceptions are noted and thirty days allowed within which to prepare and tender a Reporter's Transcript and record on error.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. No. 48 C 1520. October 21, 1949.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Statute of Limitations—"Civil Proceedings" Interpreted—Treble Damage Action.—In deciding as to the right of a building corporation to sue a theatre concern for treble damages in regard to alleged antitrust violations occurring prior to 1941, it was held that the federal act which suspended the running of statutes of limitation applied to this, a private action, as well as to those brought by the Government. The words "civil proceedings" should not be restricted in their meaning when neither the statute nor its legislative history expressed any restriction.

See Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1 ¶ 1640.435. Law at ¶ 351.

For the plaintiff: Seymour F. Simon, Chicago, Illinois.

For the defendants: Jacob I. Grossman & Alfred R. Teton, Mattew & Springer, Seeley & Burnham, c/o Mayer, Meyer, Austrian & Platt, Edward R. Johnston, Samuel Block, for Paramount, et al., all of Chicago, Illinois.

Memorandum

LA BUY, District Judge: The complaint herein is brought pursuant to the treble damage section of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. A. section 15) and alleges that defendants during the period January 1, 1941 to May 1, 1945 and prior thereto entered into a conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws of the United States which conspiracy resulted in injury to plaintiff's business. The complaint was filed October 18, 1948 and is alleged to be based upon the complaint of the government in United States v. Paramount Pictures et al. (D. C. N. Y. 1946) 70 Fed. Supp. 53 aff'd in part and rev'd in part 334 U. S. 131.

Defendants plead affirmatively that the Illinois Revised Statute, Chapter 83, Section 16, bars any recovery sought for injuries suffered more than five years before October 18, 1948.

Plaintiff raises three points to substantiate its right to sue for injuries suffered in 1941 and 1942, but has withdrawn the first basis since its premise is applicable to criminal cases only wherein it is held that the statute does not run until the last act constituting the conspiracy is done. Momand v. Universal Film Exchange (D. C. Mass. 1942) 43 Fed. Supp. 996; and has also temporarily withdrawn its third contention that Section 16 of the antitrust laws suspends the statute of limitations in this action from July 30, 1938 when the United States filed suit for violation of the antitrust laws since this suit is based in whole or in part on matter complained of therein for the reason that such contention is premature and is dependent upon evidence to be heard by the court.

If the evidence in this action should not disclose that the suspension provided by Section 16 of the antitrust laws applies, the parties have requested the court to decide at this time whether Act of Congress, October 10, 1942, Ch. 589, 56 Stat. 781, as amended June 30, 1945, Ch. 213, 59 Stat. 306, 15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 16 note tolled the Illinois statute of limitations as to the plaintiff's rights.

It is a rule that where a statute is susceptible on its face of two constructions, the court may look into prior and contemporaneous acts, the reasons which induced the act in question, mischiefs intended to be remedied, and extraneous circumstances and purposes intended to be accomplished thereby, but where the statute is clear upon its face, and standing alone, is fairly susceptible of one construction, that construction must be given thereto, Jewell Ridge Coal Corp. v. Local No. 6167, United Mine Workers (D. C. Va.) 53 Fed. Supp. 935, cert. den. 322 U. S. 756, rev'd 145 F. (2d) 10, aff'd 325 U. S. 161.

The statute here in question reads as follows:

> "An Act to suspend until June 30, 1945 the running of the statute of limitations applicable to violations of the anti-trust laws. The running of any existing statute of limitations applicable to violations of the anti-trust laws of the United States, now indictable or subject to civil proceedings, under any existing statutes, shall be suspended until June 30, 1945 or until such earlier time as the Congress by concurrent resolution, or the President, may designate. This Act shall apply to acts, offenses, or transactions where the existing statute of limitations has not yet fully run, but it shall not apply to acts, offenses or transactions which are already barred by the provisions of existing laws."

The term which defendant's contend here has a restricted meaning is the term "subject to civil proceedings". Defendants urge that legislative history surrounding the passage of this act shows it was intended to apply only to government proceedings and not to private actions.

The antitrust law envisaged two classes of action: (1) those made available only to the government, which include criminal prosecutions and suits in equity, and (2) civil suits for treble damages to redress private injury. United States v. Cooper, (1941) 312 U. S. 600, 612. The term "proceeding" has been used in the antitrust laws in connection with any suit or proceeding brought by any other party than the government (Section 16, 15 U. S. C. A.) and has been used in referring to action by the government (Sections 4, 5, 6, 15 U. S. C. A.).

The term "proceeding" in common general usage means a prescribed course of action for enforcing legal rights and remedies according to the regular course of judicial procedure. Words & Phrases, Volume 34; Webster's International Dictionary.

In United States v. Cooper, supra, the interpretation of the word "person" as excluding the United States from bringing a treble damage suit was considered. Justice Roberts there said (605):

> "Decision is not to be reached by a strict construction of the words of the Act, nor by application of artificial canons of construction. On the contrary, we are to read the statutory language in its ordinary and natural sense, and if doubts remain, resolve them in the light, not only of the policy intended to be served by the enactment, but, as well, by all other available aids to construction. But it is not our function to engraft on a statute additions which we think the legislative body logically might or should have made."

See also Durkee Famous Foods v. Harrison (D. C. Ill.) 46 Fed. Supp. 642 aff'd in part and rev'd in part 136 F. (2d) 303, cert. den. 320 U. S. 782; Fleming v. A. H. Belo Corp., (D. C. Tex.) 36 Fed. Supp. 907 aff'd 121 F. (2d) 207, aff'd 316 U. S. 624; Jewell Ridge Coal Corp. v. Local No. 6167, supra.

There is no doubt in the instant case that the ordinary and natural sense of the words "civil proceedings" was to be used and there would be no need to look to the legislative history for aid in interpretation. However, Justice Roberts, after the guide above expressed, did consider the legislative history of the Sherman antitrust law and this court will do likewise as to this statute before the court. Defendants in their brief have referred to the reports of the Congressional committees and to letters from the Secretaries of War and Navy and the Attorney General which are directed to support its contention that the purpose of the suspension of the statutes of limitations was directed to criminal or civil prosecutions of the government as a part of the war effort. Though the legislative history presented may through implication be interpreted to accomplish the purpose the defendant urges, it does not disclose any comment or phrase by any of the legislators or proponents thereof which would lead to the inevitable and clear conclusion that its operative effect was to be so restricted. In such a situation, where the purpose and intent of the statute is not negatived or defeated by the ordinary and natural interpretations of the words used, it is presumed the legislators intended them to be interpreted in their usual and accepted sense.

There is no limitation expressed in the legislative history and the words "civil proceedings" should not be restricted in their meaning when neither the statute itself nor the legislative history expresses none. The court is of the opinion the Act of Congress of October 10, 1942 extends to private suits as well as to those brought by the government.

The court has also considered the objections of the defendant Balaban & Katz to interrogatories propounded by the plaintiff on the ground they are not relevant and are burdensome. These objections are overruled and time in which defendant is to answer should be agreed upon by the parties. An order not inconsistent herewith should be presented for entry to the court within ten days.

Ruling Upon Motion for Production of Documents, F. R. C. P., Rule 34 as Amended

McLaughlin, Judge: [Digest] There is now before the court for disposition in advance of trial upon the anti-trust cross-complaint, an amended motion under Rule 34 as amended (28 U. S. C. following § 723c).

The grant or denial in whole or in part of this motion rests in the court's judicial discretion.[1]

Under its cross-complaint describing a civil cause of action under the Sherman and Clayton Acts, Trans-Pacific invokes Rule 34 and calls upon Hawaiian and Inter-Island to produce for inspection, et cetera, a voluminous amount of material. Trans-Pacific's requests describe 19 different categories. Some of the requests relate back to 1929 and others post-date the cross-complaint by pertaining to 1948. Abbreviated, the requests are for originals or copies of all and any:

(a) Reports filed with the Civil Aeronautics Board from 1940 to Nov. 3, 1948, by Hawaiian.

(b) Same as to tariffs filed.

(c) Same as to agreements filed since Jan. 1, 1939.

(d) Same as to requests for approval of interlocking directorates since Jan. 1, 1939.

(e) Same as to requests for approval of stock control of Hawaiian by Inter-Island since Jan. 1, 1939.

(f) Annual corporate exhibits filed by both corporations with the Territory since 1939 (withdrawn in argument as since procured from Territorial Treasurer).

(g) Minutes and memoranda of meetings of directors and executive committee of both corporations since Jan. 30, 1929.

(h) and (i) Written communication by any means between the two corporations since Jan. 1, 1929, and up to Nov. 3, 1948.

(j) Contracts of carriage by either corporation from Jan. 1, 1939, to Nov. 3, 1948.

(k) The Apr. 21, 1947, contract between Hawaiian and The Farmers' Exchange, plus any and all similar contracts made by either corporation with others since Jan. 1, 1940, to Nov. 3, 1948 (allowed in part by consent).

(l) Data filed by Inter-Island with the Maritime Commission, including correspondence connected therewith, during the period Jan. 1, 1940, to Nov. 3, 1948.

(m) Written material including correspondence filed with or sent to the Civil Aeronautics Board in connection with Hawaiian's United States mail contract from Jan. 1, 1939, to Nov. 3, 1948.

(n) Written material, including correspondence, filed with or sent to the Civil Aeronautics Board by either corporation, during the period June 1, 1946, to Nov. 3, 1948, which in any way mention or concern Trans-Pacific or its officers, employees or stockholders, and including especially letters and other communications sent by or exchanged between Stanley Kennedy, president of Hawaiian, and any official, employee, member, or agent of the Civil Aeronautics Board from June 1, 1946, to Nov. 3, 1948.

(o) Written material possessed by either corporation with especial reference to contracts for the transportation of persons or property, relating or referring in any way to Trans-Pacific or any other air carrier in Hawaii from Jan. 1, 1939, to Nov. 3, 1948.

(p) Stenographic notes, with transcripts thereof, possessed by either corporation, made during or as a result of telephone conversations relating to or referring to Trans-Pacific or any air carrier competing with Hawaiian (presumably since Jan. 1, 1939).

(q) Written material relating to actual or contemplated press or radio releases referring or relating to competition between Hawaiian and Inter-Island and any other air carrier in Hawaii, or relating or referring to any plan to discontinue or diminish Inter-Island's ship passenger service; or referring or relating to any plan or program to effect any change in the holdings of stock in Hawaiian by Inter-Island; or pertaining to corporate re-organization or material change in the corporate structure or stock holdings in either Hawaiian or Inter-Island from Jan. 1, 1946, to Nov. 3, 1948.

(r) A list of the stockholders and stockholdings of said persons in either corporation as of May 1, 1947 and also as of Oct. 13, 1948.

(s) Documents possessed by either corporation concerning or relating to radio frequency channels, or to the performance of services connected with radio for any air carrier in Hawaii other than Hawaiian.

Hawaiian and Inter-Island assert that the motion is defective.

It is argued that while it is true that Rule 34 is susceptible of a use which is independent of Rules 26, 30 and 31, nevertheless as against the type of broad designation here presented under Rule 34 fairness should move the Court to deny the motion, because the movant can then by utilizing the other discovery rules find out exactly what it wants and move again under Rule 34 with a specific label on each requested document.

As illustrative of the point, reference is made to the fact that since this motion and as it is under advisement, Trans-Pacific is proceeding under Rule 30 to take the deposition of a person who is president of both Hawaiian and Inter-Island. Of this the Court is aware, for it has been called upon to order this deposition terminated or limited under Rule 30 (d). Hawaiian's and Inter-Island's Rule 30 (d) motion was orally denied after reading the transcript and listening to counsel's arguments. This transcript reveals, indeed, how a nice theory can be at odds with reality and give strength to the belief that the new rules are essentially practical.

The proper approach to a problem arising under any one of the deposition-discovery rules is set forth by the Supreme Court.[2] And contrary to view previously held, it is now recognized that although the deposition-discovery rules are integrated mechanisms, they are each susceptible of independent use.[3] It is not necessary to first take depositions before resorting to Rule 34. Rules 26, 30, 31 and 34 may be utilized independently, simultaneously, or progressively, so long as the requirements of the rule or rules invoked are met.

That being so—as Hawaiian and Inter-Island concede—there remains the question of whether Trans-Pacific has made a proper designation of the documents it wishes to inspect.

It is first said that Trans-Pacific's designation is defective in that it is too broad, as it should be sufficiently specific to enable the person ordered to produce to go to his files and say, "Here it is."[4] But as the District Court for the Southern District of New York itself now recognizes, the license to fish granted by Rule 34 is not to be so restricted.

That other courts have followed a broader interpretation of the function of Rule 34, which this court also now adopts, is reflected in the reports of decisions both before and after the amendment to this rule.[6]

A civil lawsuit, therefore, being no longer susceptible of being made a game if the rules are properly invoked; it being no longer necessary to try a lawsuit in the dark in the federal courts;[7] and with "mutual knowledge of all relevant facts * * * essential to proper litigation",[8] the application here of the principle of fairness does not impress me as requiring a holding that Trans-Pacific can invoke the rule only after it has first and perhaps futilely utilized other discovery devices. Indeed, if Trans-Pacific has met this Rule's requirements, the cited authorities would call for a conclusion of unfairness if having the right the court should hold it to be precluded from exercising it until it first proceeded otherwise. To be sure if the Rule 34's requirements are not met, the motion will be denied with the suggestion that perhaps the use of the other discovery mechanisms might provide a basis for a renewed second such motion.[9]

Here, then, the essential question is: Is Trans-Pacific's designation of categories, as distinguished from a designation of each specific document wanted for inspection, sufficient to fulfill the requirement of "designated" as that word is used in Rule 34 as amended?

In view of the nature of this cross-complaint spelling out as it does charges of violations of the Sherman and Clayton Acts, and with adherence to the views expressed by Judge Wyzanski on this subject[10] to the effect that the interests of justice will be best promoted by holding the word "designated" to be complied with by an indication of the category of documents sought, while to hold that each document requested must be specifically identified in the "Here it is" manner would only serve dilatory purposes or tend to frustrate the disclosure of all the facts necessary to a proper decision, I deem Trans-Pacific's motion to sufficiently comply with the word "designated" appearing in Rule 34. Consequently, the motion is granted.

The granted motion obviously approves the inspection of documents long pre-dating Trans-Pacific's entry into the business of air transportation, and also post-dating the date of the cross-complaint. The former is allowed in view of the nature of the cross-complaint[11] while the latter is allowed upon

In the United States District Court for the District of Hawaii. Civil No. 817. June 7, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Scope of Antitrust Acts—Jurisdiction of Courts and Administrative Agencies.—Where a cross-complaint had been brought by one airline against a steamship company and its subsidiary airline charging a combination of the two carrier services to monopolize traffic in the islands, and use of certain unfair and discriminatory practices to implement the charged monopoly, a motion to dismiss on grounds that the matter called for the expert determination of the Civil Aeronautics Board and the Maritime Commission was denied, for the reason that the extent of relief obtainable before those agencies was not as wide as that allowed under the antitrust laws, and would not therefore permit a full finding upon the wrongs complained of, and for the further reason that the whole alleged course of conduct of the defendants stated a cause of action under antitrust laws, although the component wrongs charged might individually be more properly cognizable by the agencies.

Ruling Upon Motion to Dismiss, F. R. C. P. Rule 12 (b) (6)

Opinion of McLaughlin, Judge:

[Nature of Action]

[Digest] To the petition of Hawaiian Airlines, Limited, for an injunction under § 1007 of the Civil Aeronautics Act (49 U. S. C. § 647) against the scheduled air carrier operations of the non-certificated but registered irregular air carrier defendant, Trans-Pacific Airlines, Ltd., filed a cross-complaint against Hawaiian and its parent corporation, Inter-Island Steam Navigation Company, Limited, under the Sherman and Clayton Acts. Though later amended, it will here be denominated as the cross-complaint.

Pursuant to Rule 42 (b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (28 U. S. C. foll. § 723 (c)), the anti-trust cross-complaint was severed from the original complaint for trial purposes. See 73 F. Supp. 68 (U. S. D. C. Hawaii 1947).

To the cross-complaint the defendants, Hawaiian and Inter-Island, have filed under Rule 12 (b) (6) a motion to dismiss, supported by an undenied affidavit, upon the sole ground that the matter complained of by Trans-Pacific is primarily within the jurisdiction of the Maritime Commission and the Civil Aeronautics Board. In this position the motion under Rule 12 (b) (6) becomes one for summary judgment under Rule 56.

Leave was granted to the Civil Aeronautics Board to appear in the cross-complaint case through the United States Attorney as a friend of the Court. Upon the motion extensive argument was had, and briefs were filed by the parties and also by the Civil Aeronautics Board.

[Complaint]

The matter complained of by Trans-Pacific upon the basis of §§ 1, 2 and 3 of the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2 and 3) and §§ 3, 7 and 8 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. §§ 14, 18 and 19) and the prayer for triple damages (15 U. S. C. § 15) and for an injunction (15 U. S. C. § 26) directing, amongst other things, the divestiture by Inter-Island of its stock control of Hawaiian, is that:

1. Operating over substantially parallel routes and rendering competing services, the control of the certificated air carrier, Hawaiian, by the water carrier, Inter-Island, constitutes a combination in restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Act, which was illegally conceived in violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act.

2. The Inter-Island—Hawaiian combination has become a monopoly or is conspiring to attain that status.

3. Inter-Island's and Hawaiian's interlocking directorates constitute a violation of § 8 of the Clayton Act.

4. Pursuant to an unlawful combination and conspiracy to restrain trade, attempt to monopolize, and its unlawful monopolization of the air and water transportation of passengers and property between the islands of the Territory, Inter-Island and Hawaiian have, in violation of the Sherman and Clayton Acts:

(a) Decreased and planned to discontinue passenger service by Inter-Island so as to force passengers to its controlled air carrier, Hawaiian, the only certificated regular air carrier in the Territory;

(b) Coerced shippers of air freight to use Hawaiian rather than registered irregular air carriers upon the threat of discriminating against their water freight when they sought to ship by Inter-Island;

(c) Jointly conducted all-expense tours, additionally violating § 412 of the Civil Aeronautics Act;

(d) Engaged in predatory air freight rate cutting to drive competing irregular air freight carriers out of business;

(e) Contracted, in furtherance of the conspiracy, with the Farmers Exchange, a cooperative, whereby the Exchange has bound itself not to use the facilities of any other air carrier to transport its produce; and

(f) In consonance with the object of its conspiracy, sought and obtained with unclean hands an injunction against Trans-Pacific as a means of furthering Inter-Island's and Hawaiian's monopoly (Hawaiian v. Trans-Pacific Airlines, supra).

From this alleged unlawful combination and conspiracy, and the steps taken by the defendants in furtherance thereof, Trans-Pacific claims accrued damage in the amount of $336,000 to September 9, 1947, the date of the preliminary injunction in the air carrier part of the case, and at the rate of $1,000 per day since that time.

There is no dispute concerning the doctrine of primary jurisdiction, which stems from Texas & Pac. Ry. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co., 204 U. S. 426 (1907), and developed in such succeeding cases as Keogh v. Chicago & Northwestern Ry. Co., 260 U. S. 156 (1922); United States Navigation Co. v. Cunard S. S. Co., 284 U. S. 474 (1932); Central Transfer Co. v. Terminal R. R., 288 U. S. 469 (1933); Terminal Warehouse v. Penn. R. R., 297 U. S. 500 (1936); and Georgia v. Penn. R. R., 324 U. S. 439 (1945). Rather the sole question raised by the motion relates to the applicability of that doctrine to the cross-complaint under consideration.

[Jurisdictional Question]

The defendants argued that each specified act alleged to have been done in furtherance of the claimed unlawful combination and conspiracy, etc., raises questions the determination of which calls for the expert competence and specialized administrative discretion of the appropriate regulatory body created by Congress to handle, in the first instance, such technical matters. Therefore, it is submitted, each of these acts is within either the jurisdiction of the Maritime Commission or the Civil Aeronautics Board, and at least until Trans-Pacific has exhausted the administrative remedies, this Court lacks jurisdiction to consider its complaint filed under the anti-trust laws. Indeed, it is submitted that available administrative remedies are exclusive, and the Court is wholly without jurisdiction.

It is conceded that perhaps the Maritime Commission would not have jurisdiction of a combination or conspiracy by or between these defendants since Hawaiian is not a carrier subject to the Shipping Act (46 U. S. C. § 814), but that clearly the Civil Aeronautics Board would have jurisdiction, for that Act covers such dealings by an air carrier with any other air carrier or other carrier (49 U. S. C. § 492 (a)).

At all events, referring upon this theory to its affidavit, the defendants say there really is nothing charged that has not already been approved by the Civil Aeronautics Board anyway, and hence the Court need not be concerned—as it is—over the apparent exemption of carriers regulated by different agencies from the anti-trust laws. With power in the Board to grant in the public interest exemption from such laws (49 U. S. C. § 494), Hawaiian represents that it has complied with all provisions of the Act and hence the Board knows all, and if Hawaiian be at fault the Board's duty under the Act would require it to move to correct the situation. Concretely it says it has filed all working agreements with the Board which either have been approved or not disapproved; data regarding all-expense tours similarly have been filed and treated by the Board; the Board has—as the Board in its brief admits—approved of Hawaiian's interlocking directorates as being not inconsistent with the public interest. Concerning the stock control of Hawaiaan by Inter-Island, defendants assert that if such be not in the public interest, despite the fact that § 408 of the Act (49 U. S. C. § 488) is prospective in operation and the immunity of § 414 (49 U. S. C. § 494) thus unavailable, nevertheless the Civil Aeronautics Board applies as a matter of policy the standards of § 408 to situations wherein stock control of a carrier by another carrier was acquired prior to the passage of the Act. Thus the Civil Aeronautics Board could suspend Hawaiian's certificate pursuant to § 401 (h) of the Act (49 U. S. C. § 481 (h)) until and unless Hawaiian's parent corporation sold enough stock in the air carrier to remove its control. That being so, by way of argument at least, it is said, therefore, this factor is also within the primary jurisdiction of the Board. Overall, too, it is stated that though Trans-Pacific complains about a monoply it fails to understand that the Board has granted a limited monopoly to Hawaiian by failing to date to certify other air carriers in Hawaii, and such in the Board's discretion must be deemed to have been found by it to be in the public interest.

Trans-Pacific's counter argument is that defendants refuse to recognize that this is an anti-trust case, the essence of the alleged grievance being the affirmative charge that the defendants here unlawfully combined and conspired, attempted to monopolize, and have monopolized transportation commerce between the islands of the Territory. Closing their eyes to this charge, Trans-Pacific accuses defendants of dismembering the charge by considering only the specific acts which have been alleged to illustrate the basic charge. United States v. Patten, 226 U. S. 525, 544 (1913); American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 147 F. 2d 93, 106 (CCA-6, 1944), aff'd 328 U. S. 781 (1946).

[Decision]

I do not believe this to be a case to which the rule of primary jurisdiction is applicable. The motion will accordingly be denied.

Having reviewed the arguments of the parties and the analysis of the problem provided by the Civil Aeronautics Board, the problem and principles involved are fully exposed. It will, therefore, suffice to state the reasons for the conclusion which has been reached.

In the first place, to concentrate upon the specific acts and actions attributed to the defendants by the allegations of Trans-Pacific—as do the defendants—is to obtain a distorted conception of the fundamental charge of the cross-complaint.

Further, if to do so were the proper approach, as dissected it by no means follows from the facts at hand that the rule of primary jurisdiction is applicable. Aside from the interlocking directorates alleged to be violative of the Civil Aeronautics Act—which in and of itself is not by reason of Board approval thereof—no one of the other particular acts are charged by Trans-Pacific to be violations of either the Shipping Act or the Civil Aeronuautics Act. Rather they are labeled as violative of the anti-trust laws. Yet, granting that labels do not alter the nature of the acts, even if each one be violative of either one or the other of the two regulatory acts—though it be questionable that other than rate cutting and the all-expense tour plans might be—it still is far from clear that this would be a situation to which the primary jurisdiction doctrine should be applied because:

1. Trans-Pacific does not charge that it has been injured by these acts in such a way as to give it standing as a complainant before either agency. That is, there appears in and of itself to be nothing wrong in a water carrier going out of the passenger business; Trans-Pacific has not been a threatened shipper; the joint tour plan as such is not set out as being discriminatory; it does not charge the cut freight rates as such to be unreasonable; contract rates are not regulated rates; and of course the matter of the preliminary injunction has no relation to any provision of either act.

2. But whether any of the specific acts be violative of either act—and such seems most probable under only the Civil Aeronautics Act—neither agency is empowered to grant the type of relief prayed for. Neither agency is equipped to award damages, and the questions raised by the specifics are not ones raising questions of fact calling for uniformity of decision nor the application of expert knowledge of a particular industry.

3. Neither the Commission nor the Board has power to handle both defendants. This is of more significance as to the Board—for the Commission appears almost totally ineffective in these circumstances—for the power reposes with Inter-Island which the Board cannot either legally or practically reach by an order. It is in this particular that the Cunard case is distinguishable. There not only was the gist of the complaint rate discrimination, but all of the parties were amenable to the Maritime Commission, and it had power to see to it that its orders were obeyed. Here if the Commission and the Board had power to sit together and to take joint action if warranted against these defendants, then the rule strenuously urged upon this motion would have sensible application.

But debatable as all this may be, I deem it needlessly confusing and a distraction to a proper interpretation of the broad charge of the cross-complaint.

Against the motion, of course, the cross-complaint must be given its best construction. Thus viewed, as I read the document, Trans-Pacific fundamentally and essentially charges the defendants with having unlawfully combined, conspired, attempted to monopolize, and with unlawfully having monopolized the transportation commerce between the islands of the Territory. Upon this charge Trans-Pacific elaborates by describing acts and actions of defendants performed or taken in furtherance of the alleged unlawful purpose.

Of necessity Trans-Pacific of course must be deemed to understand the fact that Hawaiian, as a certificated carrier, has a limited monopoly of regular air transportation in the Territory by reason of being to date the only certificated air carrier in Hawaii. Trans-Pacific's principal charge it seems to me must be taken to mean, as the Board suggests, that the defendants have used their position of dominance and power even if legally acquired in a manner violative of the anti-trust laws and have suppressed free competition from such sources as Trans-Pacific to which the Board gave the right to compete in a narrow area as an irregular air carrier.

Such being the essence of the cross-complaint, upon the strength of the Georgia case, I am not at all convinced that either the Board or the Commission has authority from Congress to deal with such a charge.

Traditionally and by command of the anti-trust statutes jurisdiction of such a charge rests with the courts. I see nothing in either the Shipping Act or the Civil Aeronautics Act which alters this view. See Georgia case at p. 456 et seq.

Yet though it be said that powers granted by the Shipping Act and the Civil Aeronautics Act be broader than those granted the Interstate Commerce Commission and consequently the Georgia case is not controlling—questionable as this assumption be —I still do not deem this to be factually the type of case to which the primary juristion rule has feasible application because:

1. The Commission is wholly lacking in effective power, for Hawaiian is not a person subject to the Shipping Act.

2. The Board, too, is not equipped with adequate power to handle the problem as

(a) Inter-Island acquired control of Hawaiian prior to the Civil Aeronautics Act and § 408 thereof is not retroactive;

(b) A charge of monopoly encompasses more than unfair methods of competition, so § 411 of the Civil Aeronautics Act is not large enough to handle the charge. And further, the Board could not order Inter-Island to dispose of its control of Hawaiian as it legally acquired it. The Board could not even reach Inter-Island. To say as defendants do that it could threaten Hawaiian with suspension of its certificate unless Inter-Island did what the Board might say should be done, does not impress me as either plausible or practical. Agencies no more than courts waste their efforts on useless orders. If the threat should be executed its lawfulness would be litigated while the public stood stranded.

(c) Under §§ 7 and 11 of the Clayton Act, the Board by virtue of § 1107 (g) of its Act could as a matter of power reach Inter-Island and if need be order it to divest itself of control of Hawaiian. But Trans-Pacific's complaint does not rest solely upon § 7 of the Clayton Act. And in terms of § 7, Inter-Island did not "acquire" control of an existing carrier. It created Hawaiian as its subsidiary, whereas with the sanction of the third paragraph of § 7 Inter-Island could well have engaged in 1929 and later in air transportation under its own name. So it is reasonable to suppose that forming Hawaiian did not substantially lessen competition, as indeed prior to Hawaiian's entering the air transportation field in the Territory there was no competition to suppress.

So it is for the reasons indicated, and with considerable reliance upon the Georgia case, that the motion to dismiss because of the doctrine of primary jurisdiction is denied.

Let it be understood, however, that the Court reserves the right to refer to the appropriate administrative agency questions involving rates, all-expense tour agreements or any other specific if it develops later to be advisable.

Settle order upon notice.

In the District Court of Garfield County, Oklahoma. No. 24,580. Oct. 24, 1949.

Oklahoma Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade Agreements—Temporary Injunction—Non-contracting Parties.—Where application was made for a temporary injunction to prohibit the sale of certain items at retail prices less than those allegedly fixed by fair trade agreements, a demurrer to such application, based on the grounds that the defendant retailer had not entered any fair trade agreement with the plaintiff, was overruled.

Fair Trade Prices—Injunctions—Arbitrary and Unreasonable Price.—Where it was found that defendant had sold only one item below established fair trade retail prices, and that the established fair trade price on that item was arbitrary and unreasonable since it allowed a profit of about 375 per cent, the court refused to issue an injunction which would require sales to be made at that unreasonable price.

Procedure—Stipulations as to Probable Evidence—Disposition on Merits based on Motion Arguments.—When parties to the suit stipulated that evidence which would be produced at a hearing on the merits would be the same as that produced at the hearing upon application for a temporary injunction, the court proceeded to consider that same evidence for the purpose of also denying a petition for permanent injunction.

Journal Entry of Judgment

[Nature of Action]

WYBRANT, Judge: And now, on this the 3rd day of October, 1949, the above entitled matter comes on for hearing before the Honorable O. C. WYBRANT, Judge of the District Court, on the application of the Plaintiff for a temporary injunction against the defendant, and the plaintiff appears by and through its agents and representatives and also by its attorneys of record, Simons, Simons, Mitchell & Headrick and Cecil E. Munn, and the Defendant appears in person and by and through his attorney of record, Lou E. Roseboom.

Thereupon, the Plaintiff introduces its evidence in support of its application for a temporary injunction and rests its case and, thereupon, the Defendant demurs to the evidence introduced by and on behalf of the Plaintiff on the ground that it fails to support a cause of action against the Defendant and because it is not shown by the evidence that the Defendant ever entered into a contract with the Plaintiff and said demurrer is by the Court overruled and the Defendant allowed exceptions to said ruling.

Thereupon, the Defendant introduces his evidence and rests his case.

Thereupon, the Plaintiff introduces its rebuttal evidence and rests its case and the Defendant renews his demurrer to the Plaintiff's evidence, which is overruled and exceptions allowed.

Thereupon, the cause is argued orally by counsel for the Plaintiff and counsel for the Defendant and at the conclusion of argument by counsel, the Court, having fully considered the matter and being fully advised in the premises, finds as follows, to-wit:

[Findings]

1. That the Defendant has not violated the prescribed retail prices established under the evidence on any of the articles enumerated in Plaintiff's Exhibit 16 except Sheik Prophylactic Rubbers No. 25, which the evidence discloses were sold on three (3) occasions for $1.00 per dozen.

2. That the sale of the item referred to as Sheik No. 25 below the established Fair Trade Price, should not be enjoined by this Court for the reason that the evidence discloses that the Fair Trade price of such item provides for an arbitrary and unreasonable margin of profit to the retail dealer, being a profit of about 375%, and the Court further finds from the evidence that the Fair Trade price of said item fixed by the producer is arbitrary and capricious.

IT IS, THEREFORE, BY THE COURT, CONSIDERED, ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED that the temporary injunction sought herein by the Plaintiff be and it hereby is denied in all respects and the Plaintiff be and it hereby is ordered to pay the costs of this action.

[Disposition of Merits]

Thereupon, it is stipulated by and between the Plaintiff and Defendant that the evidence introduced on behalf of both parties on the hearing on Plaintiff's application for a temporary injunction in this cause, is identical with all the evidence which would be introduced by the parties on the trial of this action on its merits, and it is stipulated by and between the parties that all of said evidence, having been introduced and a record of same made, that upon said record the Court may proceed to enter judgment upon the merits of this cause, which stipulation and agreement of the parties is approved by the Court and the Court finds that it is authorized to consider and pass upon the merits of this cause at this time, including Plaintiff's prayer for a permanent injunction, and the Court finds that the Plaintiff's petition for a permanent injunction should be denied on the same grounds as heretofore stated in denying Plaintiff's application for a temporary injunction.

IT IS, THEREFORE, BY THE COURT, CONSIDERED, ORDERED AND ADJUDGED AND DECREED that the permanent injunction sought by the Plaintiff herein be and it hereby is in all respects denied, to which findings, orders and judgments the Plaintiff excepted and excepts.

And now, on this 20th day of October, 1949, this cause comes on for hearing upon Plaintiff's motion for a new trial, both parties being present by their respective counsel, and the motion is presented to the Court and the Court finds that said motion should be overruled.

IT IS, THEREFORE, BY THE COURT, CONSIDERED, ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED that Plaintiff's motion for a new trial be and it hereby is overruled, to which overruling and finding of the Court the Plaintiff excepts.

Thereupon, the Plaintiff gives notice in open Court of its intention to appeal from the judgment of this Court to the Supreme Court of the State of Oklahoma and the Clerk of this Court is directed to note such notice of appeal on the records of his office.

Thereupon, the Plaintiff requests and is given and allowed an extension of time of Sixty (60) days from the 21st day of October, 1949, within which time to make and serve a casemade, Ten (10) days thereafter for the suggestion of amendments, said casemade to be settled and signed in Five (5) days' notice in writing by either party.

In the District Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey. Civil No. 8586. October 28, 1949.

Opinion on Cross Motions for Summary Judgment.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Price Fixing—Patent Licenses—Patent Holding Company.—Price fixing, under the patent monopoly, when such price fixing is not the individual act of the original corporate owner of the patent, but rather the act of a patent holding company to which several such corporate patent owners have delegated authority to issue licenses, is found to be illegal when the incorporators of the holding company have a combined strength sufficient to dominate the industry.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1270.201.

Patent Pools—Infringement Suits—Monopoly Power.—The pooling of patents, although sometimes allowable when resulting from the contractual settlement of patent claims in lieu of litigation, is held to violate the Sherman Act when the pooling is achieved through the creation of a patent holding company organized by three radio condenser manufacturers controlling more than fifty per cent of the industry and in a position to exert a monopolistic influence thereon.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1210.315, 1270.201.

Covenants Not to Compete—Monopoly Power—Agreement Restricting Sale of Special Tools.—The agreement of one of the important radio condenser manufacturers not to compete with the others for ten years, his agreement further that the tools used by him will not be sold in the open market, and an agreement between the two other contracting parties limiting the disposition of the tools and providing for their storage in escrow, constitute suppression of competition and, when done by parties capable of controlling the industry, are illegal.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1210.401, 1220.151.

For the plaintiff: Marcus A. Hollabaugh, C. Brooke Armat and George L. Derr, Special Attorneys, Department of Justice, and Alfred E. Modarelli, United States Attorney.

For the defendants: Milton, McNulty & Augelli, by John A. Milton, for General Instrument Corporation, Abraham Blumenkrantz, Samuel Cohen and Condenser Development Corporation; Elmer G. Van Name, for Radio Condenser Company, Stanley S. Cramer and Russell E. Cramer; Charles Handler, for Variable Condenser Corporation, Charles H. Hyman, Edward Hyman and Nathan Hyman.

The Facts

FORMAN, Judge: [Digest] From the undisputed documents and evidence offered by the plaintiff and such admissible evidence as may be gleaned from the defendants' proofs before the court on these motions, the facts in this case appear to be as follows:

Prior to 1934 General Instrument Corporation and Radio Condenser Company were the two largest manufacturers of variable condensers, controlling between themselves a percentage in excess of 50 percent of the total production within the United States. Pursuant to a scheme proposed by Mr. Maxwell James, general counsel and director of General, negotiations were had culminating in the formation, on July 30, 1934, of a patent holding corporation, Condenser Development Corporation, hereinafter referred to as "Development", the parties to the agreement being General, Radio and Amsco. All present and future patents and patent rights were assigned to Development, and Development was to defend infringement suits brought against any of the parties, and further to institute infringement suits to protect its pooled patents.

Later in that same year, an infringement suit was brought by Development against Federal and also against several distributors of Reliance, two non-member manufacturers of condensers. Both suits were settled, one before trial and the other at the appeal level, when Federal and Reliance accepted licenses from Development. Under the Reliance agreement, customers were divided into three classes, with different prices for each class. A penalty for violating the fixed price agreement was to be distributed to Reliance and the three parties under Development, in proportion to their respective gross business. As a further part of the agreement, an administrator was provided for the industry, to whom was given the duty of supervising and deciding upon specifications of standard condensers, and prices and terms of sale proposed by the manufacturers.

In 1937, Variable, a newcomer to the industry, located two Wilhelm patents, and notified Development, which had just instituted infringement suit against one of Variable's distributors, that it believed that by manufacturing under them it could avoid infringing the Cramer patents which were the basis of Development's suit. After some investigation of the Wilhelm patents and negotiations with their exclusive licensee, Development obtained all rights in the patents on January 7, 1938. Variable, on February 4, 1938, acceded and took a license which contained essentially identical provisions as those in the Reliance license.

In 1939, when Amsco agreed to withdraw from the industry in the United States and Canada for a period of ten years, it was agreed, in order to secure Radio and General against the liberation of Amsco's tools in a market competitive with their own, that Amsco's tools usable in variable condenser manufacture would be held in storage under control of General and Radio. Shortly thereafter, in August, 1939, Radio organized a new corporation, Manufacturer's Supply, which purchased nearly all the Amsco tools and proceeded to utilize them for a time in factory space rented from Amsco.

Formal price fixing was abandoned following the decision, on December 18, 1939, of Condenser Development Corporation v. Davega-City Radio, Inc., 108 F. 2d 174. On March 6, 1940, Radio cancelled the authority of Development to fix its prices. In April, Development notified others of its licensees that the price-fixing clauses in their licenses were cancelled. Thereafter differences in the prices of products sold to the same customers by Radio and General widened appreciably.

Following the expiration of the 1939 agreement in 1944, no formal action was taken until March 1, 1946, when Radio, General and Development signed an agreement providing for the assignment to Development of so-called Class B patents, and providing for meetings to be called for the purpose of discussing new patents obtained by the manufacturing members, and desirable patents obtainable from other patentees. Both manufacturers bound themselves not to acquire any non-exclusive licenses without first giving the other an opportunity to join in the licensing, and each agreed to purchase or obtain no patent without previous discussion with the other as to whether the patent should not be rather acquired by Development.

Conclusions

All of the parties having moved for summary judgments and there being no genuine issues as to the material facts heretofore set forth, after hearing the arguments of the parties the court is constrained to the following conclusions.

From the initial 1934 agreement General and Radio controlled well over 50% of the radio condenser industry in the country and dominated the industry. Although they contended that the primary purpose of their agreements was to resolve patent litigation, the course of conduct followed by them demonstrates that it was to insulate their patents from outside and inside attacks in order that they might continue a dominating position in the variable condenser industry to their mutual advantage and to the restraint of trade in interstate commerce. They admitted that they agreed that where there was a joint interest, the pool would defend an infringement suit brought against either of the pooling parties but contended that there was nothing inherently wrong in a joint defense against infringement suits brought by others. Similarly they argued that the very purpose of settling patent disputes would have been defeated if a party could thereafter turn about and purchase a patent of someone else and use it as a threat of litigation against the other pooling parties and therefore a necessary incident to the purpose of the pooling arrangement was to place patents purchased from others in the same category as patents developed and owned by the respective parties. But their subsequent conduct demonstrates that there was an additional purpose guiding the Development parties and which brought about conditions deleterious to competition.

The effect of the creation of Development as a device whereby the patents of General and Radio together with Amsco could be lodged in a pool was to tighten the clamp of domination upon the industry, for by virtue of their agreements, General and Radio created in Development a device designed to stretch the monopoly of their respective individual patents to a monopoly of patents not normally available to them.

The defense asserted for them that all of this constituted a legal patent pool within the contemplation of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court is untenable. It is true, as they assert, that in the case of Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 283 U. S. 163, certain patent pooling was countenanced and that the court in that case specifically held that legitimately conflicting patent claims or threatened patent interferences could be settled by contract rather than litigation without violating the Sherman Act.

In Standard Oil Co. v. United States, supra, the Court held that there was shown no monopoly, no unreasonable restriction of cempetition, no proof that the defendants could by reason of their contracts fix the market price, and that only about 26% of the total production of the industry involved was affected.

In explaining the Standard Oil case in U. S. v. Line Material Co., 333 U. S. 287, 313, the Supreme Court stated that:

> "Even in Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 283 U. S. 163, where an arrangement by which the patentees pooled their oil cracking patents and divided among themselves royalties from licensees fixed by the pooling contracts was upheld, the theory was reiterated that a price limitation for the product was unlawful per se. Pp. 170, 173, 175. Of course, if a purpose or plan to monopolize or restrain trade is found, the arrangement is unlawful. P. 174. The Government's contention in that case that the limitation on royalties in itself violated the Sherman Act by fixing an element in the price was dismissed because the Court was of the view that controlled royalties were effective as price regulators only when the patentees dominated the industry. P. 174. This domination was thought by this Court not to have been proven."

In this case General and Radio control more than 50% of the industry. After Amsco joined with them in the agreement of 1934, in quick succession they subjected Federal, Reliance, and Variable to litigation terminated by licenses, denied Rae a license, leaving American as the only unconquered competitor. It preserved its independence by resisting Development's suit and in 1939 inflicted the first major defeat upon the defendants when it emerged successful in the suit of Condenser Development Corp. v. Davega-City Radio, Inc., supra, in which one of the so-called basic patents was declared invalid.

Note has been taken of the seemingly plausible recitals by the defendants that their patents at times were held valid and infringed by trial courts and that their adjustment of their patent differences, at least in one case, was given informal court commendation. However, these were but individual incidents in the economic road traveled by the defendants toward their objective of domination of their industry and pale in significance when their activities are viewed in their entire and total aspect. American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781, 809; U. S. v. Griffith, 334 U. S. 100, 105-106.

Direct price fixing was abandoned as such as of April 1940 when the notices were sent out to all parties in interest. The defendants submitted that this was pursuant to the decision in Condenser Development Corp. v. Davega-City Radio, Inc., 108 F. 2d 174, rendered by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals on December 18, 1939, in which Cramer Patent No. 1,800,719 was declared invalid. However, concomitantly with this litigation and during the spring and summer of 1939, the Development parties conducted a self-study of the structure of their agreements vis-a-vis the anti-trust laws. They applied to counsel for an opinion as to the legality of their position. Heretofore there has been set out in full or in resume the correspondence of the parties and their counsel in this regard. It is plainly apparent therefrom that the parties suspected that they might be acting outside the law. The opinions of counsel hardened these suspicions into something more than conjecture. The course was laid out to be followed in the future. It is obvious that this was designed to accomplish the same objectives sought by their previous agreements and arrangements under a new, and if possible, legal form. The mere fact that the Development parties intended to accomplish a result by legal methods and claimed good intentions is not germane where infractions of the antitrust laws are involved.

That a specific intent is lacking to restrain trade or to establish a monopoly will not form a defense against an antitrust complaint for > "It is sufficient that a restraint of trade or monopoly results as a consequence of a defendant's conduct or business arrangements." U. S. v. Griffith, 334 U. S. 100, 105.

The characterizations placed upon their conduct by the defendants or expressions of motive in their isolated arrangements avail nothing in the tooth of the sum total of their acts, for as was stated in the case of American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781

> "Acts done to give effect to the conspiracy may be in themselves wholly innocent acts. Yet, if they are part of the sum of the acts which are relied upon to effectuate the conspiracy which the statute forbids, they come within its prohibition." 328 U. S. at p. 809.

The Development parties contend that their price fixing arrangements prior to 1940 were legitimately based upon patents in compliance with the decision in U. S. v. General Electric Co., et al., 272 U. S. 476. But the price fixing was not the individual act of the original corporate owner of the patent but of Development to whom the incorporating parties had delegated authority to license to their mutual advantage when the combination of strength was sufficient to dominate the industry.

In the case of United States v. Line Material Co., supra, competitors held interdependent patents and neither could be commercially exploited without the use of the other. In the light of this condition, one competitor granted a license to the other with a provision permitting licensing to manufacturers provided the equipment manufactured under the patents involved conformed to the price structure fixed by the patent owner. The same agreement was made by the other competitor. Thereafter, the holder of the minor patent issued a number of licenses to manufacturers containing sales limitations. Upon these facts the trial court held the arrangement not to be violative of the Sherman Act on the authority of the General Electric case. However, the United States Supreme Court reversed and held that the combination of different patentees for the purpose of fixing the sales price was unlawful under the Sherman Act and that others who subsequently entered into license arrangements containing price fixing provisions with knowledge of the contracts are equally subject to the prohibitions of the antitrust laws.

The Line Material case is immediately applicable, therefore, to the arrangement followed by the Development parties from 1934 to 1940. The only distinguishing feature is the fact that Development rather than one of the patent owners was the licensor by virtue of the assignment to it of the patents held by General and Radio but this feature is a mere matter of form and does not alter the substance of the arrangement.

There can be no question but what the agreement of August 7, 1934 with its creation of Development as the alter ego of the other contracting parties and its modifications of May 19, 1937 and June 9, 1939 with the deliberate price fixing arrangements arising therefrom are prima facie proof of a conspiracy to restrain competition in the variable condenser industry. Schine Thea- tres v. U. S., 334 U. S. 110, 116, 117, 119; United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 333 U. S. 364, 388-389; United States v. Line Material Co., 333 U. S. 287, 314-315.

Commencing in the fall of 1940, the economy of the United States was geared to a concerted war effort and from 1942 to 1945 there was no civilian production as was admitted by the defendants in their brief. Priority and price controls rendered unnecessary any form of price stabilization by private contract and it was not until 1946, when the parties were free of controls, that the necessity for private agreement again arose. However, in 1944, the Department of Justice commenced an investigation of the activities of the defendants. Forewarned that their conduct was the subject of investigation, it was but natural for General and Radio, upon resumption of their relationships, to avoid a semblance of price fixing.

It would appear, at first blush, that the agreement of April 1939, in which Amsco sold its stock in Development, assigned its eleven patents and relinquished its license under all the patents for the sum of $50,000 paid by General and Radio in which was incorporated Amsco's covenant not to compete with them in the manufacture of variable condensers for a period of ten years and in which restrictions were placed upon Amsco's sale of its tools in the United States, was reasonable to protect the interest of the purchasers as they have argued. They likewise contended that the said agreement, when construed with the subsequent agreement of June 10, 1939 between General and Radio in which permission was granted General to purchase tools of Amsco and a similar permission accorded Radio by General provided either of them upon such purchase in turn restricted any sale of such tools, comprised, so to speak, a "part of the res gestae and should be considered as one transaction". This was true, but not in the sense implied by the defendants. Had this agreement of sale been effected between two independent parties perhaps the covenant and restrictions would have been valid, as argued by the defendants. But here two competitors, combined through the device of a patent holding corporation, jointly bargained for the advantages of the restrictive covenants from the outgoing Amsco and then proceeded to agree to restrict each other. The argument advanced by them presumed lawful initial arrangement as to tools in the agreement of April 28, 1939 and in the later agreement between the defendants of June 10, 1939. This is not tenable so far as the tools of Amsco were concerned. These contracts were but naked agreements between competitors designed to restrict the tools and equipment from falling into the open market. The fact that the tools came ultimately into the use of Radio, or its subsidiary, Manufacturer, in large part, does not validate the intentions or the expressed agreements of the parties as plainly enunciated in their contracts. The cases cited by the defendants would govern under circumstances different from those under which the parties in this case engaged. Hence it can only be held that these contracts in so far as restrictions on the use of tools were concerned were not only invalid in themselves as in restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Anti-trust Act, but in view of the total relationship of all of the parties, they constituted an illuminating element in the entire light in which the parties dealt with the antitrust laws.

General and Radio are not in the position of the defendants in the case of Standard Oil Co. v. United States, supra, where the court declared patent pooling legal and used the following language:

> "Where there are legitimately conflicting claims or threatened interferences, a settlement by agreement, rather than litigation, is not precluded by the Act. . . . An interchange of patent rights and a division of royalties according to the value attributed by the parties to their respective patent claims is frequently necessary if technical advancement is not to be blocked by threatened litigation. If the available advantages are open on reasonable terms to all manufacturers desiring to participate, such interchange may promote rather than restrain competition." 283 U. S. at p. 171.

Rather are they within the contemplation of the Court in the same case when it said:

> "The rate of royalties may, of course, be a decisive factor in the cost of production. If combining patent owners effectively dominate an industry, the power to fix and maintain royalties is tantamount to the power to fix prices." 283 U. S. at p. 174.

This doctrine was reemphasized in the case of United States v. Line Material Co., 333 U. S. 287, 313-314.

The Development parties exceeded the boundaries of permitted cross licensing of the patents separately owned by them when they vested in their creature, Development, the power to grant licenses and to use those licenses for aggressive or defensive purposes. This power with but insignificant modifications is as inherent in the 1946 agreement as it was in the 1934 agreement. Although direct price fixing present in the Line Material case is absent here, an equivalent power is established in the dominant position of the parties and the royalty mechanism centered in the hands of Development. In this manner the normal patent monopoly with its products of legitimate cross-licensing and royalties, is extended to give multiple advantages to individual patent holders dominant in the industry by combining their patents and affording the mechanism to reap mutual rewards greater than their individual patents would justify.

Once it is established that the agreement per se is the device which has vested the combination with power to restrain trade, it is unnecessary to show that the actual restraints have been applied. Domination of the industry with power to restrain is sufficient to bring the combination within the scope of the antitrust law. American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781:

> "Combinations are no less unlawful because they have not as yet resulted in restraint. An agreement or combination to follow a course of conduct which will necessarily restrain or monopolize a part of trade or commerce may violate the Sherman Act, whether it be 'wholly nascent or abortive on the one hand, or successful on the other.'" Associated Press v. United States, 326 U. S. 1, 12.

Therefore, the 1946 agreement must be held to be in restraint of trade and an attempt to monopolize the variable condenser industry in the United States in violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.

The position of Variable is that of a competitor of the Development parties who bowed to the exigencies of its situation and accepted the position of a licensee. During the period when it faced patent litigation by the Development parties it sought to escape its dilemma by attempting to purchase the Wilhelm patents. The conclusion must be that although the Wilhelm patents may have been of no material value to the Development parties in manufacturing variable condensers, their possession of them would weaken Variable by denying it a possible means of manufacturing without infringing Development patents. In spite of the protestations of the Development parties that their acquisition was based upon good motives, the natural effect was a factor in forcing Variable into their control and to compel it to accept a license with its restrictions.

However much Variable may have acted by compulsion, the case of U. S. v. Line Material Co., 333 U. S. 287 controls, for it stands in no better position than the licensees in that case, wherein the Court said:

> "Licensees under the contract who as here enter into license arrangements, with price fixing provisions, with knowledge of the contract, are equally subject to the prohibitions." 333 U. S. at p. 315.

Price fixing provisions were, it is conceded, a factor in the above cited case, but their equivalents were present in the association of Variable in its agreement with the Development parties. This is made clear by its express assertion in its defense of the action brought against it in New York by Development's assignee for arrearages of royalties. Although that contest was amicably adjusted, when it burned at its heat Variable had no hesitation in forcefully claiming, in its defense against the demand for royalties, that it was being victimized by the activities of the Development parties which were as it, Variable, specifically alleged, in violation of the antitrust laws. So Variable rebelled but probably finding it economic to succumb, it gave thereafter full cooperation to the Development parties. It must be held a member of the price fixing combination in existence prior to 1940 and although evidence is lacking of subsequent price fixing, it has continued to be a licensee with knowledge of the iniquities of its rarangements down to the time of this suit. Therefore, it is a conspirator with General and Radio and a violator of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.

In addition to the corporate defendants, General, Radio, Development and Variable, the following individual defendants were active parties to the agreements and the activities in connection therewith and must be held to have likewise violated §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act: Abraham Blumenkrantz, Samuel Cohen, Stanley S. Cramer, Russell E. Cramer and Charles Hyman. Proof is lacking of any affirmative control exercised by the defendants Nathan and Edward Hyman (associated with Variable) that would make them parties to the conspiracy. Accordingly they are found not to have participated and the motion for summary judgment in their favor will be granted. The motion of the plaintiff for summary judgment in its favor against the other defendants above named will be granted. The motion for summary judgment upon the part of the defendants General, Radio, Development, Variable, Blumenkrantz, Cohen, Stanley S. and Russell E. Cramer and Charles Hyman will be denied.

An order in conformity with this opinion embodying the terms of relief to which the plaintiff is entitled should be submitted on notice to the parties.

[¶ 62,511] United States v. American Can Company.

In the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, Southern Division. No. 26345-H. November 10, 1949.

Clayton Antitrust Act, Sherman Antitrust Act

Tying Agreements—Total Requirements Contracts—Canning Industry.—A leading can manufacturing company, which pursued a policy of leasing instead of selling can closing machines to its customers, was shown in the evidence against it to have conditioned its leases upon acceptance by the customer of contracts requiring the customer to purchase all his needed cans from the manufacturer for periods of five years. The tying of the two contracts was found by the court to have injuriously affected competition in an appreciable segment of interstate commerce and to constitute a violation of Section 3 of the Clayton Act.

See Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2023.36, 2023.37.

Tying Agreements—Machinery Leases—Monopoly Power.—The tying of five-year requirements contracts with leases of can closing machinery for the same period, where the leases were at rental values often below the cost of the machinery to the manufacturer, thus foreclosing competing lessors, is a restraint of trade excluding competitors from a substantial part of the market, and when engaged in by the leading manufacturer of cans, is an exercise of monopoly power. Such conduct is a violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, although it is not within the language or intent of Section 3 of the Clayton Act.

See Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.101.

Total Requirements Contracts—Reasonable Restraints.—Requirements contracts are not per se illegal. Where a canner must be left a source of supply of cans which can be counted on to be constant and always available, the needs of the economic system in which he operates must be considered in determining the reasonableness of the restraint involved in such contracts. Although five-year total requirements contracts are unreasonable, one-year contracts, in the canning industry, would not be so.

See Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1021.251; Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2023.48.

HARRIS, Judge: [Digest] This action was instituted by the government under the Sherman Act, Sections 1 and 2, and the Clayton Act, Section 3, seeking to enjoin the American Can Company from unlawful practices, allegedly in violation of both acts. The primary question for determination is whether defendant's requirements contracts and closing machine leases are illegal in the particulars specified.

Plaintiff attacks defendant's contracts under which it sells its metal and fiber containers; plaintiff also challenges the legality of defendant's closing machine leases under which it lets its can closing machines which complete the metal and fiber containers. Plaintiff contends that the can contracts and closing machine leases constitute unreasonable restraints of trade and commerce and, in addition, that such contracts and leases, together with certain specified devices, means and methods constitute a violation of Section 3 of the Clayton Act. Plaintiff further contends that defendant's contracts and closing machine leases constitute a mode of operation which gives rise to an attempt to monopolize trade and commerce and has effectuated such a monopoly in certain parts of the trade and commerce in canning, in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.

Since the conclusion of the trial of the instant case, the Supreme Court has decided Standard Oil Co. v. U. S., 337 U. S. 293, rhrg. den., 10 October 1949, 10 Supreme Ct. Bul. 11. Plaintiff contends that this case, together with International Salt Co., Inc. v. U. S., 332 U. S. 392, is fully and finally determinative of the issue under Section 3 of the Clayton Act and that, as a matter of law under the undisputed facts, judgment must go in its favor; that is, the requirements contracts are illegal and that the closing machine leases are equally offensive and must be striken down by the Court.

[Facts]

In 1946, when the plaintiff commenced its suit against defendant, American manufactured more than 200 million dollars worth of cans out of a total tin plate worth upwards of 500 million dollars. On the basis of tin plate consumed, American's percentage of the whole was somewhat in excess of forty per cent.

American and Continental in 1946 together manufactured approximately seventy per cent of the cans produced in the industry and approximately eighty per cent of all cans made for sale. These figures may be raised to eighty-one per cent and ninety-three and six-tenths per cent, respectively, if the output of four additional companies—Crown, National, Heekin, and Pacific—is added. Their combined sales of both kinds of cans that year totaled approximately 461 million dollars. Their combined sales of general line cans in the amount of $151,736,000 was equivalent to approximately 66.9% of all cans made and 81% of all made for sale. In this group of six companies in 1946, American accounted for 47.9% of the sanitary cans and 52.2% of the general line cans. American and Continental together sold 86.1% of all the cans made.

From the above recital of facts, it is clear that from a national standpoint, defendant is the leader in the manufacture of cans, although it has competition in its business and is not in a position of complete monopoly. From a regional standpoint, the story of control is different. Thus, in such an area as Utah, defendant has the only plant which serves the needs of the packers in that state. A similar monopoly exists in Hawaii, while in Alaska defendant has 80% of the can business. As might be expected American is the dominant influence in specific sections of the United States.

With respect to closing machines: Since the canning industry progressed from the hole and cap cans, which were used at the turn of the century, to the sanitary or packers' cans which are closed by machines, American has moved into leadership in the manufacture and leasing of closing machines. Today it makes and leases to its customers substantially all of their closing machines.

In terms of closing machines leased to canners, American controls 54% of all such machines. In excess of 17,000 closing machines were on lease by the canning industry at the time of commencement of this litigation in 1946. Of this number, American had 9,258 machines. Continental far outdistances other canning concerns with approximately 36% of the total machines on lease. The independent can-closing machine makers are thus limited in their sales to a market of 12% of the closing machine business.

It is the fixed and uniform policy of American to lease rather than sell its closing machines. The only exceptions to this policy arise in the few instances in which American sells machines abroad or sells a few single spindle semi-automatic machines in the Ozarks. Other canmaking concerns follow American's policy.

The present case is not directed toward American in its capacity as manufacturer of closing machines. However, it should be noted that the practice of defendant in leasing at below cost figures has tended to restrict the market for closing machine manufacturers and has limited the number of concerns engaged in this business.

With respect to the requirements contracts: The Government contends that defendant's contracts are the major tool by which it is able to exclude or limit competition in the canning business and, hence, is able to maintain its dominant position. American now has a standard form of contract which the plaintiff chooses to call "total requirements contract". In a practical sense, defendant does enter into such a total requirements contract with most of its customers. Canners, according to the record, prefer to deal with a single can manufacturer in obtaining their products for a single plant. American's 1946 contract permits a customer to purchase a single line of cans or any number of kinds of cans on a requirement basis. In 1945 American did 92% of its business in sanitary cans on this basis. Over the years defendant has handled only minute portions of its sales on an open order basis.

Throughout its business life American has entered into requirements contracts of varied duration. These have ranged from three to twenty years. Recently, defendant prepared a standardized contract of uniform length of five years. For various reasons, defendant believes that a contract of such duration best serves the interest of both canner and canmaker.

[Conclusions]

The Closing Machine Leases executed by Customers with the Defendant are Violative of Section 3 of the Clayton Act:

In the light of Standard Oil Company v. United States, 337 U. S., supra, this phase of the case is reduced to comparative simplicity. In reaching the conclusion that the leasing practices must be proscribed, we must trace briefly the practices of American since the "tying provision" was admittedly removed from the lease contracts covering closing machines.

In May 1917, in the course of an investigation of American by the Federal Trade Commission, the defendant agreed to eliminate from its forms of contract and lease any clauses which the Commission considered objectionable. Defendant now asserts that it struck the offending "tying clause" from its leases in the latter part of 1917, and, that since the elimination of the clause, the provisions in the contract for the lease of closing machines has remained substantially identical, embodying the usual covenants customarily found in lease contracts.

Paragraph two, containing the "tying provision" reads:

> "Lessee agrees that it will pay the rental as above provided, and that it will not use or permit the user of any of said machines or additional equipment, if any, for any purpose except therewith to close cans which the lessee shall have bought from the lessor and will not, directly or indirectly, use or permit the use of, the same except as herein expressly authorized."

The Government contends that the provision, although eliminated from the lease forms, has been kept alive and in effect as a result of the practices engaged in by American of a "subtle and refined" character. The practices, in substance, are as follows:

Defendant leases closing machines only to customers who purchase their cans from it, and closing machine leases run for terms concurrent with the can contracts. Sales policies, as contained in memoranda and directives from the executive officers, bear out the Government's contentions that the "tying provision" for all practical purposes has remained in the contract negotiations. The evidence introduced by the Government in this connection abundantly supports this contention and no useful purpose could be served herein by lengthy excerpts from the record.

Defendant asserts that "unless the lessee, as a condition of his closing machinery lease, is obligated to buy from the defendant all the containers he closes on that machine, the Clayton Act has no application". That is precisely what American achieves as a matter of over-all policy!

The Court is inclined to view the written record as disclosing a pattern as to policy, pointing unerringly to the conclusion that, in the main, American would not lease closing machines without a corresponding sale of cans.

That the closing machines represent a most valuable sales tool becomes increasingly manifest when it is considered that defendant has in excess of 9,000 machines on lease of an approximate value of 12 million dollars, many of which have been rented at nominal or low rental values in order to foreclose competition. The evidence herein discloses that American owns and controls more closing machines than the rest of the industry together, and demonstrates that defendant effectively ties the leasing of such machines to the sales of its cans. Defendant owns approximately 54% of all closing machines available for lease to the industry.

Finally, American contends that "in the absence of proof of the alleged condition, agreement or understanding not to use the goods of a competitor, and a proof that any such understanding may substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly the Clayton Act has not been violated".

As a matter of law, this contention is set at rest by Standard Oil Company v. United States, 337 U. S., supra. Section 3 of the Clayton Act is satisfied by proof that competition has been foreclosed in a substantial share of the line of commerce affected.

It is manifest to this Court from the record herein that abundant proof has been supplied by the Government, and the Court accordingly finds that the leasing practices of can closing machines violate the said Act for they affect injuriously a sizeable part of interstate commerce, i. e., an appreciable segment of interstate commerce.

The Devices, Means and Methods Used by Defendant in Accomplishing the Monopoly:

No useful purpose could be served by recounting herein the details of all the transactions spread over a period of years from 1930. They represent a saga of American business—so-called "big business". Taken alone, or disassociated from the general configuration or picture, many of the transactions would appear to be without probative value. However, as a composite they set a pattern of operations evidencing the extremes defendant saw fit to go in perpetuating the contractual relationship between defendant and the customer-user. The devices took many forms: defendant provided discounts in ancillary contracts; defendant paid large sums of money to obtain business of its customers; defendant furnished equipment, in addition to closing machines, at nominal rentals; defendant paid large claims when it appeared propitious and good policy; defendant purchased canmaking equipment from its customers for inflated values in order to obtain can business. The foregoing represent only part of the claims set up by the Government under the "inducements" phase of the case.

Defendant, in responding to the Government's contention that these transactions and incidents must be taken as part of the general configuration in interpreting the effect of the requirements contracts and the closing machine leases, says in part: "Certainly there is no evidence in this record that these 'inducements' were conditioned on the signing of a requirements contract".

To the contrary, there is evidence in the record, and inferences to be drawn therefrom, that the inducements referred to, in many instances, formed an important and vital part in the renewal or re-negotiation of requirements contracts.

Certain practices, as defendant claims, represent no more nor less than "ordinary business practices, such as the extension of credit, the servicing of leased machinery, the equalization of freight rates and similar activities one would expect to find in any industry in which competitors are seeking to serve the needs of their customers and keep their good will".

The incidents, when examined realistically and not as mere abstractions, are deeper than the typical run-of-the-mill, day-to-day business transactions. They represent a studied, methodical and effective method of retaining and acquiring by refined, gentlemanly and suave means, plus an occasional "commercial massage", the dominant position which American has had and maintained for at least a generation on and over the canning industry. A detailed analysis of this phase of the Government's case convinces that there is little room left in a competitive sense, for the independent small business man. As a competitive influence, he has slowly and sadly been relegated into the limbo of American enterprise.

The evidence establishes violations of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act:

The proof in this case compels the conclusion that the five year requirements contracts and closing machine leases unreasonably restrain trade in violation of the Sherman Act. The evidence discloses that competitors have been foreclosed from a substantial market by the contracts and leases.

The practices surrounding the leasing of closing machines, in view of Section 3 of the Clayton Act, have received appropriate treatment and discussion, supra; although the "tying provision" has ostensibly been deleted from the leases, nevertheless, as a matter of practice and policy, the machines are still "tied" to the sale of cans.

Add to the foregoing element the requirements contract:

The form of contract finally promulgated by the defendant in 1946 is, in practical effect, a total requirements contract. It covers the sale by the supplier and the purchase by the user of all of the containers specified in the contract which the user shall require for his actual use in his operations in all specified points in the United States and its possessions and territories.

With the premise established that American is in a dominant role and a position of preeminent power in the industry, we may then examine the record to determine whether: (a) competition has been foreclosed; (b) from any substantial market.

In the instant case the Government's proof shows the use by defendant of approximately 4,000 requirements contracts involving 250 million dollars in business annually, and a domination in the canmaking industry for a period of almost fifty years. The evidence reveals the ownership and control of more closing machines than the rest of the industry as a whole, and it further demonstrates that defendant effectively ties in the leasing of the closing machines with the sale of cans under requirements contracts. Thus, Government argues that domination and control having been demonstrated, this Court must hold as a matter of law, in the light of the contracts entered into and the business controlled under the contracts, implemented with the devices, means and methods already alluded to, that competition is foreclosed over a period of many years with respect to a sizeable segment of the canmaking business, to wit, approximately 40%.

In short, it is contended that from the foregoing an automatic result follows and that where competition under such circumstances is excluded, that the restraint and monopolistic practices are unreasonable.

Apart from the inevitable conclusion reached that the requirements contracts and closing machine leases, backgrounded by the configuration of the devices and practices, offend against the Sherman Act, Sections 1 and 2 thereof, there is the problem of the user-consumer which must be approached, not as a legal abstraction, but realistically. He should not be left without a source of supply. The canners are subject in many instances to the whims of nature, over which they have no control. They are, therefore, required to have available a supply of tin containers, fluid in amount, and appropriate from the technological and marketing viewpoints. The general reason assigned for requirements contracts was that canners wished to be assured of receiving containers when, as, and if needed, regardless of any contingency which might affect the raw material supply or the market.

In its brief (page 217) the Government takes the position that, by reason of the impingement of the machinery lease contracts upon the requirements contract the term of the requirements contract, be it fifteen years, ten years, five years or one day, is immaterial. That the term requirements contracts perforce must be stricken as a whole. The basic answer to this contention is brief:

The Government has intertwined the lease contracts with the requirements contract without giving recognition to the separate status of each. Although admittedly the machinery lease contract impinges upon the requirements contract, nevertheless, the inherent vitality or lack of vitality is not to be determined from that circumstance alone. Rather the question of reasonableness must to some degree be determined by the force and effect of the contract upon trade and commerce, and, when we take the requirements contract in and of itself and examine it in the light of its possible effect upon trade and commerce, it must be concluded that the five year term creates an unreasonable restraint in the light of all the facts, factors, circumstances and background.

In finding the five year requirements contract illegal, we are not thereby compelled to declare void any and all requirements contracts. We cannot ignore the testimony of countless witnesses who indicated the vital necessity of some sort of supply contract. Several of them, of course, vigorously denounced the long-term period. Others believed emphatically in a term not to exceed one year, for, as it was pointed out, at the expiration date of such a period of time they could cast about in the open market.

Mindful that requirements contracts are not per se unlawful, and that one of the elements which should be considered is the length thereof, it is only fair to conclude, after a careful review of the evidence, that a contract for a period of one year would permit competitive influences to operate at the expiration of said period of time, and the vice which is now present in the five year requirements contracts would be removed. Under a contract limited to one year, the user-consumer would be guaranteed and assured supply and protected by a definite obligation on the part of American to meet the totality of needs of the canner, while he, in turn, would have a fixed obligation to purchase his seasonable needs from American, thus making for mutuality of contract and obligation.

To strike down the requirements contracts and to declare them totally void as violative of the Sherman Act, without at the same time affording to the user-consumer a supply over a limited period of time, would be destructive, illogical, unsound and not in consonance with the acute and particular problems confronting the canning industry.

In this particular case we have concluded that the Court is not foreclosed from an examination into the needs and requirements of the industry with respect to a finding as to whether an unreasonable restraint and monopoly exist under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The requirements of the industry in our opinion have a bearing upon the problem herein although admittedly not finally determinative of the ultimate question to be resolved.

We find, therefore, that in the light of the evidence, the requirements contracts herein are unreasonable for the period or duration of five years and that a reasonable period of time for said duration is one year.

The Government contends that the requirements contracts also offend against Section 3 of the Clayton Act. From a review of the record, the Court perceived that these contracts properly fall within the proscription of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act and that their provisions must be dealt with accordingly. Defendant's requirements contracts do not come within either the language or the intent of Section 3 of the Clayton Act.

The Agreement to Fix Prices between American and Continental:

Apart from any claimed conspiracy, there is abundant evidence with respect to the agreement or agreements on the part of the officers of Continental and American to fix prices.

The pattern of evidence herein suggests more than a following on the part of Continental of the prices fixed and established by American.

It becomes unnecessary, under the issues as framed in this case, to make any finding with respect to a so-called conspiracy or to otherwise allude thereto. The conspiracy, or its absence, cannot serve as a premise in any logical reasoning leading to a conclusion with respect to the practices that are at issue. However, we do find that American and Continental, through their officers, agents, and servants, did directly agree to fix prices. This is manifest from the evidence, as well as the pattern of the price lists which appeared in the exhibits.

Affirmative Defenses of American Can Company:

The affirmative defenses set up by American have been either expressly or impliedly denied by the Court during the trial of the case. Defendant has alleged, first, that the issues raised by the complaint are res judicata by reason of the judgment in U. S. v. American Can Co., 230 F. 859; 234 F. 1019. The Court has previously indicated that this asserted defense is unavailing and defendant itself has acquiesced in the Court's ruling by asserting that it would prefer a decision on the merits rather than rely upon a technical assertion. But defendant expressed such a desire "without waiving the defense", submitting that, at the very least, Judge Rose's decision should be considered a most persuasive precedent.

Defendant has alleged as a second affirmative defense: that the leases and total requirements contracts and issues regarding the legality thereof, are moot by reason of the dismissal of the 1924 complaint by the Federal Trade Commission. The decision or determination of the Commission is not binding upon this Court under the issues raised herein.

Plaintiff may submit herein Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law in accordance with the foregoing opinion. With respect to the ultimate remedies or relief, ruling will be deferred until further hearing and upon notice.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Federal Rules of Practice—Impleader—Content of Supporting Affidavit.—When a third party complaint is filed by the defendant in a patent infringement suit, and his supporting affidavit does not merely state that the appearance of the third party is necessary for complete relief, but goes further and makes allegations of conspiracy which in fact demonstrate that the third party is not necessary, then the third party complaint must, by virtue of Federal Rule 13(h), be dismissed.

For third-party plaintiff, Mansew Corp.: Harris B. Steinberg (Jacob H. Bobrow, of counsel).

For third-party defendant, Cutting Room Appliance Corp.: Henry L. Burkitt.

Before L. HAND, SWAN and FRANK, Circuit Judges.

[Nature of Action]

On February 10, 1948, plaintiffs filed their complaint, naming Mansew Corporation as defendant, and alleging infringement by defendant of letters patent Nos. 2,192,446 and 2,422,914. The complaint alleged that the patents were owned by the individual plaintiffs and that they had granted an exclusive license to the plaintiff, the L. R. S. Machine Company, which had granted an exclusive license to the plaintiff, Michael J. Hughes & Company.

On May 19, before Mansew filed its answer, the district court, on Mansew's motion supported by an affidavit of Mansew's lawyer, made an ex parte order reading as follows: "IT IS ORDERED that Cutting Room Appliances Corp. be made a third party defendant in this action, and that leave be granted to serve a summons and a copy of the answer and third party complaint herein upon Cutting Room Appliances Corp., and it is further ordered that the title of the action herein be amended to read as above set forth." The supporting affidavit read in part as follows: "I make this affidavit in support of the defendant, Man-Sew Corporation's application for an order bringing in Cutting Room Appliances Corp. as a third party defendant in this action. * * * The defendant's answer, which is now being prepared, will set forth a number of defenses and will include counterclaims. One of such counterclaims will be for a declaratory judgment of invalidity and non-infringement of the patents involved, and another for damages and an injunction, pursuant to the provisions of the Clayton and Sherman Anti-Trust Acts, because of the conduct of these plaintiffs and the third party defendant, Cutting Room Appliances Corp., in conspiring to restrain trade and to secure an illegal monopoly in the manufacture and sale of garment trimming machines. The proposed third-party defendant, Cutting Room Appliances Corp., as will be demonstrated herein,[1] has taken a leading part in such activities in restraint of trade, and it is obvious that, in order for the defendant (and proposed third party plaintiff) to obtain full relief on its counterclaim, the proposed third party defendant, Cutting Room Appliances Corp., is a necessary party." The affidavit went on to state the following:

[Statements in Affidavit]

(1) Cutting Room Appliances (CRA) had published advertisements creating the impression that it was selling the "only fully automatic dress bottom trimmer authorized" by letters patent Nos. 2,192,446 and 2,422,914. (2) One of its advertisements contained this statement: "We think you should be advised that action has commenced to restrain, as infringement of these Letters Patent, manufacturer and sale of dress bottom trimmers by others, and that instructions have been issued vigorously to prosecute such action to a final decision. We think you should know that not merely the manufacturer, but also the user and seller of an infringing machine, may be enjoined, and may be held responsible for damage arising out of the use or sale of such infringing machine." (3) This statement had led Mansew's customers and prospective customers to believe that CRA was the plaintiff in the patent suit and would be the plaintiff in other similar contemplated suits. (4) CRA and plaintiff had apparently resorted to a campaign of falsehoods, vilification and abuse designed to injure the defendant's standing in the trade. Thus they had made statements that "Man-Sew was forced to withdraw their skirt trimmer from the market due to the fact that they were infringing on certain patents." (5) "Accordingly, it is obvious that, as far as the public is concerned, Cutting Room Appliances Corp., the proposed third-party defendant, has taken the lead in a conspiracy to restrain trade, and to secure an illegal monopoly, and to injure the defendant's business, and should be made a party to this action so that the merits of the defendant's counterclaim against it and the plaintiffs may be determined, with binding effect on all parties concerned."

[Allegations of Counterclaim]

On May 24, 1948, Mansew filed its unsworn answer. The answer contained, inter alia, a counterclaim against plaintiffs and a "third-party complaint" against CRA, which alleged the following: Plaintiffs and CRA, by bringing their suit were attempting to "misuse the patent system to obtain an illegal monopoly"; they had so acted as to create a monopoly in connection with their patents in violation of the Sherman and Clayton Acts, by "limiting and decreasing competition in, the trade in garment trimming machines, not covered by any valid claim of the patents in suit, in interstate commerce"; that they had "misrepresented the scope of said patents and the scope of the claimed rights of plaintiffs, to the trade and to the public in general, by circulating and publishing in trade papers, and by advertisements, circulars, letters, announcements, notices and oral communications, false, deceptive and misleading information, and threats of suits, seeking thereby to intimidate prospective purchasers of defendant's machines, and to restrain the free trade among the several states, and between this country and foreign countries, in garment trimming machines"; their conduct had resulted and would result in "material, irreparable and substantial loss and damage to defendant and in the loss of sales by defendant of its garment trimming machine which defendant would have otherwise made, except for the unlawful and unfair acts of plaintiffs and the third party defendant; "the exact amount of said damage and injury cannot be ascertained except by an accounting proceeding; * * * unless plaintiffs and the third party defendant are restrained and enjoined from continuance of such illegal and monopolistic activities, defendant will be subject to further serious and irreparable loss. * * *" This counterclaim asked an injunction, and other relief against plaintiffs and CRA.

On May 26, 1948, CRA was served. The summons signed by the Clerk was on a printed form which contained the following: "Note: This summons is issued pursuant to Rule 14 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure." On June 10, 1948, CRA moved to dismiss the "third party complaint." Attached to the motion papers was an affidavit of the lawyer for CRA which stated that the "complaint" had been filed under an order made "without the presence or consent of CRA"; that there was "no sound foundation for the bringing in of" CRA; and that Mansew had shown no basis for joining CRA under Rule 14. The district court entered a judgment dismissing this complaint without leave to amend. From this judgment, Mansew appeals.

FRANK, Circuit Judge: The impleading order of February 10, 1948, bringing in CRA as a party, was ex parte. Whether a motion to dismiss a counterclaim would ordinarily be the proper method to raise the question of the validity of such an order, we need not decide, for here the affidavit attached to the motion sufficiently raised that question. True, in that affidavit CRA urged that the order was erroneous under Rule 14, whereas obviously the pertinent rule is Rule 13 (h); however, the note printed on the summons might well have misled CRA. Consequently, we think the motion to dismiss the counterclaim should be considered as a motion to vacate the impleading order as improper under Rule 13(h).[1]

That rule allows impleader only where "* * * the presence of parties other than those to the original action is required for the granting of complete relief in the determination of a counterclaim or cross-claim. * * *"[2] Here, when defendant sought impleader, its only basis was the supporting affidavit of defendant's lawyer. We may assume, arguendo, that that affidavit would have sustained the order if it had stated merely (a) that the counterclaim would allege that plaintiffs had violated the Sherman and Clayton Acts, and (b) that CRA had joined in the violations to such an extent that it was a necessary party if defendants were to obtain "complete relief" under the proposed counterclaim. But the affidavit went further. It thus said too much and, in so doing, said too little. For it alleged detailed facts which, so the affidavit asserted, "demonstrated" that the anti-trust laws had been violated. Those alleged facts fell far short of anything like such a showing.[3] The district court should therefore not have made the order joining CRA as a party.

Affirmed.

[1] We have jurisdiction of this appeal because the dismissed counterclaim prayed an injunction.

[2] Rule 13 (h) reads as follows: "When the presence of parties other than those to the original action is required for the granting of complete relief in the determination of a counterclaim or cross-claim, the court shall order them to be brought in as defendants as provided in these rules, if jurisdiction of them can be obtained and their joinder will not deprive the court of jurisdiction of the action."

[3] We need not consider whether, had the impleading order been valid, the counterclaim would have been sufficient or at least good enough to require that defendant be allowed to amend.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Vacation of Injunctions—Terminated or Unenforced Fair Trade Agreements.—In deciding upon the motion of a defendant to dissolve an injunction prohibiting the sale of typewriters under an established price, when the moving party claims that attempts to enforce the agreement have broken down and that the agreement is in fact no longer effective, the question of the present status of the fair trade agreement is referred to a referee for determination.

See the New York Fair Trade Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.83, Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7357.

KOCH, J.: [Digest] Defendant moves to vacate an injunction contained in a judgment of this court entered August 17, 1939, permanently restraining it from selling Royal portable typewriters at prices below those fixed by the manufacturer under a fair trade agreement. The vacatur of such a decree, if directed, should however be directed only upon a clear showing that the price fixing agreements are no longer effective.

Presumably the injunction was obtained at a time when effective fair trade agreements existed. If no effective fair trade agreements now exist should those enjoined from price cutting be prejudiced by selling at the fixed price when competitors sell below it with impunity?

Contrariwise how much of a burden may be placed on those obtaining permanent injunctions in fair trade cases? It would seem that such parties should not be obliged to prove their rights anew each time an application is made to punish a violation of the injunction.

Where as here one charged with violation of such an injunction makes a substantial showing, by affidavit, that the price fixing structure may have broken down, it seems reasonable that an opportunity should be granted to show by proper testimony of witnesses that no effective agreements exist. An opportunity should likewise be given to refute such testimony.

The question of the present existence of an effective fair price trade agreement with reference to the item, the sale of which below the fixed price is enjoined, will therefore be referred to a referee to hear and report.

Clayton Antitrust Act, Robinson-Patman Act

Discrimination—Refusal to Sell—Selection of Customers.—The refusal of a special chair and furnishings manufacturer to sell such equipment to one contractor for resale to certain universities specifying such types of furniture in their bid solicitations, while such furniture and special applicable price-lists are sold and supplied to competitors of that contractor, does not constitute a discrimination within the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, since the discriminations proscribed by that law are those made between purchasers, and in the instant case the plaintiff contractor was not a purchaser. No law of the United States requires that a person must deal with everyone, and the Clayton Act by its own words permits the selection of customers in bona fide transactions.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2022.27; Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212.165, 2212.475.

Discrimination—Services and Facilities—Furnishing Price Lists and Catalogues.—Price lists and catalogues are mere invitations to negotiate, and the supplying of such lists and catalogues does not constitute the furnishing of a service or facility connected with the sale or offering for sale of a commodity. The refusal to supply them in individual cases does not constitute a discrimination in the furnishing of services or facilities.

See the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2216.

Affirming District Court's dismissal of complaint, 83 Fed. Supp. 409, reported at ¶ 62,381.

Before KERNER, FINNEGAN and LINDLEY, Circuit Judges.

[Nature of Appeal]

FINNEGAN, Circuit Judge: By this appeal it is sought to reverse an order of the District Court which dismissed, on defendant's motion, an amended complaint seeking treble damages for violation of section 2 (e) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. Both appellant, Chicago Seating Company, and defendant-appellee, S. Karpen and Bros., are Illinois corporations.

The amended complaint alleged in paragraph one that both plaintiff and defendant are engaged in interstate commerce and that jurisdiction arises under the provisions of section 4 of the Clayton Act. It is then averred that the defendant is engaged in the business of manufacturing upholstered furniture and that its products are nationally known and distributed.

[Discrimination Charged]

Paragraph 3 charges that the defendant has engaged in a program of negotiating with certain public institutions in order that such institutions, in their building programs as well as in their solicitation of bids for furnishing their buildings, will specify that only certain specially designed items manufactured by it can be used in meeting the specifications of the said public bids; that such specially designed items are not included in defendant's regular price lists or catalogue, and that as a practical matter such conduct of the defendant excluded the substitution for "such specially designed items" of like items made by other manufacturers.

The complaint then alleges that the plaintiff has, since 1929, been engaged in interstate commerce in the business of furnishing hotels, schools, and other public institutions with furniture and similar accessories; that it has been and continues to be a purchaser of defendant's products. It charges that subsequently to acts of discrimination, alleged to be thereafter set forth in the complaint, it did, on December 15, 1948, order from defendant, and that on said date defendant did accept its orders for furniture manufactured by the defendant.

In paragraph 5 of the complaint section 2 (e) of the Clayton Act is set out, and it is averred that since November 23, 1948 the defendant has been discriminating against the plaintiff and in favor of certain of its purchasers for certain of its products "by contracting to give and furnish, and by giving and furnishing certain services and facilities in connection with the handling, sale or offering for sale of its said products so purchased by its customers not accorded to all such purchasers, including the plaintiff on proportionately equal terms. Specifically the defendant, is favoring certain purchasers, as aforesaid, by furnishing them with prices on certain items specified in the advertised bids of certain public institutions, the prices of said items are not a part of the regular items shown in their catalogue and price list, and that as a direct result and consequence the competitors of the plaintiffs can bid on and thereby secure the business of the said public institutions, whereas the plaintiff, not being informed of the said prices of the defendant's special merchandise was thereby prevented and precluded from competing with other purchasers of defendant's products. The defendant's failure to accord the plaintiff the said service and facilities hereinabove described has substantially lessened the competition and has diverted trade from and caused a competitive disadvantage to the plaintiff." (Italics supplied throughout.)

In paragraph 6 of the complaint it is charged that on November 20, 1948, the defendant in collusion with the University of Oklahoma advertised and solicited bids for the furnishing of its buildings, and that said bids specified certain specially designed units that were to be manufactured by S. Karpen & Bros., that the defendant made prices available to certain of its purchasers; that on or before November 24, 1948, the plaintiff requested the same facilities offered to its competitors; that the defendant advised the plaintiff that, while it would continue to sell plaintiff its regular line of merchandise, it would refrain from furnishing the plaintiff with said prices in order to eliminate the plaintiff from competition; that it would not permit the plaintiff to purchase for resale special products designed for public institutions. It is alleged that as a direct result and consequence of the alleged discrimination against the plaintiff in refusing to furnish the same service and facilities, to-wit the "prices of the certain special items and privileges of purchasing the same to the plaintiff for the defendant's specially designed products specified in the said bid," the plaintiff was unable to compete with its competitors and was thereby deprived of large profits which it otherwise would have made.

The complaint in paragraph 7 alleges that on August 27, 1948, the University of Illinois solicited bids for the furnishing of its buildings; that Karpen specially designed products were specified. It is alleged that, at that time, the defendant did furnish the plaintiff with prices and the privilege of purchasing said items; that as a consequence the plaintiff was awarded the contract by the University of Illinois.

Paragraph 7 alleges that on about December 6, 1948, the University of Illinois solicited from plaintiff and its competitors bids on additional furnishings which included specially designed Karpen products; that on December 8, 1948 and again on December 10, 1948, plaintiff requested that the defendant furnish it price lists and the privilege of purchase on additional Karpen items; that the defendant refused to quote prices or sell the plaintiff; that as a result and consequence thereof the plaintiff was prevented from bidding and its competitors who received the benefit of such services from the defendant did bid and one of them secured the contract; that plaintiff was thereby deprived of large profits which it would otherwise have made; that plaintiff is in danger of losing future business and to have its standing in the field of public institutions contracts impaired.

Paragraph 9 alleged that plaintiff has suffered actual damages in the sum of $25,000 and claims that by virtue of section 4 of the Clayton Act, as amended, it is entitled to treble damages. Wherefore it asks judgment.

Defendant moved to dismiss the amended complaint on three grounds:

(1) It does not allege facts showing an unlawful price discrimination within the terms of the Clayton Act, as amended;

(2) It does not allege facts showing that plaintiff purchased any goods from the defendant as to which there was any unlawful discrimination within the meaning of the Act; and

(3) It does not allege facts showing that the defendant did anything more than exercise its right under the Act to select its own customers.

Section 2 (e) of the Clayton Act, as amended, provides:

> "Furnishing services of facilities for processing, handling, etc.—It shall be unlawful for any person to discriminate in favor of one purchaser against another purchaser or purchasers of a commodity bought for resale, with or without processing, by contracting to furnish or furnishing, or by contributing to the furnishing of, any services or facilities connected with the processing, handling, sale or offering for sale of such commodity so purchased upon terms not accorded to all purchasers on proportionately equal terms." (Sec. 13 (e) Title 15 U. S. C. A.)

An examination of the amended complaint shows clearly that the plaintiff is predicating its action upon the defendant's refusal to furnish it a price list of specially designed items of furniture manufactured by the defendant. It is true that the complaint shows in paragraph 7 that on one occasion defendant did furnish to plaintiff prices on such specially designed items; that plaintiff then purchased some of such items and used them in executing a contract it had procured from the University of Illinois. There is no pretense of allegation that in said instance there was any discrimination against the plaintiff. Complaint is made because thereafter defendant refused to sell such specially designed items to plaintiff.

The same claim is found throughout the whole complaint; plaintiff charges that it has been damaged because defendant refused to sell it certain specially designed items. As to such items the plaintiff, except in the single instance noted, never became a purchaser. Since, as we have pointed out, there is no charge of discrimination in the only sale of the special items made to the plaintiff, it follows that there can be no discrimination against plaintiff and in favor of other purchasers of such items.

The case attempted to be stated in appellant's complaint is clearly distinguishable from the cases cited in its brief. In each such case there was not merely an allegation, but there was also proof of discrimination in favor of one purchaser against other purchasers of the same article. In the case at bar there is no allegation of discrimination against plaintiff as a purchaser and in favor of any other purchaser of defendant's items.

[Price Lists Not "Services or Facilities"]

It is true that plaintiff does charge that defendant refused to furnish it prices. It is even said that defendant refused to sell to plaintiff. Even if true such charges do not constitute discrimination in favor of one purchaser against others under the provisions of the Clayton Act. Price lists and catalogues are mere invitations to negotiate and do not constitute a service or facility connected with the sale or offering for sale of a commodity. The refusal to furnish them is at most a refusal to negotiate.

As we see it, the laws of the United States do not require that persons engaged in private trade and commerce must deal with everyone. When they do deal they may not discriminate, but they do have the right to choose their customers. The Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act itself provides in section 2 (a)

> "Nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona fide transactions and not in constraint of trade." (Sec. 13 (a) Title 15 U. S. C. A.)

A trader engaged in private business may exercise his own discretion as to parties with whom he will deal. Federal Trade Commission v. Raymond, 263 U. S. 565; United States v. Bausch and Lomb, 321 U. S. 707.

A very similar situation appears in Shaw, Inc. v. Wilson Jones Co., 105 F. 2d 331. In that case the appellant contended that the appellee has discriminated between different purchasers because the appellee refused to quote prices to appellant and further charged that appellee had quoted prices to a competitor and to him only. The court said on page 333:

> "* * * The phrase 'to discriminate in price,' employed in Section 2 (a) considered by itself and entirely out of its context, might be deemed to include a refusal to offer a price to a customer upon goods which the latter desired to offer for resale. Such a conclusion is insupportable, however, after consideration of the other language of the section. The discrimination in price referred to must be practiced 'between different purchasers.' Therefore at least two purchases must have taken place. The term purchaser means simply one who purchases, a buyer, a vendee. It does not mean one who seeks to purchase, a person who goes into the marketplace for the purpose of purchasing. In other words, it does not mean a prospective purchaser, or one who wishes to purchase, as the appellant contends."
> "In the light of the foregoing we think that it is clear that the appellant has not alleged such facts as would constitute a cause of action under the provisions of Section 2 (a). Since no goods or commodities were offered to the appellant, the terms of the subsection are not met. The Act does not compel a seller of commodities to offer them to all persons who may wish to bid upon a contract to resell them to a third party. The discrimination in price prohibited by the subsection is discrimination in respect to commodities sold to purchasers.
> "The course of conduct exhibited by the appellee is not to be commended as exhibiting sound commercial practices, but this conduct is not within the prohibition of subsection (a).
>
> "Nor has the appellant stated a cause of action under subsection (e) for the reasons which we have heretofore stated."

[Affirmed]

In view of the foregoing, we are convinced that the action of the District Court in sustaining defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint was proper. Its judgment is therefore affirmed.

[¶ 62,516] Opinion of the Attorney General of New York.

Addressed to the Commissioner, Division of Standards and Purchase, by Nathaniel L. Goldstein, Attorney General. November 14, 1949.

New York Fair Trade Law

Fair Trade Agreements—Sales to State Excepted—Violative of Federal Law.—The Fair Trade Law of New York expressly exempts sales to the state government, or any administrative department or local subdivision thereof, from the application of any agreement restricting resale prices. Since the Federal law sanctions price fixing in interstate commerce only where permissible in the state of resale, it follows that the attempt to fix prices on sales to the state would also violate the Federal antitrust laws and be unenforceable.

See the New York Fair Trade Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.40; Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7116, 7288.

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of October 31, 1949 and enclosure, requesting my opinion whether the State of New York is exempt from the Federal or the State of New York Fair Trade Law.

[Sales to State Excepted]

The New York Fair Trade Law is contained in Article XXIV-A of the General Business Law. As amended by the Laws of 1941, Chapter 39, § 369-a, subdivision 3 thereof provides as follows:

"3. This article shall not be deemed or construed to apply to, or to fix or limit prices at which any commodity may be sold or offered for sale to the state of New York or to any administrative department of the state government, to any political subdivision of the state, to any municipality, to any public corporation or authority now or hereafter created by the legislature, to any college or university library or any public library incorporated by an act of the legislature, or by the board of regents of the state education department or registered by the state education department."

[Application of Federal Law]

Price fixing contracts are excepted from the provisions of the Federal Anti-Trust Laws "when contracts or agreements of that description are lawful as applied to intrastate transactions, under any statute, law, or public policy now or hereafter in effect in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in which such resale is to be made," * * * (15 U. S. C. A. § 1).

Inasmuch as the New York State Fair Trade Act does not apply to sales to the State, any fair trade agreement which attempted to fix prices on sales to the State involving interstate commerce would be in violation of the Federal Anti-Trust Laws and unenforceable.

It is my conclusion, therefore, that sales to the State are not affected by any fair trade agreements.

Colorado Unfair Practices Act

Temporary Injunctions—Sufficiency of Notice—Notice Combined with Restraining Order.—When service was made of a temporary restraining order against a dealer charged with selling below cost, and in that order there was included a notice of hearing upon application for a temporary injunction against him, the court's invalidation of the restraining order after argument two days later invalidates also the injunction notice included therein. It is held, in such case, that if a temporary injunction is still desired, it must be applied for anew in the regular way.

Reporter's Transcript of Court's Findings

[Digest]

MR. ROBINSON: Upon agreement with counsel representing the plaintiff, and with the Court, this time was set for the hearing of our motion for the dissolution of the restraining order issued by this Court on the 24th day of October of this year.

(Whereupon argument was given by counsel on both sides upon the dissolution of the restraining order.)

THE COURT: Well, as to the matter which is before the Court, the Court is of the opinion that the restraining order is invalid, was improvidently issued.

As to a setting now for a hearing on the preliminary injunction, the circumstances of the case so far as they are before the Court don't indicate that there is any emergency requiring a hearing on the temporary injunction.

MR. HEALEY: What is the effect of the notice which was received by the respondent here to hear the injunction, the hearing on the preliminary injunction? Two days ago the notice was served. We are before the Court on two matters this morning, it seems to me, one in which we waived notice two days ago for the hearing on the dissolution of the temporary restraining order, and a continuance of a hearing on the temporary injunction from the date which was fixed two days ago in the notice to the respondent.

I remember very well, Mr. Robinson, your first suggestion that we call up at that time the hearing on the temporary restraining order and continue over until some later date the hearing on the temporary injunction. That was the first statement and the first request of counsel. However, subsequent to that, in open court, we agreed that we would waive notice—if Your Honor remembers that—we would waive notice on the hearing of the notice of the dissolution of the temporary restraining order and, also, maintain and continue to that date the hearing on the temporary injunction, which I think comes up today.

THE COURT: Well, it is not the understanding of the Court that this was set for a hearing on the application for the temporary injunction today.

MR. HEALEY: I may have misunderstood.

THE COURT: It went over so that some time might be fixed.

Where is your notice requiring this matter to be heard on an application for a temporary injunction?

MR. JOHNSON: The notice for hearing on the preliminary injunction was included with the restraining order which was served.

THE COURT: That is this order here which has been held invalid. No temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice, unless it appears from specific facts, and so forth, and there must be either an affidavit or a verified complaint.

MR. HEALEY: I am not coming back to the temporary restraining order.

THE COURT: The same thing applies to a preliminary injunction. Now, when you filed your complaint, you could have promptly made a motion for a temporary injunction, and given notice of it. It would have been heard on notice. You have a motion day the 7th of this month, if you want to call this up for a temporary injunction, it can be heard at that time. It doesn't seem to the Court, however, that this is the situation in regard to that. Ordinarily the Court, in these restraining orders and temporary injunctions has some control by way of a bond. Here, the plaintiff being a governmental agency, gives no bond, and the Court must even be more careful in those matters not to work an injustice by reason of a temporary restraining order. This temporary restraining order has, of course, been disposed of, and a temporary injunction can be asked for in the regular way, and proceed in the regular way.

MR. HEALEY: The notice and order, over the Court's signature, that the hearing would be held, served two days ago, is not that sufficient notice for a hearing on the temporary injunction?

THE COURT: "It is further ordered that the plaintiff's prayer for a preliminary injunction be set down for hearing on October 31st"—I think that was an ex parte order.

MR. HEALEY: But the service of that order and the return by the sheriff that he served that order, was not that sufficient notice for the hearing on the temporary injunction?

THE COURT: I think not, the order falls completely.

MR. HEALEY: The order falls completely?

THE COURT: Yes. It doesn't amount to a notice. In other words, you should give notice in the regular course under the rules for a hearing for a setting.

MR. HEALEY: We want to enter our exceptions to that ruling.

THE COURT: That is all that is before the Court today. The matter is disposed of.

Final Judgment

PAUL J. MCCORMICK, District Judge: Plaintiff, UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, having filed its Second Amended Complaint herein on November 4, 1949, and the defendants herein having appeared and filed their answers to the Second Amended Complaint denying the substantive allegations thereof; and the plaintiff and said defendants by their attorneys having severally consented to the entry of this Final Judgment without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein and without admission of any party defendant in respect of any such issue;

NOW, THEREFORE, before any testimony has been taken herein, and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and upon consent as aforesaid of all the parties hereto,

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED as follows:

I.

The Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter herein and of all the parties hereto. The Second Amended Complaint of November 4, 1949 states a cause of action against the defendants under Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," commonly known as the Sherman Act, and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto.

[Terms Defined]

II.

As used in this Final Judgment:

(a) "Disconnecting switches" shall mean switches, including the mechanism and linkage for manual or mechanical methods of operation, used for changing connections in electrical circuits, which do not have an interrupting rating and are intended to be operated only after the circuit has been opened by some other means.

(b) "Grounding switches" shall mean switches, including the mechanism and linkage for manual or mechanical methods of operation, which do not have an interrupting rating and by means of which an electrical circuit or a piece of apparatus may be connected to ground.

(c) "Patents" shall mean United States Letters Patent and Applications therefor, including all reissues, divisions, continuations or extensions thereof, and patents issued upon said applications.

[Application of Judgment]

III.

The provisions of this Judgment applicable to any defendant shall apply to such defendant, its officers, directors, agents, employees, successors, assigns and all other persons acting under, through or for such defendant.

[Termination of Agreements]

IV.

(A) The following agreements are hereby terminated and the defendants Railway and Industrial Engineering Company, Westinghouse Electric Corporation, General Electric Company, Delta-Star Electric Company and Electrical Engineers Equipment Company are hereby enjoined and restrained from the further performance of said agreements, and of any agreements or arrangements amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto:

(1) Agreement between Railway and Industrial Engineering Company and Westinghouse Electric Corporation, dated December 3, 1942;

(2) Agreement between Railway and Industrial Engineering Company and General Electric Company, dated November 20, 1939;

(3) Agreement between Railway and Industrial Engineering Company and Delta-Star Electric Company, dated April 4, 1938;

(4) Agreement between Delta-Star Electric Company and Railway and Industrial Engineering Company, dated April 4, 1938; and

(5) Agreement between Westinghouse Electric Corporation and Electrical Engineers Equipment Company, dated January 3, 1940.

(B) The above named defendants are hereby enjoined and restrained from entering into, adhering to, maintaining or furthering, directly or indirectly, or claiming any rights under any contract, agreement, understanding, plan or program which has as its purpose or effect the continuing or renewing of any of the agreements listed in paragraph (A) of this Section IV.

[Conspiracies Enjoined]

V.

(A) Defendants are severally and jointly enjoined and restrained from combining or conspiring with, or from entering into, adhering to, maintaining or furthering, directly or indirectly, any contract, agreement, understanding, plan or program with any manufacturer of disconnecting or grounding switches to:

(1) Determine, fix, maintain or adhere to prices, differentials, discounts or other terms or conditions of sale for disconnecting or grounding switches to third persons;

(2) Refuse to submit a bid for the sale of disconnecting or grounding switches, or to make a bid therefor higher than, or identical with, the bid of any one else, or to submit collusively a bid therefor.

(B) Defendants are jointly and severally enjoined and restrained from:

(1) Circulating, exchanging, disclosing or communicating among or to other manufacturers of disconnecting or grounding switches:

(a) Quotations or bids for the sale of such switches to third persons;

(b) Information concerning the sale of such switches which is made generally available to the trade, in advance of its being made so available to the trade;

(c) Information as to prices, terms or conditions of sale of such switches not generally available to the trade, except exclusively in connection with a bona fide purchase or sale, or proposed purchase or sale of such switches by or to a defendant.

(2) Submitting bids for the sale of disconnecting or grounding switches for the purpose or with the intent of discouraging or precluding any person from becoming or continuing as a customer of such defendant. A course of action involving the submission of bids which provide higher prices or more unfavorable terms or conditions of sale than such defendant is then regularly offering to others similarly situated shall place upon such defendant the burden of disproving such purpose or intent.

[Reports to Government]

VI.

(A) Each defendant, its successors and assigns, are hereby ordered and directed, within thirteen (13) months from the effective date of this Judgment, to serve plaintiff with a statement, under oath, of:

(1) Its prices, terms, and conditions of sale that were in effect March 1, 1949, and that were applicable to disconnecting and grounding switches;

(2) Each change made by it during the period between March 1, 1949 and one year after the effective date of this Judgment with respect to any of said prices, terms, and conditions of sale;

(3) The effective date of each such change, the date it was announced to the trade, and the manner in which the announcement was made.

(B) Within six (6) months after service of the last of said statements upon plaintiff, plaintiff may move to amend this Judgment, with respect to the subject matter in Section V, after giving notice to each defendant adversely affected. Upon such motion any such defendant not consenting thereto, shall have a reasonable opportunity to be heard in opposition to the proposed amendment or any part thereof and, in connection with such opposition, may elect to have said Section V of this Judgment vacated in its entirety as to it. Neither the Judgment nor the consents hereto shall operate as a bar or estoppel against the rights of plaintiff and of such defendant, respectively (1) to offer evidence in support of and in opposition to such proposed amendment; and, (2) to have all the issues this Court deems relevant and material to the disposition of such motion litigated in such hearing.

[Non-Exclusive Licensing]

VII.

(A) The defendants General Electric Company, Westinghouse Electric Corporation, Delta-Star Electric Company, Electrical Engineers Equipment Company, Railway and Industrial Engineering Company, and each of them, are hereby ordered and directed to grant to each applicant therefor, including any defendant named in this Judgment, a non-exclusive license to make, use and vend any disconnecting or grounding switches, or any parts of such switches, under any, some or all patents relating to disconnecting and grounding switches now owned or controlled by such defendant, or which are issued or applied for within five (5) years from the date of this Judgment, and are hereby enjoined and restrained from making any sale or other disposition of any of said patents which deprives it of the power or authority to grant such licenses unless it sells, transfers or assigns such patents and requires as a condition of such sale, transfer or assignment that the purchaser, transferee, or assignee shall observe the requirements of this Section VII and of Section VIII of this Judgment and the purchaser, transferee or assignee shall file with this Court prior to consummation of said transaction, an undertaking to be bound by said provisions of this Final Judgment.

(B) In the event that any one of the defendants, A. B. Chance Company, Cole Electric Company, Hi-Voltage Equipment Company, Pacific Electric Manufacturing Corporation, or Southern States Equipment Company, hereafter grants a license under any patents relating to disconnecting or grounding switches now owned or controlled by such defendant, or which are issued or applied for within five (5) years from the date of this Judgment, then and in such event all of the provisions of this Section VII shall become applicable to such defendant.

(C) Each defendant is hereby enjoined and restrained from including any restriction or condition whatsoever in any license or sublicense granted by it pursuant to the provisions of subsections (A) or (B) of this Section VII except that (1) the license may be non-transferable; (2) a reasonable non-discriminatory royalty may be charged; (3) reasonable provisions may be made for periodic inspection of the books and records of the licensee by an independent auditor or any person acceptable to the licensee who shall report to the licensor only the amount of the royalty due and payable; (4) reasonable provision may be made for cancellation of the license upon failure of the licensee to pay the royalties or to permit the inspection of his books and records as hereinabove provided; (5) the license may provide that the licensee may cancel the license at any time after one year from the initial date thereof by giving thirty (30) days notice in writing to the licensor; (6) the license must refer to and identify this Judgment.

(D) Upon receipt of a written request for a license under the provisions of subsections (A) or (B) of this Section VII, defendant shall advise the applicant in writing of the royalty which it deems reasonable for the patent or patents to which the request pertains. If the parties are unable to agree upon a reasonable royalty within sixty (60) days from the date such request for the license was received by the defendant, the applicant therefor may forthwith apply to this Court for the determination of a reasonable royalty, and the defendant shall, upon receipt of notice of the filing of such application, promptly give notice thereof to the Attorney General. In any such proceeding, the burden of proof shall be on the defendant owning or controlling said patents to establish the reasonableness of the royalty requested, and the reasonable royalty rates, if any, determined by this Court shall apply to the applicant and all other licensees under the same patent or patents. Pending the completion of negotiations or any such proceeding, the applicant shall have the right to make, use and vend any disconnecting or grounding switches under the patents to which its application pertains without payment of royalty or other compensation as above provided, but subject to the provisions of subsection (E) of this Section.

(E) Where the applicant has the right to make, use and vend any disconnecting or grounding switches under subsection (D) of this Section VII, said applicant or the defendant owning or controlling said patents may apply to this Court to fix an interim royalty rate pending final determination of what constitutes a reasonable royalty. If the Court fixes such interim royalty rate, defendant shall then issue and the applicant shall accept a license or, as the case may be, a sublicense, providing for the periodic payment of royalties at such interim rate from the date of the filing of such application by the applicant. If the applicant fails to accept such license or fails to pay the interim royalty in accordance therewith, such section shall be ground for the dismissal of his application, and his rights under subsection (D) shall terminate as to such patents applied for. Where an interim license or sublicense has been issued pursuant to this subsection, reasonable royalty rates, if any, as finally determined by the Court shall be retroactive for the applicant and all other licensees under the same patents to the date the applicant files his application with the Court.

(F) Nothing herein shall prevent any applicant from attacking in the aforesaid proceedings or in any other controversy, the validity or scope of any of the patents nor shall this Judgment be construed as importing any validity or value to any of the said patents.

(G) Each defendant is hereby enjoined and restrained from instituting or threatening to institute, or maintaining or continuing any action, suit or proceeding for acts of infringement of any disconnecting or grounding switch patent, required to be licensed by this Section VII, which acts of infringement have occurred prior to the date of this Judgment.

[Access to Records]

VIII.

For the purpose of securing compliance with this Judgment, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, upon written request of the Attorney General, or an Assistant Attorney General, and on reasonable notice to any defendant, be permitted (1) access during the office hours of said defendant to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of said defendant relating to any matters contained in this Judgment; and, (2) subject to the reasonable convenience of said defendant and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers or employees of said defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding such matters. For the purpose of securing compliance with this Judgment, any defendant, upon the written request of the Attorney General, or an Assistant Attorney General, shall submit such written reports with respect to any of the matters contained in this Judgment as from time to time may be necessary for the purpose of enforcement of this Judgment. No information obtained by the means provided in this Section VIII shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of such Department, except in the course of legal proceedings in which the United States is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this Judgment, or as otherwise required by law.

[Jurisdiction Retained]

IX.

Jurisdiction is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this Judgment to apply to this Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this Judgment, or the modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, or the enforcement of compliance therewith and for the punishment of violations thereof.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade Agreements—Lack of Enforcement against Others as Defense to Injunction.—Upon the fifth contempt proceeding against a pharmacist for violating an injunction prohibiting sale of certain items below the price fixed by the manufacturer, the pharmacist made assertions that those price agreements were not being enforced against other pharmacists selling the same items, and although the averments of the defendant were not taken to establish the truth about the alleged situation, they did at least disclose facts justifying a setting aside of the injunction and the filing of an answer to the original injunction complaint, by the defendant.

See the New York Fair Trade Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.83, Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7357.

WALTER, J.: [Digest] On June 8, 1945, there was entered, upon defendant's consent without trial or hearing, an order enjoining defendant from selling the products of certain named manufacturers at prices less than the minimum resale prices specified in fair trade agreements made by such manufacturers with respect thereto.

On this fifth motion to punish defendant for contempt in continuing violations of such injunction, defendant does not deny that it has sold below the specified prices but asserts that plaintiffs and other retail pharmacists are likewise selling such products below the stipulated minimum resale prices thereof; and cross-moves to vacate the injunction order and permit it to interpose an answer.

It asserts that its consent to the injunction was induced by representations that all violations of such fair trade agreements would be prosecuted and enjoined, but that in fact that has not been done and such violations are continuous and widespread and that by reason of such widespread price-cutting by its competitors, including plaintiffs, it has been and is forced to resort to similar price-cutting in order to stay in business.

I do not now say that the papers on this motion establish the truth of the assertion, but they at least disclose a situation which makes it proper that the subject be investigated upon a trial; and for that reason the motion to punish for contempt is denied and the cross-motion to vacate the injunction order of June 8, 1945, is granted, and defendant is given leave to answer the complaint.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. No. 18. October Term, 1949. December 1, 1949.

Appeal from the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Discrimination in Services and Facilities—Furnishing of Cosmetics Demonstrators—Intrastate Transactions and Interstate Competition.—A retail dealer in cosmetics who purchased his supplies from a manufacturer in intrastate transactions nevertheless is held to have stated a valid cause of action when he alleged that discrimination against him by not furnishing cosmetics demonstrators resulted in loss of some of his business to retailers in other states to whom such demonstrator services were accorded by the manufacturer. The manufacturer was held to have violated the anti-discrimination act by granting demonstrators to those out-of-state dealers, even though the plaintiff dealer, being in the same state as the manufacturer, might not have been able to enforce his demand for the same kind of services.

Reversing 81 Fed. Supp. 547, reported at ¶ 62,370.

Before L. HAND, SWAN and CLARK, Circuit Judges.

[Nature of Action]

L. HAND, Circuit Judge: This appeal is from a judgment, summarily dismissing an amended complaint under Rule 56, on the ground that there was "no genuine issue as to any material fact," in an action by the plaintiff for treble damages under the Robinson-Patman Act.[1] The following facts, appearing in the complaint and the accompanying affidavits, are to be taken as true. The plaintiff is a New York corporation, doing business in the City of New York, and the defendant is a Delaware corporation, which until January 1st, 1948, was the sole distributor of the cosmetic products of another corporation, Elizabeth Arden, Inc.; but which on that day leased the plant of Elizabeth Arden, Inc., and thereafter manufactured and sold the same products on its own account. The plaintiff owns a retail shop for the sale of cosmetics in the City of New York; its customers live in New York and New Jersey; and from 1938 until May, 1948, it was one of the defendant's "agencies" to sell the products of Elizabeth Arden, Inc. The defendant sold its products broadly during the time of the plaintiff's "agency," not only in New York and New Jersey, but in other states; and it supplied some "agencies" with assistants, known as "demonstrators," whose salaries it paid, in whole or in part; but the plaintiff was not among those to whom it did furnish a "demonstrator." The complaint alleged that "as a result of such discrimination" it "has been damaged in the sum of $15,600." Thus it appears that the complaint will permit the introduction of evidence to prove that the use of "demonstrators" by the plaintiff's New York and New Jersey competitors resulted in diverting some of its customers to them; and we shall dispose of the appeal upon this assumption. (The complaint also alleged that the defendant discriminated against the plaintiff "in allowing discounts, rebates, allowances or advertising charges to various competitors" in New York and New Jersey; but since it did not specify what these were, we shall confine ourselves to the discrimination in "demonstrators.") The judge dismissed the complaint upon the ground that all the transactions between the parties were in intrastate commerce and were therefore not covered by §§ d and e of Section 13 of the Robinson-Patman Act.

We held in Elizabeth Arden, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission[2] that the same discrimination of which the plaintiff here complains was a violation of subdivision e of the Robinson-Patman Act;[3] following the Eighth

[1] Section 13, Title 15, U. S. Code.
[2] 156 Fed. (2d) 132.
[3] § 13 (e), Title 15, U. S. C.

Circuit[4] which had read this subdivision as though the words, "engaged in commerce," were written into it, as they were in subdivision d. This ruling leaves open only two questions in the case at bar; first, whether it was an actionable wrong to deny the plaintiff, whose business is altogether intrastate, a favor which the defendant granted to "agencies" in other states; and second, whether, if so, it was necessary under Rule 9 (g) to allege "special damages."

[Acts Not Wholly Intra-State]

It would not inevitably follow that the Act would have been beyond the power of Congress, even though it had expressly prescribed that a seller should not discriminate between his intrastate customers as well as between his interstate; for it might be necessary to go so far, in order effectively to prevent discrimination between interstate customers. If that had been necessary, the situation would be within the doctrine of the Shreveport case.[5] Be that as it may, it was not necessary to regulate the defendant's intrastate transactions in order to prevent the defendant through its New Jersey "agencies" from discriminating against the plaintiff. The Act does not undertake to forbid a seller to grant favors to his customers, any more than it undertakes to compel him to grant them; it only insists that the distribution, if any, shall be equal. Congress clearly had power to control the terms of the defendant's contracts with its New Jersey "agencies"; and that was power enough, because equality involves only a comparison of two terms to be equalized, and may be achieved either by raising or by lowering one of them. Thus, the defendant violated the Act when it granted "demonstrators" to its New Jersey "agencies," regardless of whether it could have been compelled to grant a "demonstrator" to the plaintiff. True, the injury suffered by the plaintiff was to its intrastate business, but that is irrelevant. It is enough that the wrong be one of federal cognizance; its consequences are actionable whether or not they affect interests which are also of federal cognizance. To recover for injuries done by a violation of the Pure Food and Drug Act, for example, the sufferer need not himself be engaged in any federal activity; federal legislation is passed for the benefit of all citizens whom it may affect; the means provided to protect their interests must be within the constitutional powers of Congress, but the interests protected need not be.

The defendant answers that this conclusion runs counter to the decision of the Supreme Court in Federal Trade Commission v. Bunte Brothers,[6] but an analysis of that decision shows the contrary. The Federal Trade Commission had there determined that, in selling candy, "break and take" packages were an "unfair method of competition," because they made the purchase a kind of a gamble. Although Bunte Brothers sold candy in "break and take" packages only within the State of Illinois, their use of them imposed a competitive handicap upon those candy makers who imported candy into that state, and whom the Commission had forbidden to use such packages. In order to put these importers on even terms with Bunte Brothers, the Commission ordered Bunte Brothers to "cease and desist" from using "break and take" packages; and it was this order that the court reversed. It did not hold that Congress might not have gone so far under the doctrine of the Shreveport case, supra,[7] but it did hold that Congress had not done so.

The decision is certainly not in point here, so far as concerns the competition with the plaintiff of the defendant's New Jersey favored "agencies," because, for the reasons already given, control over those "agencies" alone was enough. That was not true of Bunte Brothers, for nothing short of direct impact upon their selling would serve. However, the decision does raise a question as to any claim the plaintiff may make for losses arising from the competition of favored New York "agencies." That discrimination would be between favored and excluded "agencies," both intrastate; and, as we have already said, the question would be whether it was essential to include intrastate sales in order effectively to prevent discrimination in interstate. At first blush it is not apparent why that should be necessary, at least if there are enough favored "agencies" in other states to prevent diversion of customers from them to New York

[4] Elizabeth Arden Sales Corp. v. Gus Blass Co., 150 Fed. (2d) 988, cert. den., 326 U. S. 773.
[5] Houston, East and West Texas Railway Co. v. United States, 234 U. S. 342.

[7] 234 U. S. 342.

"agencies," and enough favored "agencies" in New York to prevent diversion of customers from them to "agencies" in other states. However, the question cannot be answered a priori; and in the case at bar it will depend upon the character of the defendant's business. Moreover, the point was not argued upon this appeal, nor is it necessary to a decision, for, as we have said, the complaint in any event presented a case for relief as to the New Jersey favored "agencies." Upon the trial, if the plaintiff seeks to claim any diversion of its customers because of the competition of New York favored "agencies," the facts can be developed.

[Measure of Damages]

There remains the question of damages. The plaintiff will be entitled under its general allegation to prove all damages from the diversion of its customers to those New Jersey "agencies," to whom the defendant furnished "demonstrators," so far as that was due to the "demonstrators." Whether it may also recover for the diversion of customers to New York "agencies," to whom the defendant furnished "demonstrators," raises the question which we have just discussed. It will be desirable upon a trial to take a special verdict stating separately the loss, arising from the competition of New Jersey "agencies" and the loss, if any, arising from the competition of New York "agencies." There only remains the question whether the measure of the plaintiff's damages can in any event be the salary of a "demonstrator." The Eighth Circuit by a divided court held that it can,[8] and we agree that it would be a proper limit upon the plaintiff's recovery; for, if the loss caused by the diversion of its customers to favored "agencies" was greater than the cost of employing a "demonstrator," it would be its duty to minimize the damages by employing one; but we do not think that it is otherwise relevant. The only proper proof of damages is the loss to the plaintiff's business, and the salary of a "demonstrator" is not such a loss. Therefore, the allegation of the complaint was adequate, for the plaintiff's business losses are not "special damages."

Judgment reversed; cause remanded.

[Concurring Opinion]

SWAN, Circuit Judge: I concur only because I feel constrained to follow this court's decision in Elizabeth Arden, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 156 F. 2d 132, cert. den. 331 U. S. 806. Were the question open I would give the statute, section 13 (e), a more restrictive reading and would hold that the forbidden "discrimination" must not only favor an interstate purchaser but must harm an interstate purchaser from the defendant. In the Supreme Court of the United States. No. 22. October Term, 1949. December 5, 1949.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Sufficiency of Evidence—Partiality of Judge Not Shown—Interlocking Management—Necessity of Intent in Proof.—Upon an appeal under the Expediting Act, where the issue submitted for review by the Supreme Court is the sufficiency of the evidence to support the trial court's findings of fact, virtually all the findings being challenged by the government, the court holds that no clear abuse of discretion is attributable to the lower court, and that the mere fact that all questions were resolved in favor of defendants cannot be said to indicate any partiality on the judge's part, where the evidence of the government consisted mainly of inferences drawn from exhibits, and the evidence of defendants consisted mainly of oral testimony contradicting those inferences.

A dissenting opinion holds that more weight should have been given to the inferences drawn from showings that the dominant stockholder of the cab manufacturing company was also an important manager of cab operating companies, and that error was committed in holding intent to suppress competition to be indispensable in proof of violation of the Sherman Act.

Affirming 80 Fed. Supp. 936, reported at ¶ 62,333.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Nature of Appeal]

This suit in equity, under §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1 and 2, originally included three charges of violation: (1) conspiracy to restrain and monopolize transportation of interstate travelers by taxicab between Chicago railroad stations and their homes, offices and hotels; (2) conspiracy to eliminate competition for the business of transporting passengers between different Chicago railroad stations; and (3) conspiracy to restrain and monopolize the sale of taxicabs by control of the principal companies operating them in Chicago, New York, Pittsburgh and Minneapolis. On a previous appeal this Court held the first of the charges not to state a case within the statute, and that charge no longer concerns us. United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U. S. 218. The court below found that the Government failed to prove the second charge and no appeal is taken from that part of the judgment, so that charge has been eliminated. We have held that the residue of the complaint, embodying the third charge, alleges a cause of action within the statute, but only on the expressed assumption that the facts alleged are true, United States v. Yellow Cab Company, supra, at 224; but the trial court has found that the Government, at the trial, has failed on all the evidence to prove its case. 80 F. Supp. 936. The cause is before us by a direct appeal under the Expediting Act, 15 U. S. C. § 29, and not by an exercise of our discretionary jurisdiction.

The first question proposed by the Government is whether the evidence sustains the findings of fact by the District Court This is the basic issue, and the Government raises no question of law that has an existence independent of it. This issue of fact does not arise upon the trial court's disregard or misunderstanding of some definite and well-established fact. It extends to almost every detail of the decision, the Government saying that the trial court "ignored . . . substantially all of the facts which the Government deemed significant."

What the Government asks, in effect, is that we try the case de novo on the record, reject nearly all of the findings of the trial court, and substitute contrary findings of our own. Specifications of error which are fundamental to its case ask us to reweigh the evidence and review findings that are almost entirely concerned with imponderables, such as the intent of parties to certain 1929 business transactions, whether corporate officers were then acting in personal or official capacities, what was the design and purpose and intent of those who carried out twenty-year-old transactions, and whether they had legitimate business motives or were intending to restrain trade of their competitors in car manufacture, such as General Motors, Ford, Chrysler and Packard.

These were the chief fact issues in a trial of three weeks' duration. The Government relied in large part on inferences from its 485 exhibits, introduced by nine witnesses. The defendants relied heavily on oral testimony to contradict those inferences. The record is before us in 1,674 closely-printed pages.

[Judgment Supported by Evidence]

The Government suggests that the opinion of the trial court "seems to reflect uncritical acceptance of defendants' evidence and of defendants' views as to the facts to be given consideration in passing upon the legal issues before the Court." We see that it did indeed accept defendants' evidence and sustained defendants' view of the facts. But we are unable to discover the slightest justification for the accusation that it did so "uncritically." Also, it rejected the inferences the Government drew from its documents, but we find no justification for the statement that it "ignored" them. The judgment below is supported by an opinion, prepared with obvious care, which analyzes the evidence and shows the reasons for the findings. To us it appears to represent the considered judgment of an able trial judge, after patient hearing, that the Government's evidence fell short of its allegations—a not uncommon form of litigation casualty, from which the Government is no more immune than others.

Only last term we accepted the view then advanced by the Government that for triers of fact totally to reject an opposed view impeaches neither their impartiality nor the propriety of their conclusions. We said, "We are constrained to reject the court's conclusion that an objective finder of fact could not resolve all factual conflicts arising in a legal proceeding in favor of one litigant. The ordinary lawsuit, civil or criminal, normally depends for its resolution on which version of the facts in dispute is accepted by the triers of fact. . . ." Labor Board v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 337 U. S. 656, 659.

Rule 52, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, provides, among other things:

> "Findings of fact shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous, and due regard shall be given to the opportunity of the trial court to judge of the credibility of the witnesses."

Findings as to the design, motive and intent with which men act depend peculiarly upon the credit given to witnesses by those who see and hear them. If defendants' witnesses spoke the truth, the findings are admittedly justified. The trial court listened to and observed the officers who had made the records from which the Government would draw an inference of guilt and concluded that they bear a different meaning from that for which the Government contends.

It ought to be unnecessary to say that Rule 52 applies to appeals by the Government as well as to those by other litigants. There is no exception which permits it, even in an antitrust case, to come to this Court for what virtually amounts to a trial de novo on the record of such findings as intent, motive and design. While, of course, it would be our duty to correct clear error, even in findings of fact, the Government has failed to establish any greater grievance here than it might have in any case where the evidence would support a conclusion either way but where the trial court has decided it to weigh more heavily for the defendants. Such a choice between two permissible views of the weight of evidence is not "clearly erroneous."

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice Douglas and Mr. Justice Clark took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

[Dissenting Opinion]

Mr. Justice Black, with whom Mr. Justice Reed concurs, dissenting.

The evidence showed here without dispute that a manufacturer of taxicabs through a series of stock purchases obtained 62% of the stock of a corporation which itself had large stock interests in local companies operating taxicabs. The man who was president, general manager, director, and dominant stockholder in the taxicab manufacturing company also held an important managerial position in the corporate network that carried on the business of the local taxicab operating companies. The findings of the District Court were that the affiliated ownership, management and control were not the result of any deliberate or calculated purpose of the manufacturing company to control the operating companies' purchases of taxicabs, and that no compulsion had been exercised to control such purchases. Consequently the trial court held that despite the integration of corporate management there was no violation of the Sherman Act. I think that the trial court erred in holding that a formed intent to suppress competition is an indispensable element of violations of the Sherman Act.

In United States v. Griffith, 334 U. S. 100, 105, 106, we said:

> "It is, however, not always necessary to find a specific intent to restrain trade or to build a monopoly in order to find that the anti-trust laws have been violated. It is sufficient that a restraint of trade or monopoly results as the consequence of a defendant's conduct or business arrangements. United States v. Patten, 226 U. S. 525, 543; United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265, 275. To require a greater showing would cripple the Act. . . . [E]ven if we accept the District Court's findings that appellees had no intent or purpose unreasonably to restrain trade or to monopolize, we are left with the question whether a necessary and direct result of the master agreements was the restraining or monopolizing of trade within the meaning of the Sherman Act."

Measured by this test the findings of the trial court here fail to support its legal conclusions that no violation of the Sherman Act had been proven. Since the trial court went on the assumption that subjective intent to suppress competition is an essential ingredient of Sherman law violations, it did not make specific findings as to whether the freedom of the taxicab companies to buy taxicabs from other manufacturers had been hobbled by the defendants' business arrangements, regardless of compulsion or intent to destroy competition. There was much evidence tending to show this hobbling of competition. I think that the allegations of the complaint were sufficiently broad to present this issue for adjudication by the court. Moreover, presentation of the issue was emphasized by the fact that a large amount of evidence to prove successful accomplishment of monopoly or restraints of trade was admitted without any objection by the defendants based on variance from the pleadings. See Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15 (b).

There is evidence in the record to the effect that as a result of the corporate arrangements here the manufacturing company obtained sufficient power to dictate the terms of purchases by the local companies; there is also evidence that those companies did thereafter limit their purchases of taxicabs almost exclusively to those sold by the manufacturing defendant. Moreover, the evidence shows that such taxicabs were in some instances bought by the local company at prices above those paid by other taxicab companies wholly free to buy taxicabs in a competitive market. This evidence, if accepted, would support a finding of illegal restraint of trade or monopoly under the Griffith rule. I think the cause should be remanded for the trial court to consider the evidence and make findings on this aspect of the case.

[¶ 62,523] T. Bryce Venable, trading as Venable's Jewelers and Venable's Jewelry Store v. J. Engel & Co., Inc., etc.

In the Court of Appeals of Maryland. No. 10, October Term, 1949. Filed November 8, 1949.

Appeal from the Circuit Court for Worcester County.

Maryland Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade Agreements—Advertising Below Established Price—Wilfully or Knowingly Advertising.—The running of an advertisement offering watches at reduced prices and showing a fair trade watch with its name barely distinguishable in the picture does not violate a Fair Trade statute when in the advertisement no particular price is set on that watch.

See the Maryland Fair Trade Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8364.01, Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7310.

Fair Trade Law—Strict Construction—Price Misrepresentation.—The display of a fair trade watch with a tag saying "Now ——", followed by a marked price which was in fact the fair trade price, does not amount to a violation of the fair trade agreement even though it may convey the implication that the price has been reduced. The Fair Trade Act, being in derogation of common law, must be strictly construed. The Fair Trade Act does not forbid false representations as to price.

See the Maryland Fair Trade Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8364.01, Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7310.

For appellants: Godfrey Child, Pocomoke City, Md., and Samuel K. Dennis, Baltimore, Md.

For appellee: John O. Herrmann, Baltimore, Md. (Jacob S. New, Baltimore, on the brief).

Before MARBURY, Ch. J.; DELAPLAINE, COLLINS, GRASON, HENDERSON and MARKELL, JJ.

DELAPLAINE, J.: This suit was brought by Engel & Co., Inc., wholesale jeweler with principal place of business in Baltimore, to restrain T. Bryce Venable, trading in Pocomoke City and Crisfield as Venable's Jewelry Store, from wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any Hamilton watches at less than the minimum resale prices established by contract made in pursuance of the Fair Trade Act. Code 1939, Code Supp. 1947, art. 83, secs. 102-110.

By the contract made January 12, 1948, complainant as regional wholesale distributor for the Hamilton Watch Company, of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, appointed defendant a retailer of Hamilton watches, and defendant promised that he would not advertise, offer for sale or sell any of these watches at less than established minimum prices.

Subsequently defendant employed the National Sales Company, of New York, to promote a price reduction sale at his stores. A representative of that company, after inspecting defendant's stock of jewelry and watches, made plans for a sale to commence May 27, 1948. He designed a double page advertisement for insertion in the Eastern Shore News, a newspaper published in Onancock, Virginia, and selling about 500 copies on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. He also distributed thousands of copies of the advertisement in the form of handbills.

The advertisement contained ten small pictures of watches. In connection with these pictures was the following statement: "During this sale you can buy a good dependable watch. Reductions range up to one-half off." On the dial of one of the pictures was the word "Hamilton" in very small letters. When the attention of Otho Thompson, a competitor of defendant in Pocomoke City, was called to the word "Hamilton" in tiny letters on the picture, he mailed the advertisement to the Hamilton Watch Company at Lancaster, and that company thereupon forwarded it to complainant at Baltimore.

On June 16 complainant instituted suit for an injunction in the Circuit Court for Worcester County, alleging that defendant had violated the terms of the resale price contract. Defendant denied the allegation. At the trial of the case he asserted that he was not aware that the word "Hamilton" was on one of the illustrations in the advertisement until June 16, when he was notified of the institution of the suit. He explained that the representative of the National Sales Company had prepared the copy for the advertisement, listing the prices exactly as given to him, and that he had left blank spaces for the cuts to be furnished by the Eastern Shore News for pictures of jewelry and watches.

Section 107 of the Fair Trade Act provides that wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of the Act, whether the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby. It is unquestioned that a court of equity may grant injunctive relief in a proper case for violation of a resale price contract made pursuant to the Fair Trade Act. Goldsmith v. Mead Johnson & Co., 176 Md. 682, 7 A. 2d 176, 125 A. L. R. 1339; Hutzler Bros. Co. v. Remington Putnam Book Co., 186 Md. 210, 46 A. 2d 101, 163 A. L. R. 884.

[No Evidence of Sale]

In the instant case complainant failed to produce any evidence that defendant had ever offered for sale or sold any Hamilton watches below the minimum prices established by the resale price contract. During the period of the price reduction sale, defendant had five Hamilton watches on display in the window of his jewelry store in Pocomoke City, but he declared that he did not sell one Hamilton watch during the sale. John G. Evans, of Atlantic City, employed as a traveling salesman by complainant, saw the five Hamilton watches in the window about the time of the institution of the suit, and admitted on the stand that the price marked on the card for each watch was the established price. Thompson, defendant's competitor, claimed that the word "reduced" appeared on each card; but complainant's traveling salesman substantiated the testimony of defendant that the word "now," and not the word "reduced," was on the card with the established price.

The chancellor granted a permanent injunction. He found (1) that defendant did not offer for sale or sell any Hamilton watches at less than the established prices, but (2) that he did advertise the watches for sale in violation of the terms of the contract. Hence, the question before us on this appeal from the chancellor's decree is merely whether defendant advertised any Hamilton watches for sale in violation of the terms of the contract. It is acknowledged, of course, that a court of equity must not issue an injunction to restrain an alleged wrong which complainant has not proved to have occurred or which does not appear likely to occur. Hecht Co. v. Rosenberg, 165 Md. 116, 120, 166 A. 440.

While the advertisement in this case offered "good dependable" watches at reductions ranging up to ½ off, it did not expressly offer reductions on all watches, nor on Hamilton watches. Even assuming that the advertisement indicated by implication that defendant was offering Hamilton watches for sale at reduced prices, and that the word "Hamilton" on one of the pictures was clearly legible, the fact remains that the advertisement did not specify any price for any Hamilton watch. It is needless to conjecture whether defendant actually hoped to convey the impression that the prices of Hamilton watches had been reduced below the minimum resale prices. We take occasion to observe, however, that while the cards on some of the other watches were marked with two prices, i. e., the original price crossed out and the reduced price, the card on each Hamilton watch was marked with only the price established by the contract. Moreover, there was a wide difference between the Hamilton prices and the prices on other watches. In the advertisement some of the watches were priced at $19.75. The minimum established price for the Hamiltons was $52.25. If anyone had the impression that a Hamilton could be bought for $19.75, he would have found that his impression was erroneous by glancing in the window.

[Law Strictly Construed]

In any event, neither the advertisement of sale nor the window display of Hamilton watches constituted a breach of contract. The Fair Trade Act is in derogation of the general rule of the common law that any person has the right to sell his property at any price that he and the purchaser may agree upon, and the courts should accordingly construe the Act strictly and should not infer that the Legislature intended to change any common-law principle beyond what the Act explicitly provides. Years ago the practice of advertising prices as being reduced when they were actually not reduced was condemned by the Federal Trade Commission as an unfair method of competition in violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act. 15 U. S. C. A., sec. 45; Federal Trade Commission v. Standard Education Society, 302 U. S. 112, 58 S. Ct. 113, 82 L. Ed. 141; Henderson, The Federal Trade Commission, 196-200. Unlike the Federal Trade Commission Act and the Federal Securities Act, the Fair Trade Act does not forbid false representations as to prices. The purpose of the Fair Trade Act is to protect commodities subject to trade which, independent of their physical value, embody a trade-mark, brand or copyright which is recognized by governmental agencies as a valuable property right vested by law in the inventor or author. Schill v. Remington Putnam Book Co., 179 Md. 83, 88, 22 A. 2d 128. The Act aims merely to prohibit retailers from wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any such commodity at less than the price stipulated in the resale price contract. In this case complainant failed to prove that defendant had advertised any Hamilton watch for sale at less than the minimum established price. Assuming that defendant did offer price reductions on Hamilton watches, regardless of whether the word "now," or even the word "reduced," appeared on the cards in the window, he had the right to raise or reduce prices at any time and to offer the watches for sale at any prices he chose, provided that they were not below the established prices.

As complainant failed to prove the allegations of the bill that defendant had violated the terms of the contract, we must reverse the decree of the chancellor granting the injunction.

Decree reversed and bill of complaint dismissed, with costs.

In the California District Court of Appeals for the Second District, Division I. Civil No. 17050. October 20, 1949.

Appeal from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County. Modified and affirmed.

California Unfair Practices Act

Sales Below Cost—Intent to Injure Competition—Meeting Competitor's Prices—Presumption of Intent.—Where it appeared that a laundry offered its services at prices below cost only for the purpose of meeting the legal prices of its competitors, it was held that there was lacking the intent to injure competitors or competition which would be requisite in proving violation of the Unfair Practices Act. The presumption that sales below cost are made to injure competition also disappears upon such a showing of evidence.

See the California Unfair Practices annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8068.10.

Unfair Competition—Enticement of Customers—Justification and Retaliation.—Exemplary damages were awarded upon finding that a laundry had engaged in unfair competitive practices by surreptitiously obtaining the customer lists of a competitor laundry and enticing those customers by offering free service to them for a limited time. The fact that the other laundry was offering its services below cost, and a desire to recapture customers lost to that laundry, were held insufficient justification for such illegal competitive methods.

For respondent Maurice B. Sandler: Sydney J. Dunitz and Malcolm Archbald.

Before WHITE, P. J.; DORAN and DRAPEAU, JJ.

DRAPEAU, J.: [Digest] The [county] court found among other things: That plaintiff prepared and owned lists of customers, which defendant's employee Barr acquired by taking them from plaintiff's delivery truck as instructed by his employer;

That without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, defendant using such lists located a large proportion of plaintiff's customers and offered and gave them free diaper laundry service;

That such conduct of defendant "was deliberately intended to ruthlessly and seriously injure plaintiff's business, and was prompted by ill will toward plaintiff; and in engaging in such conduct defendant was guilty of oppression and malice";

That a majority of such listed customers accepted defendant's offer and discontinued service with plaintiff;

That plaintiff sold certain service below his cost and below the lowest competitive price, but the purpose thereof was not to injure competitors or destroy competition;

That defendant's conduct was not justified by plaintiff's conduct, defendant's acts going "beyond any acts that might have been committed as so justified".

This action was brought under the Unfair Practices Act (Bus. & Prof. Code. § 17000 et seq.), section 17043 thereof making it unlawful either to sell at less than cost or give away any article or product, for the purpose of injuring competitors or destroying competition. However, section 17050(d) of the act permits sales below cost for the purpose of meeting competition.

Appellant by its answer admitted it offered free service to respondent's customers for limited periods of time, but sought to justify such conduct on the ground it was done to meet respondent's unfair practices, to wit: his advertisements that he would render certain designated services knowing that his cost therefor greatly exceeded the advertised price.

Robert Gordon, an officer of appellant corporation, managed the Crib Service and in September of 1947, he and Robert Cunningham, owner of the Tidy Didy Baby Laundry of Long Beach, called on respondent to protest with respect to a $1.00 a week diaper service which respondent was then advertising. According to the witness Gordon, respondent told these men that he was just starting, and in order to increase volume and build up his business, he had to cut prices. Thereafter, appellant "embarked on a plan to protect our interest there," which embodied a plan to take respondent's customers away from him.

With respect to his understanding of the meaning of the ad offering "complete baby laundry service for as low as $1 per week," respondent testified he meant "that my prices started at $1 per week and continued on upward depending upon the type of service the customer desired and the number of times a week a delivery and pick-up were made. . . . I meant that, in our plant, we catered exclusively to babies. We handled no other line of laundry work whatsoever. We have a complete baby laundry service to offer each mother, whether she spends $1 a week with us or whether she spends four or $5 a week, as the case may be."

In answer to the question: "In connection with the price structure you set up for your business and in connection with the advertising you caused to have placed in the newspapers, did you have any intent to injure your competitors?" appellant stated: "None whatsoever." On recross-examination, respondent testified he intended to get as many customers as he could as the result of his advertising, and from whatever source possible. When asked "Then it was immaterial to you who had the customer at that time and what price they were paying. You were going to sell them for less and get the business?"—respondent replied: "I was going to sell them for my prices."

"The law prohibits, not all sales at less than cost, but only sales which are accompanied by the requisite intention or purpose —i. e., the purpose of injuring competitors or destroying competition. Unless the fact of intention is shown to have existed, the conclusion is that the sale did not constitute a violation of the statute." (11 Cal. Jur. 10-Yr. Supp. (1948 Pocket Part), p. 75 and authorities there cited.)

The testimony hereinbefore recited sufficiently rebuts the presumption raised by section 17071, supra, to wit: that any sales made by respondent below cost were for the purpose of destroying competition or injuring competitors; and substantially supports the trial court's finding complained of. Moreover, the evidence is sufficient to establish that respondent's advertising was placed and the sales were made "to meet the legal prices of a competitor," permitted by section 17050(d), supra.

Referring to the claim that punitive damages were improperly awarded, the court found that because of its conduct, appellant was guilty of oppression and malice. In such cases, exemplary damages may be imposed under section 3294 of the Civil Code.

[¶ 62,525] Opinion of the Attorney General of Kentucky.

Addressed to the Hon. William R. Smith, Secretary, Kentucky Retail Food Dealers' Association, by A. E. Funk, Attorney General, Guy L. Dickinson, Assistant Attorney General. November 30, 1949.

Kentucky Unfair Practices Act

Computation of Minimum Selling Price.—An item costing $1.00 per dozen, with 2 per cent discount allowed the retailer for cash payment within ten days, must be sold at no less than 9 cents in order not to violate the Unfair Practices Act, where 10 per cent of the cost of the item is allocable to the retailer's operating overhead.

See the Kentucky Unfair Practices annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8308.35.

We have your letter of November 29, 1949, enclosing copy of the Resolution, UNFAIR PRACTICE ACT, also copy of the Resolution, ATTEMPTS BY MANUFACTURERS TO ESTABLISH RETAIL PRICES.

You have called upon this department to give you an opinion on the example case listed below as to the minimum selling price of said article.

"Item A cost $1.00 per dozen less 2% cash discount if paid in ten days from date of invoice;

"The cost of operation in doing business is 10% in this particular store;

"What would be the minimum selling price of only one can of item A without violating the Unfair Practice Act."

We are of the opinion that the minimum selling price would be 9¢, taking into consideration that the 2% discount is deducted for cash payment in ten days.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit. Nos. 13,789, 13,790. December 13, 1949.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Sufficiency of Indictment—Allegations of Interstate Commerce—Flow of Perishable Commodity.—Allegation that a charged conspiracy between dairies affected the consumers' price on milk purchased by the dairies from producers in another state, is held a sufficient statement of the interstate aspect of violation of the antitrust laws. Milk being a perishable commodity, it was within the contemplation of the dairies that the milk should continue its course to the consumer without being stored like ordinary merchandise and thus breaking the interstate movement.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1630.210, 1630.217.

Sufficiency of Evidence—Circumstantial Evidence—Uniform Prices—Evidence Consistent with Innocence.—A charge to the jury is correct which states that circumstantial evidence must not only prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt but must further be inconsistent with any rational conclusion other than that of guilt.

Where producers' prices for milk are fixed by government regulation, where quality standards for milk are set by city ordinance, and where labor costs are fixed by union contract, all being the same to two dairies so that costs become substantially the same, uniformity in price and simultaneity in price changes could reasonably result from the operation of ordinary competitive economic forces, and where in addition the dairies introduce evidence tending to show competition in the industry, it is held that the circumstantial evidence is as consistent with innocent and lawful conduct as it is with guilt, and therefore is not sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty.

Admissibility of Evidence—Prejudicial Statements.—Evidence introduced by the government, showing ownership of a defendant dairy by a foreign corporation and showing the high salaries paid to certain officers of the dairies, has no bearing on a question of conspiracy, is prejudicial, and warrants reversal of a verdict of guilty.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1630.622.

Before GARDNER, Chief Judge, and THOMAS and RIDDICK, Circuit Judges.

GARDNER, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Nature of the Action]

Appellants, Pevely Dairy Company and St. Louis Dairy Company, were convicted for engaging in a conspiracy to fix wholesale and retail prices on Grade A regular milk in the St. Louis area, within the State of Missouri, in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act (15 U. S. C., Sec. 1). These two dairy companies, sometimes referred to in the record as handlers, were indicted with six individuals who were officers or employees of the dairy companies. The indictment charged that the corporate defendants, as handlers, sold and distributed approximately 63 per cent of the fluid milk consumed in the St. Louis area, and that for a period of approximately ten years prior to the return of the indictment the defendants had engaged in an unlawful conspiracy to fix uniform and noncompetitive retail and wholesale prices of fluid milk; that the conspiracy consisted of an agreement and concert of action in that the corporate defendants would charge uniform and non-competitive retail and wholesale prices for fluid milk and that neither corporate defendant would make any change in price until an agreement had been reached that the other corporate defendant would make an identical change; that the corporate defendants on the several dates set out in the indictment, covering a period from July 3, 1946, to January 27, 1948 (which period, by supplemental bill of particulars, was extended to include changes in April, 1942, and June 30, 1946, and seven other such changes between April, 1938, and April 1, 1942), fixed uniform prices for fluid milk, both at wholesale and at retail; that the result of the conspiracy was to increase, stabilize and otherwise control and fix prices to consumers throughout the St. Louis area of milk produced in the States of Illinois and Missouri and shipped into the St. Louis area, and to suppress competition between the corporate defendants; that more than one-half of the fluid milk sold by the corporate defendants in the St. Louis area was produced in the State of Illinois and shipped into the St. Louis area; that fluid milk is perishable by nature, can not be stored, and must reach the consumer within a short time after production, and that from day to day there is a continuous flow of milk from producers in the States of Illinois and Missouri to retail and wholesale purchasers in the St. Louis area.

The corporate defendants, as well as the individual defendants, filed motions to dismiss on the ground that the indictment did not charge an offense under the laws of the United States, and particularly under Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, in that the restraints alleged were in intrastate commerce because the raw milk came to rest and was intermingled in Missouri before the corporate defendants processed and converted it into Grade A milk, and that the indictment failed to charge that the alleged price control constituted a direct and substantial burden upon interstate commerce. These motions to dismiss were overruled. The defendants filed motions for a bill of particulars which the court in part sustained, and in the bill of particulars furnished by the government it was recited that the government had no direct evidence of an express written or oral agreement among the defendants but that it would rely upon evidence from which an oral agreement might be implied.

Their motions to dismiss having been overruled, all defendants entered pleas of not guilty. At the conclusion of the government's evidence, and again at the conclusion of all the testimony, the defendants interposed motions for judgment of acquittal. The ruling of the court on these motions was reserved. The jury returned a verdict of guilty as to the corporate defendants and acquitted all the individual defendants. Subsequent to the verdict the corporate defendants filed their motions for judgment of acquittal notwithstanding the verdict or in the alternative for a new trial, which motions were overruled by the court and the corporate defendants were adjudged guilty and sentenced to pay fines of $5,000 each.

The Pevely Dairy Company and the St. Louis Dairy Company are the largest milk distributors in the St. Louis area. They are engaged in the selling of fluid milk, butter, eggs and various milk products in the City of St. Louis. There are approximately thirty-five dairies which sell milk products in this marketing area. The two corporate defendants handle approximately 63 per cent of the fluid milk in the St. Louis area. This milk was delivered by producers to the dairies in St. Louis by the producers' trucks or by independent truckers employed by the producers and the price paid by the dairies was an f. o. b. price at their plants in St. Louis, and any milk which did not meet the requirements of the St. Louis milk ordinance was rejected and remained the property of the producers. When the milk was received at the plants of the dairy companies at St. Louis it was inspected, cooled, pasteurized, bottled and capped before it was ready for sale and delivery. Further facts will be developed in the course of this opinion.

[Arguments on Appeal]

The appellants have taken separate appeals but their appeals have been submitted upon a single record and will be considered in one opinion. Reversal is sought on substantially the following grounds: (1) The indictment fails to charge a conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act in that the alleged restraints were in intrastate commerce because the raw milk transported from Illinois came to rest, was intermingled with milk produced in Missouri, processed and converted into Grade A milk before it was sold, and in that the indictment charges that appellants were regulating milk prices wholly in the State of Missouri, and fails to allege that such alleged price control constituted a direct and substantial burden upon interstate commerce. (2) The government's testimony was insufficient to sustain a conviction for conspiracy, the evidence being wholly circumstantial and being as consistent with innocence as with guilt; and hence, the motions for acquittal at the close of the government's case should have been sustained. (3) The court erred in the admission of certain evidence. (4) The individual defendants who were the agents of the appellants and the immediate actors in the alleged conspiracy having been acquitted by the jury, the verdict of guilty as to appellants can not stand.

The Sherman Anti-Trust Act, so far as here material, reads as follows:

> "Sec. 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. * * * Every person who shall make any contract or engage in any combination or conspiracy hereby declared illegal shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

Appellants in effect urge two grounds for their attack on the indictment. It is urged that the alleged restraint and conspiracy has to do only with the distribution of milk in the State of Missouri, and hence, this being an intrastate transaction, is not the subject of congressional control. All the acts charged against the appellants were alleged to have been committed within the State of Missouri. The indictment charged, however, that the alleged conspiracy "has had the effect, as intended by the defendants, of increasing, stabilizing, and otherwise controlling and fixing prices to consumers and other purchasers of fluid milk sold by the corporate defendants throughout the St. Louis area of fluid milk produced in the States of Illinois and Missouri and shipped from said States into said area, and of suppressing competition between the defendants * * * and has had the effect thereby of restraining the hereinbefore described interstate trade and commerce in fluid milk."

The indictment, in prior paragraphs, charged that the fluid milk sold and distributed in St. Louis was produced in the States of Illinois and Missouri and that the milk produced in Illinois was transported into St. Louis. The mere fact that the alleged conspiracy had to do solely with acts to be performed in the State of Missouri and was limited to the matter of the distribution of milk and the fixing of prices within the State of Missouri, is not necessarily determinative of the issue. If intrastate transactions affect interstate commerce they may properly be the subject of federal legislation. Swift & Company v. United States, 196 U. S. 375; United States v. Women's Sportswear Mfgrs. Assn., 336 U. S. 460; Standard Oil Company v. United States, 337 U. S. 293. In United States v. Women's Sportswear Mfgrs. Assn., supra, it is, among other things, said,

> "The trial court appears to have dismissed the case chiefly on the ground that the accused Association and its members were not themselves engaged in interstate commerce. This may or may not be the nature of their operation considered alone, but it does not matter. Restraints, to be effective, do not have to be applied all along the line of movement of interstate commerce. The source of the restraint may be intrastate, as it often is; but neither matters if the necessary effect is to stifle or restrain commerce among the states. If it is interstate commerce that feels the pinch, it does not matter how local the operation which applies the squeeze."

Under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act a combination formed for the purpose and with the effect of fixing the price of a commodity in interstate or foreign commerce is illegal per se. United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150. We must now accept the doctrine as well established that Congress, in enacting the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, intended to exercise its full constitutional power with respect to restraints on commercial competition. Atlantic Cleaners & Dyers v. United States, 286 U. S. 427; Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U. S. 469; United States v. Frankfort Distilleries, 324 U. S. 293; United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Assn., 322 U. S. 533.

["Interstate Commerce" Sufficiently Alleged]

We think the indictment sufficiently charged that the effect of the alleged conspiracy was to restrain or stifle interstate commerce and that the trial court had jurisdiction of the offense charged, unless, as contended by the appellants, the milk, when it came to rest for the purpose of being processed and prepared for distribution by the appellants, lost its character as a commodity of interstate commerce.

On this phase of the case it is the contention of the government that the sales by appellants occurred in the course of interstate commerce because the flow of fluid milk from producers in Illinois remained in interstate commerce until it reached the utimate consumer and that the course of interstate commerce was not interrupted by the temporary stoppage which would not essentially obstruct or delay such flow.

Fluid milk is a perishable commodity which can not be stored as can ordinary merchandise. It is essential that the milk as transported from Illinois and received by appellants be sold and delivered each day and this was the manifest usage and course of business of the appellants. It was within the contemplation of the parties that the milk should continue its course until delivered by the handlers to consumers in the St. Louis area. As said by the Supreme Court in Swift & Company v. United States, supra, "commerce among the states is not a technical legal conception, but a practical one drawn from the course of business." The flow of milk until delivered by the distributors to the consumers in the St. Louis area, as charged in the indictment, establishes its interstate character. It was the expectation of both the producers and the handlers that the milk would be shipped in interstate commerce and we are of the view that the fluid milk thus shipped in interstate commerce remained in that commerce until it reached the ultimate consumers. Binderup v. Pathe Exchange, 263 U. S. 291; United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Assn., supra; White Bear Theater Corp. v. State Theater Corp., 8 Cir., 129 F. 2d 600. In Binderup v. Pathe Exchange, supra, the court said,

> "The general rule is that where transportation has acquired an interstate character 'it continues at least until the load reaches the point where the parties originally intended that the movement should finally end.'"

We think the indictment sufficiently charged an offense under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and that the court committed no error in denying appellants' motions to dismiss.

It is next contended by appellants that conceding that the indictment charges an offense of which the trial court had jurisdiction, the evidence failed to prove that they were guilty thereof, and hence, their motions for judgment of acquittal should have been sustained. This will necessitate a further survey of the evidence.

[Evidence Wholly Circumstantial]

It is conceded that the evidence was wholly circumstantial and it is undisputed. The court instructed the jury as to the applicable rule relative to the degree of proof necessary to warrant a conviction where, as here, the evidence is wholly circumstantial. These instructions were not excepted to by appellants, and hence, became the law of the case. We accept them as our guide in considering the question of the sufficiency of the evidence not only because they became the law of the case but because we think they are correct. The court, after advising the jury that there were two kinds of evidence, direct and circumstantal, said,

> "In order to justify a jury in finding a verdict of guilty based entirely upon circumstantial evidence, the facts must not only be consistent with the guilt of the defendants, and each of the defendants, but they must be inconsistent with any other reasonable hypothesis that can be predicated upon the evidence. Stated another way, not only must each fact relied upon to show guilt be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, but such fact must be consistent with all other facts introduced in a chain of circumstances, and such facts must further be inconsistent with any other rational conclusion than that of guilt of the defendants.
> "As I have said, the guilt of the defendants—and this applies to each of the defendants—can be shown by circumstantial evidence alone and whether the guilt of the defendants, and each of them, has been so established is for you to determine. Where circumstantial evidence is relied upon to establish the conspiracy or any other essential facts, it is not only necessary that all the circumstances concur to show the existence of such conspiracy and facts sought to be proved, but such circumstantial evidence must be inconsistent with any other rational conclusion."

The establishments of these appellants were located near each other in the St. Louis area. They both handled the same products, the price of which as delivered to them was fixed by government regulation. The quality of the milk for each was determined by ordinance of the City of St. Louis and all milk proffered to them which did not under test meet with the requirements of the ordinance was rejected. The cost of labor in processing the milk was determined by contracts with labor unions, so that the cost to each appellant was at all times substantially the same. Appellants were competitors and served substantially the same area and the product as processed was therefore a standardized product. It appears without dispute that the increases in the price of milk charged by the appellants was somewhat less than the increase in the cost of purchasing and processing the product. The circumstantial evidence relied upon as sustaining the verdict consists of the uniformity of the prices charged by the appellants for Grade A regular fluid milk sold by them, and the proximity in time of the price changes listed in the indictment and bill of particulars. In addition, the government showed certain conversations between two employees of the companies concerning price announcements for the period August, 1939 to August, 1941. The last of these conversations, it will be observed, occurred some seven years before the filing of the indictment. It appears from the undisputed evidence that the matter of price changes was thoroughly and analytically considered by the management of appellants, consisting of certain of their officers, at regular meetings, at which the economic factors bearing upon costs were ascertained, scrutinized and discussed, and that the changes made occurred only after a complete evaluation of the economic conditions and factors going into the cost of production. The evidence is to the effect that these factors were the only considerations influencing the price changes. It also appears that this system of determining prices was in accord with a system established by the International Association of Milk Dealers and which had been adopted by appellants prior to the return of the indictment. The details of the process of collecting the data pertinent to the cost of production would not seem to be here material because all this evidence is undisputed and the integrity of the cost accounting and allocation system used by appellants and the correctness of the conclusion reached is not challenged by any direct evidence. For each of the price changes charged in the indictment or set out in the bill of particulars detailed evidence was furnished concerning the economic reasons for each price change. For example, on April 8, 1938, there was a reduction of 1¢ a quart which resulted from the fact that the milk producers reduced the price that the appellants were required to pay. On August 7, 1939, there was an increased of 2¢ which was necessary to offset the loss on Grade A milk and to meet the increase of labor costs following a new industry-wide labor contract concluded in August. On February 9, 1940, there was an increase of ½¢ to meet increased labor costs resulting from the revamping of wage scales and overtime compensation paid in compliance with the Fair Labor Standards Act. On December 1, 1940, there was an increase of ½¢ necessitated by the increase in the producers' price ordered by the Secretary of Agriculture. On July 1, 1941, there was an increase of 1¢ which corresponded to a further increase in the price required to be paid the producers. On July 4, 1946, there was an increase of 1¢ necessitated by a .9¢ increased cost per quart resulting from a new labor contract. On October 5, 1946, an increase of 2¢ was made to offset a 2.1¢ increase in the price to be paid the producers. These details are simply typical and an examination of the record shows that each increase which is specifically charged either in the indictment or in the bill of particulars is rationally explained and accounted for and shown to have resulted from economic conditions which increased the cost of processing and distributing, and, as before suggested, this evidence is wholly without contradiction.

[Attributable to Competition]

The milk as handled by appellants was a standardized product. Its cost items being substantially identical for both appellants, uniformity in price would result from economic forces. Economists called as expert witnesses testified that in a market such as the fluid milk market in St. Louis, where there were standardized major cost factors, uniformity of price is to be expected. Thus, the Director of Dairy Marketing for the Illinois Agricultural Association testified that,

> "There is a very little difference in the milk of one dairy as to another, standard products as to butter fat tests, bacterial contents and other uniform requirements."

A Professor of Economics at St. Louis University testified as an expert witness as follows:

> "Speaking of Grade A milk market * * * we have here a highly standardized product, the product of one dealer being the same as the product of another dealer."

As before observed, the cost factors are basically identical for both appellants. An economist testifying as an expert with reference to the sale price of standardized products, said,

"I would expect practically uniformity of price, with slight exceptions, and practically simultaneous change in price."

In a recent treatise by Edward H. Chamberlin, Professor of Economics at Harvard University, entitled "The Theory of Monopolistic Competition," it is said,

"One of the conditions of the problem must be the complete independence of the two sellers, for obviously, if they combine, there is monopoly. This independence must, however, be interpreted with care, for, in the nature of the case, when there are only two or a few sellers, their fortunes are not independent. There can be no actual, or tacit, agreement—that is all. Each is forced by the situation itself to take into account the policy of his rival in determining his own, and this can not be construed as a 'tacit agreement' between the two."

In an article entitled "Collusion," appearing in the December, 1948, issue of "Farm Economics," published by the Department of Agricultural Economics of the New York State College of Agriculture, appears the following:

"There is nothing peculiar in the fact that a change in the price of wheat or cotton occurs simultaneously in all markets. If the price of No. 1 Northern Spring Wheat in Minneapolis rises 5 cents a bushel, it advances 5 cents in Baltimore, 5 cents in Buffalo, 5 cents in Chicago, and 5 cents in all the small towns in Minnesota, North Dakota and Montana. These prices not only all advance by the same amount, but they advance on the same day. This is as it should be. There is no collusion. Under the free enterprise system, competition forces all handlers to pay the same price."

These economic principles must of necessity be recognized by the courts. Thus, in Cement Manufacturers Protective Association v. United States, 268 U. S. 588, the Supreme Court reversed a judgment granting an injunction for alleged violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. In the course of that opinion Justice Stone speaking for the court, among other things, said:

"* * * the fact is that any change in quotation of price to dealers, promptly becomes well known in the trade through reports of salesmen, agents and dealers of various manufacturers. It appears to be undisputed that there were frequent changes in price, and uniformity has resulted not from maintaining the price at fixed levels, but from the prompt meeting of changes in prices by competing sellers.

"It is urged by the defendants that such uniformity of price as existed in the trade was due to competition. They offered much evidence tending to show complete independence of judgment and of action of defendants, by large expenditures in competitive sales efforts and by variations in the volume of their production and shipment, earnings and profits. A great volume of testimony was also given by distinguished economists in support of the thesis that, in the case of a standardized product sold wholesale to fully informed professional buyers, as were the dealers in cement, uniformity of price will inevitably result from active, free and unrestrained competition; and the Government in its brief concedes that 'undoubtedly the price of cement would approach uniformity in a normal market in the absence of all combinations between the manufacturers.'"

In United States v. Standard Oil Company, 8 Cir., 47 F. 2d 288, referring to what inferences may fairly be drawn from circumstances, we said,

"While it is not the subject of direct evidence, yet it is fairly inferable from the situation shown by the evidence that, if the major companies follow the Socony price in this area, they do so because they do not wish to engage in a price-cutting war which might entail losses to all concerned (including Socony) without any compensating benefits. Such a view has no sinister aspect, but is merely a matter of business judgment and prudence illustrated in every community in the country by retail competitors in all lines."

[Mere Uniformity Not Sufficient Evidence]

We are clear that mere uniformity of prices in the sale of a standardized commodity such as milk is not in itself evidence of a violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. It is to be observed too that the price changes in question were not simultaneous. Neither were the changes uniformly initiated by the same appellant. When a change was made by one of the appellants a like change was made by the other in a few days following. It is conceded that there was no direct proof of any agreement between the appellants for the fixing of prices. In fact, the evidence is undisputed that every price change was made, not as the result of any understanding or agreement, but because of economic factors, and the same economic factors prompting a change by one of the appellants were equally applicable to the other.

There was evidence that prior to October 1, 1942, Mr. Wasser, an employee of Pevely Dairy Company, and Mr. Gee, an officer of the St. Louis Dairy Company, both having to do with sales, exchanged information as to prices which had already been fixed and were about to become effective. These witnesses were called by the government. Neither of them had any power of authority to fix prices and the information given was not with reference to any purpose to fix prices in the future but with reference to prices which had already been fixed. No such practice was followed by appellants during the seven years immediately preceding the finding of this indictment. The evidence is undisputed that they did not make any agreement with reference to the fixing of prices and it is equally undisputed that they did not communicate the knowledge of the changes determined upon by reason of any agreement between the dairy companies. This testimony, we think, forms no basis for a legitimate inference of the making of or participation in any sort of a conspiracy for the fixing of prices. Inferences which are contrary to established facts may not be drawn from mere conjecture and an unwillingness to believe the unimpeached and uncontradicted testimony of witnesses. Inferences are not themselves evidence but are the result of evidence and are based upon circumstances to take the place of actual proof. When, however, substantial proof is made contrary to the fact inferred, the inference is completely refuted. As said by us in Cartello v. United States, 93 F. 2d 412, speaking of circumstantial evidence,

> "To sustain conviction, it must not only have been consistent with the defendants' guilt, but must have been inconsistent with their innocence."

In Wesson v. United States, 8 Cir., 172 F. 2d 931, in reversing a conviction based upon circumstantial evidence, we said,

> "Inferences must be based upon proven facts or facts of which judicial notice must be taken and one inference cannot be based upon another inference. To sustain a finding of fact the circumstances proven must lead to the conclusion with reasonable certainty and must be of such probative force as to create the basis for a legal inference and not mere suspicion. Circumstantial evidence, even in a civil case, is not sufficient to establish a conclusion where the circumstances are merely consistent with such conclusion or where they give equal support to inconsistent conclusions. Adair v. Reorganizaton Investment Co., 8 Cir., 125 F. 2d 901; Southern R. Co. v. Stewart, 8 Cir., 119 F. 2d 85; Hoskins v. United States, 8 Cir., 120 F. 2d 464; Massachusetts Protective Assn. v. Mouber, 8 Cir., 110 F. 2d 203. In Read v. United States, 8 Cir., 42 F. 2d 636, 638, which was a criminal case, this court, in an opinion by the late Judge Kenyon, said: 'The law applicable to the first proposition (the question of the sufficiency of the evidence) is well settled in this circuit. In Salinger v. United States, 8 Cir., 23 F. 2d 48, 52, this court said: "Unless there is substantial evidence of facts which exclude every other hypothesis but that of guilt, it is the duty of the trial judge to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the accused, and, where all the evidence is as consistent with innocence as with guilt, it is the duty of this court to reverse a judgment against the accused." ' "

In passing it should be observed that while the indictment charges a continuing conspiracy during a period of ten years, the fact is that during some three years of this alleged ten year period the prices which appellants were permitted to charge were fixed by the government. Instead of being a continuous period of ten years there were two separate periods. These conversations between representatives of the appellants all took place during the first period and it would seem that the three years during which the government fixed prices entirely destroyed the continuity of the period alleged. Whatever may have happened during this first period, being thus separated from what happened during the second period, would ordinarily, if charged as a separate offense, be barred by the three-year statute of limitations, and the evidence with reference to the conversations between these representatives, if admissible at all, could have but little bearing upon the course of conduct during the second period covered by the indictment. United States v. Great Western Sugar Co., D. C., 39 F. 2d 152; In re United Shoe Mach. Corp., D. C. Mass., 73 F. Supp. 207, at 211; Patterson v. United States, 8 Cir., 222 F. 599, at 627.

In this connection we note that all individual defendants were found not guilty. The appellants here are corporations. They could act only through officers and agents, yet the only officers and agents who could possibly have committed the violations charged were acquitted. It is true the question on review is not whether the verdict of acquittal of the individual defendants was warranted, but whether the verdict of guilty as against the corporations is sustained by substantial evidence, and mere inconsistency in verdicts is not fatal. However, the verdict of not guilty as to the individual defendants in this case certainly stripped the verdict of guilty as to the corporation defendants of all semblance of logic or reason, and to our minds weakened the presumption of correctness usually attributable to the verdict of a jury. As said by us in Wesson v. United States, supra,

> "Certainly, the proven circumstances were as consistent with innocence as they were with guilt, and inferences may not be drawn from inferences. * * *
> "The circumstances as they stand out in the record are consistent with the direct, uncontradicted and unimpeached testimony of the defendant and his witness. Mere suspicion raised by the circumstances proved would not sustain a conviction, especially when such suspicion is removed by uncontradicted evidence."

[Evidence Equally Consistent with Innocence]

The circumstances relied upon in the instant case can not reasonably be said to be inconsistent with the innocence of the appellants. We are of the view that the proven circumstances, considered in a light most favorable to the government, are not inconsistent with the innocence of appellants, and hence, their motions for acquittal should have been sustained.

[Evidence Wrongfully Admitted]

While our conclusion on this phase of the case necessitates a reversal, there remains for consideration the ruling of the court on appellants' objections to the introduction of certain evidence. As this matter may again be presented on new trial we refer briefly to it here. Over objection of appellant St. Louis Dairy Company, the government was permitted to show that all of its stock was owned by the National Dairy Products Corporation of New York. The government also offered proof as to the salary or compensation paid the officers of appellants who were defendants. We think the admission of this class of testimony was erroneous, and in a case where the evidence is purely circumstantial and at best weak, the admission of such testimony was, we think, prejudicial and would require a reversal of this case. Union Electric Light & Power Co. v. Snyder Estate Co., 65 F. 2d 297; Braatelien, et al. v. United States, 8 Cir., 147 F. 2d 888; O'Hara v. Lamb Const. Co., Mo., 197 S. W. 163. In Union Electric Light & Power Co. v. Snyder Estate Co., supra, which was a civil case, counsel for defendant questioned a witness relative to the ownership of the stock of the plaintiff. Referring to the admission of that evidence, we said,

> "This cross-examination impressed upon the jury the size and extent of the holdings of plaintiff, the foreign character of the controlling factors of plaintiff, and that the ownership of substantially all the stock of plaintiff was in the North American Edison Company. * * *
> "* * * These extraneous facts, if they are facts, served only to arouse the prejudice of the jury. * * *
> "This evidence not only took the jury far from the simple issue to be tried, but it distracted their attention from that issue, and brought before them the size and wealth of plaintiff and its affiliates, and the above-quoted argument of defendants' counsel was calculated to keep fresh in the minds of the jury the size and wealth and foreign character of the plaintiff."

It is noted too that in the instant case the government attorney, in his closing argument, called the jury's attention to the fact that, "There is no evidence but I presume there were dividends paid to the National Dairy Corporation." This was a direct reference to the ownership of the stock of one of the appellants by this foreign corporation. It was certainly not pertinent to any of the issues and could have had but one purpose and that was to prejudice the jury.

The judgments appealed from are therefore reversed and the cause remanded with directions to grant appellants a new trial.

[Dissents]

THOMAS, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

I agree with Judge Gardner that the indictment charges an offense under the Sherman Act, but I do not agree with the conclusions reached upon the other issues in the case. I, therefore, dissent.

RIDDICK, Circuit Judge, dissenting in part:

I agree that the evidence wholly fails to establish any agreement between the defendants to fix the price of fluid milk sold to consumers or any concerted action to suppress competition between them in the sale and distribution of fluid milk in St. Louis. This, of course, requires reversal of the judgment below. But I am also of the opinion that the Government's action should be dismissed because the so-called current or flow of fluid milk in interstate commerce from producers in Illinois ended at the processing plants of the defendants.

The fluid milk which reached defendants' processing plants in St. Louis was raw milk. Its sale by the defendants to their customers in St. Louis was prohibited by the St. Louis Milk Ordinance. That portion of the raw milk from Illinois which failed to pass the inspection required by the St. Louis Milk Ordinance remained the property of the Illinois producer. The portion of it which met the test of inspection was commingled with inspected milk produced in Missouri, and, after the processing required by local law for its sale in St. Louis, was held exclusively for distribution to purchasers in St. Louis. Neither the Illinois shippers nor the defendants could have intended that the interstate transportation of the raw milk should proceed beyond defendants' processing plants since its further progress was prohibited by local law. And since the defendants processed the raw milk in various forms, including several kinds of fluid milk as well as butter, ice cream, and powdered milk, no producer in Illinois could have intended that milk shipped to one of the defendants in St. Louis would continue in commerce to the ultimate consumer as Grade A pasteurized fluid milk. The mere fact that defendants, because of the perishable character of fluid milk, were compelled to process and distribute that part of the raw milk received from Illinois which finally reached the St. Louis consumer in fluid form with all possible speed is not, in my opinion, sufficient to establish the interstate commerce in milk charged in the indictment.

New Jersey Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade Contracts—Failure to Enforce—Declaratory Judgments—Necessary Parties.—A suit for declaratory judgment to the effect that a fair trade contract is unenforceable against a retailer because the manufacturer did not secure compliance from other retailers after being informed of their selling below the established price, is dismissed because the plaintiff named only the manufacturer as defendant and sought to have injunction issue prohibiting enforcement only as to plaintiff, whereas the declaratory judgments act requires that all persons be made parties who would be affected by the final adjudication, which in the instant case would include all other retailers who would be injured by plaintiff's being able to sell at lower prices than they.

See the New Jersey Fair Trade annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8564.30, 8564.80, Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7357, 7361.

For the plaintiffs: Samuel Kaufman (Bilder, Bilder & Kaufman, Newark, N. J.).

For the defendant: Joseph H. Stamler (Lorentz & Stamler, Newark, N. J.).

FREUND, J. S. C.: [Digest] The plaintiffs are the owners of retail drug stores in the City of Newark. The defendant is the manufacturer of soap and ointment products marketed under the trade name "Cuticura". Pursuant to the provisions of the Fair Trade Act, the defendant executed a contract with one or more of its retailers in this State, fixing the minimum price at which its commodities might be sold at retail. Notice of the execution of this contract was given by the defendant to retailers, including the plaintiffs, and by reason thereof, the plaintiffs became bound to sell at the prices fixed by the defendant. The plaintiffs allege that they maintained such Fair Trade prices but discovered that a number of their competitors were selling the products below the fixed prices, and they thereupon reduced prices to meet the competition. They notified the defendant of such underselling, but it failed to obtain from other retailers compliance with the price schedule.

The defendant has moved to vacate the restraint in the event that its motion for dismissal of the complaint be denied, and has filed affidavits of other retailers which allege that the plaintiffs were the violators of the price schedule and that plaintiffs' conduct produced the underselling — "the pot called the kettle black."

Both parties assert that the instant matter is of novel impression in this State and that Stockman v. Wilson Distilling Co., Inc., 23 N. Y. S. 2d 510, (1940), affirmed 26 N. Y. S. 2d 510, motion for leave to appeal denied, 286 N. Y. 736, 35 N. E. 2d 201, is the only reported case on point. The defendant relies on the Stockman case and the plaintiffs attempt to distinguish it. There, as here, a proceeding was brought by the plaintiff, a retailer, against the defendant, the exclusive distributor of the commodity, upon practically the same facts and seeking the same relief. The Supreme Court of New York granted defendant's motion for dismissal of the complaint as insufficient in law.

Mr. Justice Steinbrink, whose opinion was adopted by the appellate court, said:

> "The purpose of the action is plain. The plaintiff seeks immunity from the prosecution of any action against him under the statute. It is equally plain that no such immunity can be afforded by means of a declaratory judgment, for even though it be assumed that the defendant is under a statutory duty to enforce its fair trade agreements and that it has, by failing to discharge that duty, abandoned its right under the agreements, nevertheless price cutting by the plaintiff would remain actionable 'at the suit of any person damaged thereby', including competing retailers. 'The general purpose of the declaratory judgment is to serve some practical end in quieting or stabilizing an uncertain or disputed jural relation either as to present or prospective obligations.' James v. Alderton Dock Yards, Ltd., 256 N. Y. 298, at page 305, 176 N. E. 401, at page 404. A declaratory judgment could not serve that purpose, for the jural relations attaching to the fair trade agreements, affecting as it does all competing retailers, cannot be determined with finality in this action. The motion is consequently granted."

Significantly, the only defendant in this proceeding is the manufacturer and producer of the products. The retailer or retailers with whom the defendant entered into the Fair Trade contract are not parties to the suit. The plaintiffs admit that they received notice of the execution of the contract and "by reason of the statute, the contract and the notice thereof given to the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs became bound to sell all of the defendant's products at the prices fixed therefor by the defendant." A contract may not be declared null and void in the absence of a party to the contract. Indeed, the Declaratory Judgments statute expressly provides, R. S. 2:26-72, "When declaratory relief is sought, all parties having or claiming any interest which would be affected by the declaration shall be made parties to the proceeding."

The complaint will be dismissed.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Procedure—Appealability—Final and Interlocutory Orders—Effect of Dismissal of Certain Defendants Sued with Others upon Conspiracy.—In a treble damage suit wherein several defendants were sued individually and jointly, the quashing of service and dismissal of the action as to certain defendants does not amount to a dismissal of individual actions against them, which would be a final order, but is rather only a dismissal of certain defendants to a single action based upon their alleged joint illegal activities, and is therefore an interlocutory order, since the action is not ended while there are defendants remaining. The order not being final, the appeal from the dismissals is premature, and must itself be dismissed.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.622.

For the plaintiffs: Arthur H. Bartelt, Austin, Texas.

For the defendants: Cecil C. Cammack, Fort Worth; R. H. Kelley, Houston; T. E. Mosheim, Houston; William A. Dougherty, New York City; D. H. Culton, Amarillo; H. L. Adkins, Amarillo; Wm. Q. Boyce, Amarillo; Charles C. McDugald, Chicago; Paul A. McDermott, Fort Worth.

Before HUTCHESON, WALLER, and RUSSELL, Circuit Judges.

HUTCHESON, Circuit Judge: Alleging: that of the six defendants sued, five were organized under the laws of Delaware, and one under the laws of Colorado; that none of them, except Canadian River Gas Co., has been, or is now, licensed to do business in Texas, but that all, by virtue of combination and conspiracy, were suable in Texas, plaintiffs sued them as conspirators, seeking in concert to monopolize and to impose unlawful restraints on interstate commerce in connection with the production, transportation, and sale of natural gas.

Alleging with considerable fullness the details of the organized concert of action to effect the combination and conspiracy, and that it had resulted in damages to plaintiffs as lessors and owners of gas producing properties, in the sum of $920,000.00, the complaint prayed judgment against the defendants individually and jointly for treble damages.

The complaint alleging that the officials, agents, and employees of the Canadian were also agents of the other named defendants, and that service of papers on any one of them constitutes valid service on the respective defendants, the summons upon all defendants in this action was served "by delivering to E. C. Wagner [Vice-President of Canadian Gas Co.], the alleged agent of each of the above named companies, a copy of this summons and a copy of the bill of complaint attached".

Each of the defendants, except Canadian, filed motion to quash the service, and each, except Standard Oil Company, moved to dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction and venue. Each of the motions to quash was sustained, the cause was dismissed as to each of the moving defendants, and plaintiffs appealed from each of the orders.

Appellees, moving to dismiss the appeal as from not final, but interlocutory, orders, and pointing out: that the suit presented not many causes of action, one against each of the defendants, but one cause of action against all of the defendants jointly, for the damages inflicted by them acting in concert; and that the suit is still pendiing as to Canadian; urge upon us, upon the authority of our case, Hunteman v. New Orleans Pub. Serv. Co., Inc., et al., 119 F(2) 465, and similar cases,[1] that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appellants, on their part, as vigorously insist that the invoked cases are not applicable here.

We cannot agree with appellants. We think it too clear for argument that the authorities appellees cite are controlling here. The action brought is one against the six defendants for the consequences of their joint and concurrent action. The dismissal of the five defendants has not brought it to an end. The orders are interlocutory and, therefore, subject to be set aside or modified at any time until the whole cause is disposed of, and being interlocutory, they are, therefore, not appealable. The appeals should be, and they are hereby

DISMISSED.

[Concurring Opinion]

WALLER, Circuit Judge, specially concurring: If the opinion in our case of Hunteman v. New Orleans Public Service Co., Inc., et al., 119 F. 2d 465, is correct—and its correctness seems to be supported by much authority—then the orders quashing the process were interlocutory and the appeal is properly dismissed. But on account of the apparent finality with which some of the defendants were dismissed out of the case

[1] Kuhn, et al. v. Canteen Food Serv., et al., 150 F. (2d) 55; Hohorst v. Hamburg-Am. Packing Co., 148 U. S. 262; Atwater v. N. A. Coal Co., 111 F. (2d) 124; *Hunter v. Fed. Life Ins. because of the showing that they had never transacted business in the State of Texas, it seems to me to be incorrect to say that the dismissal orders in this respect were interlocutory.

Since the facts upon which the motions were predicated were neither disputed nor the evidence supporting same disproven, it would seem that such orders were without error and ought more properly to be affirmed. Without doubt, the orders quashing the process are interlocutory, but I deem the orders dismissing the defendants because of non-suability in Texas to have the quality of final judgments.

[¶ 62,529] Russellville Canning Co., a partnership v. American Can Co.

In the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Arkansas, Fort Smith Division. Civil No. 706. December 19, 1949.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Discrimination—Freight Equalization—Warehouse Not Bona Fide Equalization Point Where Majority of Shipments Still Made from Factory.—The establishment of a warehouse as the point from which freight charges are calculated in shipments to regional purchasers results in unlawful discrimination against the purchasers who are located farthest from the warehouse, if the warehouse is not the source of supply for the majority of the cans purchased and is therefore not a bona fide factor in the determination of costs of shipping. Even though such freight costs are actually less than the costs were from an earlier equalization point, which also was not a source of supply, discrimination nevertheless results when the complaining purchaser is not given as great a benefit as his competitors.

See the Robinson-Patman annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212.590.

Discrimination—Quantity Discounts—Particularity in Determination of Cost Savings.—A quantity discount system operated on a yearly volume basis, and established upon experience instead of cost studies, and a system set up on the basis of average allocated handling costs for three broad predetermined purchaser groups, under which discounts did not therefore reflect accurately the costs and savings in dealing with each purchaser, do not fulfill the justification requirements of the statute. Although such an interpretation of the Act would impose added burdens on the manufacturer, the purpose of the law, which is the protection of small business, requires some semblance of individual cost justification.

See the Robinson-Patman annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212.305.

Discrimination—Special Services and Facilities—Impossibility of Granting Services to Plaintiff No Defense to Charge of Discrimination.—The delivery of cans at reduced costs from the factory to a nearby purchaser by means of a conveyor runway is a facility or service the granting of which to one customer is no less a discrimination merely because the plaintiff's distance from the factory makes it impossible to install such a conveyor system for him also. Further discrimination is found in the use of the conveyor to deliver to the purchaser cans which are then transported by the customer to other of its plants.

See the Robinson-Patman annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2216.30.

Damages—Quantum of Proof in Private Action—Nature of Proof Not Different from That in FTC Action.—The establishment of proof that injury has been incurred through discriminatory practices does not require a showing that the complaining competitor has in fact been injured, but is shown by proof, in the words of the statute, that the effect of the alleged practices "may be substantially * * * to injure, destroy or prevent competition * * *." To require a different reading of the requirements would constitute unauthorized court legislation prejudicial to the rights of private parties. Further, difficulties in proving the amount of damages will not necessarily constitute a difficulty in proving the fact of damages which might require dismissal of the case.

See the Robinson-Patman annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2213.15.

For the defendant: Daily & Woods, Fort Smith, Ark.; G. C. Hardin, Fort Smith, Ark.; John F. MacLane, Charles J. Colgan, Cyrus R. Vance and Burton M. Abrams (Simpson, Thacher & Bartlett), New York, New York.

MILLER, Judge: [Digest] Plaintiff, Russellville Canning Company, a partnership organized and operating under the laws of the State of Arkansas, is suing defendant, American Can Company, a corporation organized and operating under the laws of the State of New Jersey and doing business in Arkansas, for treble damages under Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 15, and bases its cause of action upon alleged violations by the defendant of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 13.

[Nature of Charges]

Plaintiff charges discriminations in the following particulars:

(1) Freight charges resulting from freight equalization with Fort Smith, Arkansas. Collateral thereto is a claim for damages for lost profits in 1945 allegedly caused by defendant's failure to deliver cans according to the contract between plaintiff and defendant.

(2) Quantity discount payments made to certain named customers of defendant and withheld from plaintiff. This claim is properly broken down into two parts, because of defendant's change in its quantity discount schedule on January 1, 1946. Prior to that date the maximum was 5% and subsequent thereto 3%.

(3) Runway allowance of 45¢ per thousand cans made to Morgan Packing Company at its Austin, Indiana, plant and not extended to plaintiff.

Plaintiff contends that such discriminations in price resulted in substantial injury to its business and property, and that it has suffered damages not only in the amount of the additional business expense imposed by the excess charges but in the impairment of its competitive position.

The Congress, in amending the Clayton Act by the Robinson-Patman Act, gave emphasis to the protection of small business, recognizing that the Clayton Act had been too restrictive in requiring a showing of general injury to competition, and by the enactment of the Robinson-Patman Act, intended to allow a finding of injury to competition by a showing of "injury to the competitor victimized by the discrimination." Federal Trade Commission v. Morton Salt Co., 334 U. S. 37, 49, and footnote 18 for statement of Senate Judiciary Committee.

The language of the statute requires only that the effect of the price discriminations "may be substantially to lessen competition * * * or to injure, destroy or prevent competition * * *." (Emphasis added.)

It would appear, therefore, that as a practical matter the requisite of adverse effect on competition will follow as a matter of course when it is shown that a seller has charged one purchaser a higher price for like goods than he has charged one or more of the purchaser's competitors. Certainly, this has been the result in the Federal Trade Commission cases.

When the plaintiff makes this showing, price differential with an adverse effect on competition, it has made out a prima facie case of unlawful discrimination. Under a proviso of Section 2(a), the defendant may justify price discriminations by showing that the differentials make only due allowance for differences in the cost of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from differing methods or quantities in which such commodities are to such purchasers sold or delivered.

[Claimed Lack of Proof as to Injury]

The defendant contends, and this contention was the basis of its motion to dismiss, that the testimony introduced by the plaintiff failed to establish injury, destruction or prevention of competition, required by Sec. 2(a), or injury to its business or property, required by Sec. 4, and that, therefore, plaintiff's case fell of its own weight, with the necessary result that the burden imposed upon the defendant to justify affirmatively the alleged discriminatory practices never arose. Defendant would distinguish between proceedings by the Federal Trade Commission and private actions, the former being principally injunction proceedings wherein it is necessary to forestall discriminations "in their incipiency," thereby preventing future discriminations regardless of what has occurred in the past, and the latter for the recovery of monetary damages for past injury. Thus, defendant contends, it is sufficient if the Federal Trade Commission establishes price discriminations the effect of which "may be" to adversely affect or injure competition, but "in private actions brought for violations of subsection 2(a), the subjunctive "may be" of potential injury (upon which the Commission may act) must be converted into the indicative "does", denoting actual injury, destruction or prevention of competition inimicable to the individual plaintiff." Finally, defendant contends that plaintiff cannot recover "general damages" under Section 2(a); that "special damages" must be shown to be the result of defendant's acts; that no such showing has been made; and that, therefore, plaintiff has failed to establish a claim entitling it to relief.

[Nature of Proof in Private and FTC Actions Not Different]

To sustain defendant's contention the court would have to rewrite Section 2, for subsection (a) declares that price discriminations which "may", not "do", lessen or injure competition are unlawful, and no distinction is made between Federal Trade Commission proceedings and private actions. Therefore, in order for the plaintiff to make out a prima facie case of unlawful price discrimination, it need only establish that it was charged more for its cans (there is no question here but that products of like grade and quality are involved) than other customers of defendant who are competitors of plaintiff and that the effect of this discrimination "may be" to lessen or injure competition between plaintiff and the named competitors of plaintiff. Of course, in the usual case, if the purchaser has a valid claim, as the plaintiff does here, the proof will be sufficient to establish that the discriminations did injure competition. At this point the burden is cast upon the defendant to justify, if it can, such discrimination, and if a justification is not or cannot be sufficiently established, then the plaintiff has shown an unlawful discrimination under Section 2(a), or the "anything forbidden in the anti-trust laws" required by Section 4, and it may recover treble damages if it can show that it has been injured in its business or property by reason thereof.

The plaintiff admits, and the court agrees, that it cannot recover damages unless it has established an injury to its business or property, but this problem does not arise until an unlawful price discrimination has been established. In this regard only, is the burden on the plaintiff in a private action different from or greater than the burden in a Federal Trade Commission proceeding. And, as the court understands the law, normally the burden is greater only when the injured party seeks to recover special damages, as in the instant case, wherein the plaintiff is seeking to recover damages for the impairment of its competitive position. Thus, when it is established that a seller has charged one purchaser a higher price for like goods than he has charged one or more of the purchaser's competitors, and the seller cannot sufficiently justify the price differential, the purchaser paying the higher price normally will have established the necessary adverse effect upon competition (that he has been injured in his competitive opportunities) and the required injury to business and property, which, in the absence of extraordinary circumstances, will entitle him to damages in at least the amount of the discrimination.

[Freight Shipments—Facts]

It seems proper to discuss first the questions involved in the freight payments made by the plaintiff.

The material facts of this phase of the case may be briefly summarized as follows. On April 24, 1943, plaintiff, as buyer, signed an exclusive contract with defendant, as seller, for the purchase of all its requirements of sanitary cans and began regular operations on June 1, 1943. The contract expired on December 31, 1947, and was not renewed. Inter alia the contract contained the following provision:

> "No. 7 Deliveries: Cans named in this contract shall be delivered as wanted by Buyer, upon reasonable notice to Seller, F.O.B. Seller's factories, freight equalized with St. Louis, Missouri, except on such sizes and styles of cans as may not be made at Seller's St. Louis, Missouri, factory. Sizes and styles of cans Seller may not make at its St. Louis, Missouri, factory shall be F.O.B. point of shipment."

The contracts of a number of customers in the Ozark Region (which here means the Arkansas River Valley in Arkansas and Oklahoma and Northwestern Arkansas and Southwestern Missouri) also provided for St. Louis equalization. Some specified Maywood or Hoopeston, Illinois, these cities having been equalization points at the time the contracts were executed. None, however, provided for equalization with Fort Smith, Arkansas.

By the year 1940 the Ozark Region had developed to the point that the various canners were insisting upon the location of a can factory or similar facility in the Ozark Region to insure prompt delivery of cans and to place it on a par freightwise with other canning areas throughout the country. The defendant made a study of the situation and concluded that while a factory would not be justified at that time the situation could be reasonably met by the establishment of a warehouse at Fort Smith, Arkansas. Fort Smith was selected because of its size, central location and the availability of railroad and highway facilities. The warehouse opened on June 2, 1941, and continued in operation until December, 1946, when it was discontinued upon the completion of defendant's Fort Smith factory. After its opening, freight was equalized with Fort Smith to all customers in the region to whom it meant a lower freight cost. It should be noted here that freight equalization with Fort Smith continued until December 31, 1945, only, although the warehouse was operated until December, 1946, as above stated. From a total of 7,851,086 cans delivered in 1941 from the warehouse, the yearly total increased to a total of 24,730,148 in 1945, the year freight equalization with Fort Smith ceased. For the entire period of its operation there were 83,389,496 cans delivered from the warehouse, and during the peak year, 1945, approximately 30% of the region's demands were handled through the warehouse.

From the date it began operations, June 1, 1943, plaintiff received its cans with freight equalized with Fort Smith instead of St. Louis, as provided in its contract. The freight rate from St. Louis, Missouri, and from Terre Haute, Indiana, the defendant's factory from which most of the cans supplied to the Ozark Region were manufactured, was the same to Fort Smith, Arkansas, Alma, Arkansas, and Russellville, Arkansas. This means that the plaintiff, and Good Canning Company of Fort Smith, Arkansas, hereinafter referred to as Good, and Alma Canning Company of Alma, Arkansas, hereinafter referred to as Alma, would have expended the same amount of money for freight with freight equalized at St. Louis, whereas with freight equalized at Fort Smith, Good got its cans freight free, Alma with a small freight charge and plaintiff with a larger freight charge.

Plaintiff continued to receive its cans with freight equalized with Fort Smith until the end of 1944, after which it refused to accept shipments with freight equalization other than according to the letter of the contract. Thus, in February, 1945, plaintiff ordered nine cars of cans requesting shipment in accordance with its contract "letter for letter". The cans were shipped with Fort Smith equalization, and plaintiff refused to accept them, and did not accept them until defendant had proffered invoices showing St. Louis equalization and paid certain demurrage charges. In May, 1945, plaintiff ordered three cars of cans, which were refused until invoices showing St. Louis equalization were presented. These shipments, and the ensuing controversies, are the basis of plaintiff's claim for damages due to lost profits on Texas spinach and on mustard greens which it contends it was unable to can, and, thus, unable to fill standing Government orders. (This claim will be discussed subsequently). Thereafter, on all shipments defendant tendered dual invoices on each shipment, one set showing Fort Smith equalization and the other St. Louis, and in all instances plaintiff paid St. Louis equalization.

During the period between June 1, 1943, and December 31, 1945, plaintiff paid $23,235.39 in freight. Of this sum defendant has tendered back $5,286.55, being the amount paid in 1945 over and above freight charges equalized with Fort Smith.

Also, it might be noted here that defendant does not have a factory at St. Louis, but freight was equalized at that point because of the existence of a competitor's can factory in that city. In this case there is no question as to the legality of equalizing freight with St. Louis, if it had in fact been so equalized, because there would have been no discrimination between plaintiff and its Ozark Region competitors.

[Proffered Justification for Equalized Freight]

Defendant seeks to justify Fort Smith equalization in the following manner. (1) equalization with a factory is proper; (2) a bona fide warehouse is the equivalent of a factory for equalization purposes; and (3) the Fort Smith warehouse was a bona fide warehouse.

With the first contention the court finds no fault, for equalization with a factory, provided that factory is the normal source of supply, results in the same net mill realization to the seller and though there be differences in the delivered prices to the purchasers, depending upon their location in relation to the factory, such differences are justified as delivery costs. Although the court is not directly concerned with the problem, it may be that there is nothing inherently evil or unlawful in basing point systems, either single or multiple, if they can be justified as good faith attempts to meet the low price of a competitor, provided there is no industry-wide or nation-wide collusion or conspiracy or combination in restraint of trade. However, since the court is not here concerned with lower prices to meet the price of a competitor, prices that bear relation to factors other than actual costs of production or delivery, are price discriminations within the prohibition of Section 2(a), provided, of course, there exists the required effect upon competition. Corn Products Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 324 U. S. 726, 732. This problem usually arises in so called "delivered price" systems, for such systems inevitably involve phantom freight or freight absorption on the part of the seller and result in varying net mill realizations. For present purposes, there is no difference in legal effect between phantom freight and freight absorption. Bond Crown & Cork Company v. Federal Trade Commission, 4 Cir., 176 F. 2d 974. The former occurs when there is a charge for freight in the delivered price which was not actually incurred, because the distance from the basing or equalization point is greater than the distance from the mill to the point of delivery. And, the latter occurs when the freight included in the delivery price is less than that actually incurred, because the distance from the basing or equalization point is less than from the mill or factory to the point of delivery.

The second contention in the justification may be put aside until the third is considered, for in the event of an adverse conclusion on the third, it will be unnecessary to consider the second.

[Equalizing from Warehouse Improper]

As to the third, that the Fort Smith warehouse was a bona fide warehouse, it is necessary to approach the problem from the standpoint of the requirements of the law, and not from the standpoint of the good faith or generosity of the defendant in establishing the warehouse to aid the Ozark Region canners. The court finds no fault with and makes no criticism of the motives of defendant in establishing the warehouse, whether to aid the Ozark Region canners or to protect its own interests. Be that as it may, the fact remains that it cannot discriminate in the price of cans to its customers if the discrimination is condemned by Section 2(a). Assuming that freight may be equalized with a warehouse located away from the factory, in order for such a warehouse to be bona fide, it would have to be the actual source of supply of the cans. Unquestionably, this warehouse was not, as it never supplied more than 30% of the needs of the Ozark Region, which included many canners other than Good, Alma and plaintiff. For the period involved plaintiff obtained approximately 5% of its supply of cans from the warehouse. The great majority of the cans came, not from the warehouse, but directly from defendant's Terre Haute, Indiana, factory to plaintiff and its Ozark competitors. The prices on these shipments varied according to factors, phantom freight or freight absorption (according to the way the method of charging for freight in this case is viewed, probably freight absorption being the proper designation), which are unrelated to any proper element of actual costs. See: Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, et al., 333 U. S. 683, 723, 724.

The court uses "actual source of supply" in a reasonable sense, that is, that it be the source of supply under normal circumstances, recognizing that unusual conditions might arise where it is necessary to ship cans from other sources. In such instances, probably freight could be equalized with the normal source of supply without running afoul of Section 2(a), for it was not the purpose of the Congress to place an impossible burden on sellers. As above stated, the court finds it unnecessary to determine if a bona fide warehouse located away from the mill or factory could be a basing or equalization point, in view of its conclusion that this warehouse was not a bona fide one within the requirements of Section 2(a).

Also, it might be stated that "buyers locational advantages" referred to by defendant has reference to actual source of supply, as discussed above, for if it were otherwise, it would be subject to the whim of the seller to create a locational advantage on the part of favorite buyers by installing a warehouse nearby.

Turning now to a consideration of the effect of these practices on competition, the only reasonable conclusion to be reached is that they did have the necessary adverse effect on competition. Plaintiff was in direct price competition with Good, Alma and Charleston Canning Company (these companies were under common ownership after 1944) not only in disposing of its canned goods, which were substantially the same as the products packed by Good, Alma and Charleston, but in obtaining raw materials. When it is remembered that the price of cans is a substantial part of the cost of the finished product, it becomes clear that not only is there a reasonable possibility or probability that these discriminations in price injured competition between plaintiff and its named Ozark competitors but such discriminations did in fact so injure competition. Therefore, since defendant has not presented a sufficient justification, the discriminations in price became unlawful and forbidden by Section 2(a).

Furthermore, plaintiff was injured in its business and property by such price discriminations, and, in the opinion of the court, a protracted discussion is neither necessary nor desirable. This was an added business expense unlawfully placed upon plaintiff and necessarily adversely affected the chances of plaintiff to survive the keen competition. Indisputably, the difference of a few cents per case often makes the difference between a sale in the market, and likewise, the difference of a few cents makes the difference in obtaining the raw products necessary for operation. Defendant stresses the fact that the record fails to disclose many, or, indeed, any, instances where plaintiff was outbid for raw products or undersold in the market. However, in the opinion of the court, that is not of material importance, for the crux of the matter is, as the court views it, that because of the highly competitive nature of bidding for raw products and selling in the markets, plaintiff at least had to meet the prices of its named Ozark Region competitors or go out of business immediately. It did not choose to liquidate, certainly a natural choice, and in the long run the unlawful discriminations of defendant were bound to show up in profits and losses. Thus, plaintiff was injured in the most basic and fundamental way, from its point of view, a lessening of its chances of survival.

It will not do to say that plaintiff is but a small business, and that the price discriminations were not large from a monetary standpoint, or that other factors, such as a declining economy, over supply of raw materials, etc., contributed, because the fact still remains that plaintiff was subjected to price discriminations which worked to its disadvantage and to the advantage of its named Ozark Region competitors. It is to be remembered that Section 2(a) was designed to protect the small business man, and the court feels that the spirit and letter of that section compels the conclusion reached here, that the price discriminations, declared unlawful thereby, did injure the plaintiff in its business and property.

[Quantity Discounts—Facts]

The second proposition that should be discussed concerns the quantity discount systems used by the defendant.

The schedule of discounts contained in the form of contract executed by the plaintiff was promulgated late in 1936, retroactively effective to June 18, 1936, the effective date of the Robinson-Patman Act, and granted discounts on the basis of quantity purchased yearly, as follows: under $500,000 no discount; from $500,000 to $7,000,000 discounts from 1% to 4%; and above $7,000,000 a discount of 5%. The system was set up by the officials of defendant on the basis of "past experience" and was not the result of a cost study during the preceding years.

The system resulted in differences in price between plaintiff and certain named competitors, California Packing Corporation (Calpack), a New York corporation, Libby, McNeill & Libby, Inc. (Libby), a Maine corporation, and Stokely-Van Camp, Inc. (Stokely), an Indiana corporation. As the system resulted in plaintiff paying substantially more for its cans than its above named competitors, it had the requisite adverse effect on competition, and the discussion previously made on this point is applicable here and need not be repeated. Therefore, the burden devolved on defendant to justify the differences as representing "only due allowance for differences in the cost of * sale *." As the court understands it, the attempted justification does not concern itself with cost of manufacture or delivery. On page 67 of defendant's brief it states:

> "We may agree that the amount of the discount in question must be measured by relation to the cost savings resulting from sales of the larger quantities to which the discount is applied and must represent no more than due allowance for such savings."

Defendant would discharge this burden by showing a cost study as follows: (Defendant's brief page 73)

> "In brief, sales expenses were divided among customers in Group A (over $7,000,000), Group B ($500,000 to $7,000,000), and Group C (under $500,000). Expenses were allocated primarily upon the basis of 'contact hours' of salesmen engaged in the sales of packers' cans, and the allocation of their time within the various quantity brackets. Sales office overhead and other undistributed expenses were allocated on a percentage basis, determined by the direct costs to which they were applicable."

This study was conducted from April 1, 1937, to December 31, 1941—four and three-quarter years. Thereafter the study was discontinued, and no study of costs was made during the period of the plaintiff's contract.

The actual functioning of the discount system resulted, during the period of the cost study, in but two purchasers qualifying for Group A, from a low of 19 to a high of 36 in Group B, and, of course, the remainder fell in Group C, from a low of 2109 to a high of 2960.

Effective January 1, 1946, the defendant inaugurated a new schedule of quantity discounts, and offered to each customer a new contract incorporating the new schedule. Such a contract was offered to the plaintiff, but it refused to accept the same and continued to operate under its old form, which, as above stated, expired December 31, 1947. The new schedule was much broader and more inclusive than the old. Included in it were sales of general line as well as packers or sanitary cans, with the schedule beginning at .2% on $50,000 annual purchases and ranging upwards in various brackets to a maximum of 3% on annual purchases of $4,000,000 or more. No attempted justification was made of the new schedule by defendant, it taking the position that since the plaintiff refused the new contract the new schedule is not properly involved in the case, and in any event, the justification of the old system implicitly covers justification of the new.

The law pertaining to this phase of the case is comparatively clear, having had recent consideration by the Supreme Court in Federal Trade Commission v. Morton Salt Co., supra.

In view of the condemnation contained in that case "that a large buyer could secure a competitive advantage over a small buyer solely because of the large buyer's quantity purchasing ability", the quantity discount system of defendant cannot be approved merely because it was commercially impractical if not impossible to suspend discounts after the enactment of the Robinson-Patman Act. The defendant assumed the risk of being subjected to a private action for damages, such as the instant case, if its system made other than "due allowance".

However, the Act does permit price differences representing actual cost savings, and it is necessary for the court to consider and determine the merits of the justification made by the defendant. It might be noted that this court does not function as an expert in the field, as does the Federal Trade Commission, and it is not the purpose of the court to formulate a discount system within the sanction of the Act. The sole function of the court in this regard is to ascertain whether the defendant has made the requisite justification of its system.

[Averaged Costs Insufficient as Justification for Quantity Discount Differentials]

The defendant's justification is based upon averages derived from an allocation of sales costs to the three groups into which it classified its customers for justification purposes. Separate costs were not presented for the three named competitors, Calpack, Libby and Stokley, nor for plaintiff. A literal interpretation of Section 2(a) would appear to call for a consideration of the sales costs to individual customers and to individual plants of customers who operate more than one. It is difficult to see in what other manner price differentials can be limited to the sphere of actual costs. Certainly, if the chief purpose of the Act, the protection of small businesses, is to be achieved in any degree, some semblance of individual cost justification should be required. If a system whereby all of the small customers are lumped together in one group solely because of their quantity buying ability (which is the practical effect of this system) is justifiable, then the Congress has done a futile thing in enacting this legislation, for, obviously, it has failed to correct the recognized evil whereby "a large buyer could secure a competitive advantage over a small buyer solely because of the large buyer's quantity purchasing ability". It is inconceivable that the Congress meant to permit such a situation to continue. This, in the opinion of the court, is the ultimate fault to be found with defendant's system and justification thereof. The purchaser in Group C was doomed by the system to remain there, so long as its volume of purchases did not exceed $500,000, regardless of the cost incurred in selling it, and its identity as an individual, for cost purposes, was completely lost. It is significant that the breaking point, $500,000, left the customers of defendant in substantially the same position as before the enactment of the Act, for roughly 2,700 fell below that point, thus receiving no discount, and some 30 fell into the other groups, with but 2 in Group A. In other words, the "little fellows" were at the same competitive disadvantage from a quantity purchasing and discount standpoint as before.

The court recognizes the contention of defendant that "quantity discounts are justified vel non either according to their impact on competition or potential injury to customers on the one hand, or by the relevance of the supporting study in justification of such discounts to basically sound accounting principles." Plaintiff and its named competitors receiving the maximum discount were active competitors in the same markets and often in the same stores, and the evidence in this case is more than ample to support the finding of the court that there existed the required adverse effect on competition. As to the latter point, the court is aware of the announcement of the Federal Trade Commission in the case of Minneapolis-Honeywell Regulator Co., CCH TRADE REGULATION REPORTS ¶ 13,675 (1948), that "where they (cost studies) are made in good faith and in accordance with sound accounting principles, they should be given a very great weight." Although the court is not familiar with the details of the discount system or the justification involved therein, it does appear that the system was very comprehensive with numerous "breaking points", and was based upon a study made by an independent accounting service. Also, the system was revised several times to meet changing conditions. Under those circumstances the Federal Trade Commission concluded that the company had made a good faith effort and its system was the best that was possible under the circumstances. It may be that this is a reasonable approach to the problem, in view of the heavy burden on sellers, but defendant's system cannot qualify thereunder. Defendant had three broad classes, with practically all customers falling in Class C. It set up the system and then conducted studies for the test period to justify it (or to allocate costs already known), never changed it, and in fact, during the period of its dealings with plaintiff no study of costs whatsoever in regard to its discount system was made. This, in the opinion of the court, could not meet the most liberal "good faith cost study test".

The court realizes that the Act places a great burden on defendant, but it is also aware that that burden was deliberately so placed by the Congress. And, when the defendant made the quantity discounts, it necessarily ran the risk of violating the Act. and of bearing the consequences if it could not make the required justification.

As to whether a justification may be made other than on an individual cost basis, this court has no occasion to decide. Perhaps this is the only safe course to follow, but regardless of that, it is sufficient to hold here that defendant has not justified its quantity discount system as making only due allowance for differences in the cost of sale. At the very least, the Act requires a more definite and specific justification of cost savings than defendant has presented.

As to the plaintiff's claim for the period covered by the new discount system, no justification was made by the defendant, it taking the position that the plaintiff could not claim damages under the new contract because it refused to accept it, and in any event, the justification offered for the old system is ample for the new. It is the view of the court that plaintiff's claim is not founded in contract, and that the law cannot be superseded by the terms of a particular contract. The law condemns a price discrimination caused by quantity discounts which has the requisite adverse effect on competition, of which the court has found sufficient evidence here, unless it can be justified as making only due allowance for cost of sales.

In the opinion of the court, the evidence amply demonstrates that the unlawful price discriminations resulting from defendant's quantity discount systems injured plaintiff in its business and property.

[Discrimination in Facilities Furnished]

The third question that requires consideration and discussion arises from the contentions of the parties on the allowances or payments made to Morgan Packing Company, one of the named competitors of plaintiff.

Defendant has a can factory at Austin, Indiana, from which a runway, or can conveyor, carries cans to an adjacent canning plant belonging to Morgan Packing Company. Morgan also has five other canning plants in Indiana, all five of which are at a distance from Austin great enough to make rail or truck transportation necessary. For all practical purposes the entire supply of cans purchased by Morgan for its six plants are delivered over the runway at Austin.

Defendant granted to Morgan a discount from list price of 45¢ per thousand upon all cans delivered across the runway, which, as stated above, went to all six Morgan plants.

Plaintiff contends that in utilizing the runway for delivery to Morgan and in granting the 45¢ per thousand discount defendant has violated both Sections 2 (a) and 2 (e) of the Act, 15 U. S. C. A. Secs. 13 (a) and 13 (e).

Section 2 (e), supra, absolutely forbids disproportionate services or facilities, with no stated prerequisite of adverse effect on competition, as appears in Section 2 (a). See: Elizabeth Arden, Inc., et al. v. Federal Trade Commission, 2 Cir., 156 F. 2d 132, 134. It might be noted, however, that, in the opinion of the court, the facts of this phase of the case show the required adverse effect on competition.

It is not the province of the court to determine where the defendant should construct its can factories, or to censure the defendant for constructing them wherever it may desire. That is a matter within the good faith discretion of the defendant.

[Impossibility of Furnishing Proportionate Services No Defense]

Obviously a runway is only practical when the can factory is adjacent to a customer's canning plant, with the necessary result that runway facilities may be furnished to only a few of defendant's more fortunate customers. Therefore, in so far as the physical facility is concerned, as a practical matter, it would be impossible for defendant to furnish proportionally equal runway facilities to all of its customers. However, the fact that it is impractical, or even impossible, to furnish proportionally equal facilities to all customers cannot serve as a justification for furnishing the facilities to those where it is practical, if the furnishing of such facilities discriminates in favor of those receiving them. In other words, Section 2 (e) condemns the discrimination, not the furnishing of facilities. And, the condemnation is just as applicable when the facilities cannot be furnished to all as when they are not furnished to all. This is consistent with the congressional intent to prohibit discriminations, either direct or indirect, which necessarily result in favored customers paying less than other customers for the same commodity.

The defendant may in good faith construct its factories in certain localities and thereby incidentally create a locational advantage to those customers situated nearby. In such a case, defendant may sell f. o. b. the factory, provided it is the normal source of supply, and the nearer customers will receive their cans at a smaller delivered price than those less favorably situated. This, however, is not discriminatory for the difference is justified in delivery costs. When, however, additional facilities, the runway here, are furnished so that those near the factory receive their cans at a price lower than that normally incident to locational advantage, a discrimination does exist, and the seller, defendant here, must either furnish proportionally equal facilities to all customers purchasing that commodity, discontinue the furnishing of such facilities, or, in this case, discontinue the granting of a discount based upon the existence of the facilities. If this is not the law, then the way is open for sellers so inclined to circumvent the letter and spirit of the Robinson-Patman Act, the purpose of which is to prevent discriminations in price to favored customers.

That the furnishing of this facility (and the facility may be said to be furnished regardless of who constructed it, for it is the utilization thereof to achieve the desired end, a lower price, that condemns it) resulted in a discrimination between Morgan and plaintiff cannot be denied. Plaintiff and Morgan were in competition, as will be discussed later, and Morgan received its cans, of like type, size and quality as those of plaintiff, for substantially less than plaintiff. Furthermore, the result of the furnishing of this runway at Austin was that Morgan received the discount for cans used in its plants not connected with the runway. In the opinion of the court, it was just such discriminatory arrangements as this that the Act was designed to prevent.

[Broad View Taken as to "Competition"]

Defendant contends that plaintiff and Morgan were not competitors. It is true that they did not pack the same products. Plaintiff packed green beans, spinach, mustard and turnip greens, while Morgan packed beans (packed with pork and kidney beans), pumpkin, kraut, hominy, beets, soup, spaghetti, carrots, carrots and peas, catsup, tomato juice, tomato pulp or puree and mixed vegetables.

The ends sought to be achieved and the evils sought to be eliminated by the Robinson-Patman Act can be fully realized only by taking a broad view of competition. Here, although plaintiff and Morgan did not pack the identical products, they both packed canned vegetables, sold them in the same markets, and the products of both often appeared on the same shelf in the same grocery store. Certainly, each was seeking what the other was endeavoring to gain at the same time; each was actively competing for the housewife's dollar, and often for the dollar of the same housewife. Thus viewed, there can be no doubt but that Morgan was a competitor of plaintiff within the contemplation of Section 2 (a). Furthermore, there can be no doubt that the price discrimination between plaintiff and its competitor, Morgan, had the necessary adverse effect upon competition, and the burden devolved upon defendant to justify the differential.

The fault found by the court with defendant's justification is more fully set forth in the findings of fact, the substance of which is that defendant has failed to justify the allowance as reflecting actual cost savings. In general, defendant compared cost figures between the Austin plant, which was designed specifically to serve Morgan over the runway, and the Terre Haute plant, which had no runway facilities and was designed to serve the general run of customers by rail; the court found that the two situations are too different for accurate comparison; the figures of comparative costs run in terms of averages and cover only one year, and that single year is multiplied by five to get the five year period used for comparison; the figures used are too general as to kinds and types of labor and how the labor was employed, the costs incurred in the operation of the runway are not separated from costs incurred in the production of sanitary cans, and the line of jurisdiction between defendant and Morgan on the runway is not drawn; and defendant made no attempt to find and to isolate the comparative costs of delivery of cans of like size and kind with those used by plaintiff.

As stated in regard to the quantity discount system, at the very least, the Act requires a more definite and specific justification of cost savings than defendant has presented.

[Statute of Limitations Suspended as to Private Actions]

Having discussed and resolved the contentions on the merits against the defendant, it becomes necessary to dicuss and determine the extent of the damages suffered by the plaintiff. However, before proceeding to a discussion of the question of damages, it is necessary to consider the contention of defendant that plaintiff's claim for damages that occurred prior to three years preceding the filing of the complaint is barred by the applicable statute of limitations of the State of Arkansas. The defendant urges that there can be no recovery for damages to the business or property of plaintiff between June 1, 1943, the date upon which plaintiff began to purchase cans from defendant, and November 2, 1943. (The original complaint was filed November 2, 1946, and by supplemental complaint was extended to cover time to expiration of contract, December 31, 1947. See: Lawlor v. Loewe, 235 U. S. 522, 536.)

Plaintiff contends that assuming the applicable statute is Arkansas Statutes, 1947, Section 37-206, which fixes a three year period of limitation, the running of the statute was suspended by Act of Congress and consequently is not a bar to any of plaintiff's claim for damages.

The Act of Congress referred to was first passed October 10, 1942, 56 Stat. 781, and was amended June 30, 1945, so that the suspension period ran from October 10, 1942, to June 30, 1946. It reads as follows:

"That the running of any existing statute of limitations applicable to violations of the antitrust laws of the United States, now indictable or subject to civil proceedings under any existing statutes, shall be suspended until June 30, 1946, or until such earlier time as the Congress by concurrent resolution, or the President, may designate. This Act shall apply to acts, offenses, or transactions where the existing statute of limitations has not yet fully run, but is shall not apply to acts, offenses, or transactions which are already barred by the provisions of existing laws."

As to this Act, it is defendant's position that it is applicable only to civil and criminal suits instituted on behalf of the United States Government.

Ordinarily, if the intended meaning of statutory language is clear, no resort should be made to the legislative history. Only where language is susceptible of two or more constructions should the court look outside of the Act for the intended meaning. Giving to the language used in this Act its usual and accepted meaning, the conclusion is irresistible that the suspension applies equally to private and Government actions. The parties to this suit draw different conclusions from the legislative history, but, in the opinion of the court, nothing appears from that history which clearly indicates an intention to limit the application of the Act to Government actions only. Therefore, the Act should be administered as written, and the language "civil proceedings" given its usual and accepted meaning. Tiffin Building Corporation v. Balaban & Katz Corporation, D. C. N. D. Ill., — F. Supp. — (October 21, 1949). Accordingly, this contention of the defendant is rejected, and plaintiff may recover for any damages incurred from the date it began purchasing cans from defendant, June 1, 1943.

[Measure of Damages]

The defendant contends that general damages are not recoverable under Section 2(a), and would distinguish the case of Elizabeth Arden Sales Corporation v. Gus Blass Co. [150 F. 2d 988], which allowed general damages. It argues that Section 2(e), involved in that case, incorporates the "most favored customer" doctrine in that under 2(e) disparate treatment in the furnishing of services and facilities is unlawful in and of itself without a showing of adverse effect upon competition, whereas in Section 2(a) unlawfulness of differences in price "turns upon proof that the questioned differences in price either specifically injures the individual who does not receive the lower price, or has or may well have an adverse effect upon competition generally."

In the opinion of the court, the distinction made by defendant is not sound. All subsections of Section 2 were designed to effectuate the policy behind the enactment of the Clayton Act, and the Robinson-Patman amendment thereto, it being the obvious purpose of the Congress to make the provisions comprehensive in order to prevent indirect as well as direct violations. And, when the requisite adverse effect on competition has been established, as in the instant case, there appears to be no valid reason to differentiate between 2(a) and 2(e) in the assessment of damages for injury to business and property.

In this regard, it should be noted that the court has condemned the runway allowance to Morgan under either or both Section 2(a) and Section 2(e). The Elizabeth Arden case, supra, (8 Cir.), is direct authority for the imposition of general damages under 2(e), because of the additional expense imposed upon plaintiff by reason of the allowance to Morgan, a competitor, and the withholding of a similar allowance to plaintiff. However, the other phases of plaintiff's case fall under Section 2(a), and, for this reason, the above expression of the court's views was necessary.

Furthermore, plaintiff claims damages for injury to its competitive position. In assessing damages of this nature, it is difficult to arrive at an exact figure due to the character of the only available evidence, but the court is not without guidance in the matter. It has been pointed out by the Supreme Court that "the rule which precludes the recovery of uncertain damages applies to such as are not the certain result of the wrong, not to those damages which are definitely attributable to the wrong and only uncertain in respect of their amount." Story Parchment Company v. Paterson Parchment Paper Company et al., 282 U. S. 555, 562. In this case it has been adequately established that the plaintiff has been damaged and that damage is definitely attributable to the wrong of defendant, so the only remaining question is the amount to be assessed as damages.

An analysis of can purchases (all of the named competitors purchased their entire supply of cans from defendant) shows that plaintiff's Ozark Region competitors did not reach their peak until 1946, and plaintiff's nation-wide competitors, who were the principal beneficiaries of the systems of quantity discount, continued to increase their purchases year by year, and in the face of a diminishing national demand, they obtained a larger and larger share of the national market at the expense of the smaller canners. While many factors may have played a part in affecting the competitive positions of plaintiff and its named competitors, the trade practices of defendant were the only common factors operating upon the destinies of all, and those practices worked to improve the competitive position of the named competitors while weakening the competitive position of plaintiff.

The cumulative effect of the unlawful discriminations first made itself felt in 1945, when plaintiff alone showed a marked decline. It was during the first part of 1945 that plaintiff's controversy with defendant over the 12 cars of cans, hereinabove referred to, arose. Defendant contends that any losses suffered by plaintiff on account of the delay incurred in the delivery of the cans was plaintiff's own fault, and that it was the duty of plaintiff to accept the cars and thereby mitigate any damages that might arise. With this the court cannot agree, for plaintiff was but insisting that it get its cans in accordance with the contract and the law. Plaintiff had specifically warned defendant that it would refuse shipments not so made. Had plaintiff accepted these shipments as billed, it would have in effect continued to be a party to a violation of the terms of its contract and the law. It was not necessary for plaintiff to do so, and it should not be penalized now for its insistence on compliance with the contract and the law. Defendant had adequate notice of plaintiff's position on the matter, and defendant's actions thereafter were deliberate and with full knowledge of that position. Therefore, defendant is responsible for any legal damages flowing from its adopted course of conduct. However, this phase of the case should not be treated separately and is properly a part of plaintiff's claim for damages to its competitive position. It will be so treated by the court.

The evidence is legally sufficient to enable the court to make a just and reasonable estimate of the damages incurred by plaintiff.

Thus, it appears that plaintiff has sufficiently established general damages under Sections 2 (a) and 2 (e), which may be determined with exactness, and, also, damage to its competitive position for which it is entitled to a sum which will reasonably compensate it therefor. However, there is necessarily a degree of overlapping when the assessment exceeds the amount of price differentials on account of freight charges, quantity discounts and runway allowances. In the final analysis it is believed that one award should be made which, within the theory of the law as understood by the court and as set forth hereinabove, represents reasonable compensation for the injury suffered by plaintiff to its business and property. Accordingly, the lump sum of $125,000.00 has been fixed as damages.
